Mr. Forth: My hon. and learned Friend will recall that earlier this morning our hon. Friend the Minister reassured us that extensive consultations would take place. Does he not feel that that will deal entirely with any reservations that he may have? He knows about the process of consultation between a Minister and other r j 8-1interested parties. Our hon. Friend mentioned taxi drivers and responded to an intervention about the disabled; he is clearly prepared to talk to many different groups about the possible effect of the regulations. Does that not reassure my hon. and learned Friend?

Mr. Lawrence: My hon. Friend is tempting me down another avenue that goes on for miles and miles. Those of us who have been active in this place know that consultations do not always end with the result that is anticipated when they are lovingly referred to by those who are to make the consultations. I have spoken for four and a half hours on a subject where there were consultations, consultations and yet more consultations. At the end of all that, the conclusion was a load of rubbish. Therefore, I have no great confidence that the mere fact of consultations taking place will achieve the correct result.

1.15 pm

Sometimes, after one has been consulting for a long time, one says, "Well, one person says one thing, another says something else and the whole thing is confusio[illegible] I have to come to a decision, and this is it." Opposition Members say that that is what happened on the community charge. They say that there were consultations, the Government were confused and that they came to the wrong conclusion. Therefore, consultations are not an excuse for regulations that may yet come before the House and which are unsigned cheques.

I know that the House is anxious to get on and I shall conclude. It will be dangerous if the Bill remains in its current form without an exception for tiny children. That was referred to by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the the Duchy of Lancaster in his speech in 1980. It will be dangerous for the tiny child. It is inappropriate to bring forward legislation by shovelling it under the compendium of regulations that may or may not emerge in a form that we may or may not like and which we may or may not have an opportunity to debate. It is wholly against the principles of our law that we should, at every turn, place the obligation upon the accused person to explain himself. For those reasons, as the Bill stands on this matter, it is wrong and the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) is right and I support it.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Some time ago my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) tabled what I think the House will understand to be a probing amendment in order to consider the issues contained in that amendment. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has told us about his considerable restraint in the early stages of the Bill——

Ms. Short: Restraint?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, I acknowledge the use of the word "restraint". Single-handedly my hon. and learned Friend could have blocked the Bill and he could still do so. The House needs to acknowledge that.

Mr. Lawrence: I have no intention of doing so.

Mr. Bottomley: I should pay a back-handed tribute to my hon. and learned Friend. I was voting for front seat belt wearing before he was. In fact, I am not sure whether he has got round to voting for front seat belt wearing. the countries that passed the front seat belt law 10 years ago are mainly stuck at compliance rates of about 60 per cent. We have a compliance rate of 95 per cent. Our experience shows that the British public will accept what is sensible, especially when Parliament has considered the issue, not necessarily at great length, but in some depth.

My belief and the belief of the supporters of the Bill and many who are agnostic is that if the Bill comes into effect with appropriate regulations that provide for exemptions, the wearing and protection rate for children and infants and, by extension—although not covered by the law—for adults in the back of cars, will increase and that avoidable disadvantage, distress, injury and misery will be avoided on a significant scale.

It is right that the question of appropriate restraints should be considered. However, if we are to obtain the benefit of consultation and the views of those outside the House as well as within, we need to have consultation. We need to bring forward the issues so that they can be considered inside and outside the House.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley will not consider it necessary to press the amendment and to write an age limit into the Bill. That would be a mistake. It would put more people at risk and lose the advantage of consultation.

Mr. Waller: Does my hon. Friend consider that it would be better to go away and think further, accept that there is a need for legislation, and to come back with a Bill that contained more information and was more carefully drafted and less vague that the one before the House? Before too long, the House may have the opportunity of considering legislation on this subject, and it would be better if we could see what is proposed. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) that there is a real danger that confusion will be caused in the minds of those using cars if they cannot easily discern what is required of them. That would cause more danger, not less.

Mr. Bottomley: The sensible and right thing to do for parents and other adults who carry children in cars is well-known from television programmes, Department of Transport advice and the activities of a large group of organisations which support the Bill, not only because they want legislation but because they have professional experience and family organisational experience of the extra protection needed for children.

I do not need to remind the House of the extent of inquiries into the number of child abuse cases. I do not want to draw a narrow parallel with parents who regularly expose their children to unnecessary risk by taking them unrestrained in cars, but sometimes we get our balance of priorities wrong by not considering the end result that we are trying to avoid—the unnecessary death of children.

The Bill itself is plain. It provides that from a date to be announced children in the backs of cars must be restrained. What is not clear and precise is the degree of exemption that the regulations will cover. The Bill cannot be accused of being vague. If the regulations are to be acceptable, wide consultation is required which those who have questioned the details of the Bill would want Parliament to require the Government to carry out before producing the regulations.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton discussed the question of reasonable excuse. Reasonable excuse is an opportunity for those who have a child unrestrained in the back of the car not to be convicted. I should have thought that someone with experience of prosecuting and defending would prefer it not to be an absolute offence. In the rare cases of prosecution enforcement, the prosecution would have to demonstrate that the child was under a certain age, was in a car where restraint was fitted, and was not wearing it. The reasonable excuse question arises as to whether they should be convicted. Reasonable excuse allows mitigating circumstances to be put forward, and I should have thought that my hon. and learned Friend would have pushed for such provision to be made if it was not included in the Bill.

Regulations can keep up with changes in technology. We have heard about those who are smaller, and we know about some of the adaptations for infants, for younger children and for adults. There can be adjustments to the shoulder height and adjustments at the back of the belt so that it can be brought down to suit any shoulder. Regulations allow future technology improvements to be taken into account, rather than waiting for the lottery of the private Member's Bill procedure.

It is not the tradition of the House that the Government should promote such a Bill. It requires only one hon. Member to prevent a Bill from getting through, and if that hon. Member is not satisfied the Bill will not get through. However, if the Bill does not get through today, hundreds of thousands of children will be left unprotected for years until another hon. Member brings forward a Bill, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day), and allows the House to consider whether it is possible to bring in extra protection.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I fully support the Minister's point that the Bill is important. It may not cover everything that concerns me. This is not a filibuster. I wrote on 22 December to the promoters of the Bill about extending it, and I fully realise that that is not possible. Nevertheless, the fact that the Bill has certain weaknesses is no justification for it being lost, and we should at least trust the Government and the promoters of the Bill to try to extend it later on.

Mr. Bottomley: I do not accuse any hon. Member of trying to lose the Bill. I welcome some of the comments that have been made. Improvements were made in Committee, and there will be further improvements to the Bill if we make progress.

During the remaining hour and six minutes of the debate I ask those who have doubts about the Bill to consider allowing the Bill to be passed so that it may be considered in another place.

Mr. Waller: My hon. Friend the Minister has made the reasonable point that a subject of this kind is normally the subject of private Member's Bills. If a Government Bill dealing with road safety were to be considered by the House in the relatively near future, is my hon. Friend able to confirm that it would provide an opportunity for a better-drawn provision of this nature to be incorporated in it? That is what happened on a previous occasion. This is not a once only attempt; if the Bill is lost, might there not be an opportunity before very long to introduce better proposals that could be incorporated in legislation?

Mr. Bottomley: Probably, but at a cost of 60 children dead and several thousand injured.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I am conscious of the fact that there are some hon. Members who want to frustrate the Bill's progress. The Opposition agree with many of the points that the Minister has made, in particular that no advantage would be served if, as a matter of principle, those up to the age of three were removed from the provisions of the Bill. There are strong reasons for saying that they are the most vulnerable and most in need of protection of this kind. Both by size and ability to communicate they are the least able to make up their own minds.

The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) has made an important point about the type of restraint that should be used. It is important that the regulations should get it right, but the evidence shows that a child in the rear of a car who is restrained by any kind of restraint is better off than a child who is completely unrestrained.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) referred to a particular case, but the Minister assured the House that she was wrong. I read about the case that the hon. Lady quoted and I was horrified by it. I can think of nothing worse for a parent than to see his other child burning to death in the back of a car. All hon. Members realise that that could happen, but we have to strike a balance. It would be irresponsible not to recognise that something that will save life in the vast majority of cases might also cause death, but all the evidence clearly favours the restraint of children who travel in the back of cars.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Whenever a case is reported of a child under restraint having died in circumstances similar to those to which my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) rightly referred, I make it a habit to ask for an investigation. During the last two years there have been two reports. The first referred to this fire, about which I have given information. The second referred to a child who was travelling in the front seat of a car. It transpired that an unrestrained adult in the back of the car was thrown forward and crushed the child in the front seat. I shall continue to ensure that any reported cases are investigated and, where necessary, I shall make a report to the House.

Mr. Lloyd: I thank the Minister for intervening. He said that there have been two cases, in the first of which it was suspected that——

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The first was the case to which I referred earlier, where there was no restraint, though earlier reports said that there was. The second case was of an unrestrained adult in the back of a car who was thrown forward, leading to the death or injury of a child in the front of the car.

Mr. Lloyd: That has to be compared with the fact that during the same two-year period over 100 children lost their lives precisely because they were not restrained.

I appeal to the hon. Member for Keighley to withdraw this amendment and allow this matter to be properly debated by the public and in Parliament when the regulations are in draft form. We shall then know what we ought to do to ensure that there is a safe means of restraint for children up to three years of age.

1.30 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): My inclination is to support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller), but I am a little confused about how the mother holding a baby in the back of a car is affected by these proposals. Legislation often goes through the House without hon. Members envisaging what happens in real life.

Imagine me, driving my car and seeing a friend with her baby. I stop, offer her a lift and she gets into the back of my car with her young baby, which she is holding in her arms. Naturally, she would fold up the carry-cot and put it in beside her. My car is fitted with seat belts, so what does my friend do? Does she wear the belt and strap it round herself and the child? Is she required under the law to sit the child next to her and strap it in?

I am confused and should like my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) to make the matter clear. I could put my friend in the position, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has pointed out, of committing an offence through a third party if I do not say, "If you get into my car, you must hold your baby in such a way that the seat belt stretches over you and the baby and holds you all back in the seat." The position is confusing. When we stop to give people lifts, we do not always think about exactly what is the law.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend makes a serious point. Because we want to consult family organisations and perhaps parent-teacher associations, to ensure that clear advice is given and that the regulations which define the law are right, we are asking my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) to withdraw the amendment rather than push it to a vote.

May I say in response to some of my hon. Friend's points, which people outside are raising, that one should never put a baby on one's lap in a car, because if there is a sudden deceleration, such as in a crash, that baby becomes one's cushion, and babies are very bad cushions. "Never put a baby inside the seat belt with you because the baby will suffer far more than you." I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making it possible for me to offer that advice to the outside world. The details of the regulations will depend on discussions and consultation, and my hon. Friend is right to make that point.

Mrs. Gorman: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point, but what am I to do? Let us say that I am with a tiny baby. I get into the car with it and my instinct is to hold it in my arms. It is a small baby and it wriggles about a lot —it does not know that when it is put down on its own it is supposed to stay there, and it is likely to flop on to the floor. I may be distracted if the car brakes suddenly. Is my hon. Friend the Minister telling us that I have to put my very small baby on the seat beside me, possibly strap myself in and then find that the seat belt cannot stretch across my baby so the baby lies on the seat beside me? Am I supposed to sit in such a way that I keep both my hands on the baby on that seat? This is a practical problem.

I may have two small children. My instinct is to strap in the child who sits up and to hold the other. To say that I should not hold it practically goes against human nature. Of course I shall hold the baby. I shall not stop to think what the law is and what priciples I must obey. These are the kind of practical difficulties faced in real life. It is important that we envisage these circumstances.

Ms. Richardson: The scenario that the hon. Lady describes is very telling. The Minister said that one should never hold a baby on one's lap. The hon. Lady has asked what one does with the baby and with one's self. Suppose the baby is sick, needs a cuddle or is frightened. The instinct of the woman in the back is to take the baby on her lap. Is the Minister saying that the driver should stop the car and say, "I cannot carry you"? I understand the Minister's point about the danger of the child becoming a cushion for the adult, but in some cases mothers will take a child on to their lap without thinking about it.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The House may wish to consider one or two more amendments and to give the Bill its Third Reading if possible. In the hope of being helpful, may I explain. Parents ought to have a better chance of seeing the PACTS video or the "That's Life" material, which shows what happens when one carries a baby on one's lap. I am not saying that parents should never carry their baby on their laps, but no parent would do so regularly having seen videos of what happens, even in low-speed crashes.

It is also worth emphasising that the Bill is likely to cover the 80 per cent. of children who mainly travel in their family's car. There are other vehicles and other circumstances, but most children are exposed to risk most often in their own family's car, and if restraints are fitted they should be used. In those circumstances, any parents who have spent £20, £40 or £140 on a radio cassette and have failed to spend £20 or £40 on appropriate restraints for their children are betraying their children.

Mrs. Gorman: The Minister has still not dealt with my point, which is about what happens in real life. Will a mother carrying two children in the circumstances that I described be made technically guilty of an offence? Will the driver who gave the lift be taken to court or will it be the mother, who did not make use of the seat belt in the back seat for her child. Who the dickens will it be? Do we really want parents to be brought to court and fined in those circumstances? We are on the road to Cleveland; we are encouraging people to intervene in family matters who should not be involved at all.

Mr. Day: My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) overlooks the point that that moral dilemma already exists. My Bill does not create the difficulties. If the restraints are there, the problem already arises. My Bill does not affect it in any way and I do not understand why she thinks that it does.

Secondly, the Minister has made it clear that the very point that she raises—I agree that it is a point of considerable concern—will be considered in introducing the regulations. That is why the Bill is drafted as it is.

Mrs. Gorman: I have made it clear that the exemption of children under three is a move in the right direction, because it allows a mother faced with that difficulty legally to hold her child. That is her natural instinct. I have taken on board the Minister's point that that is dangerous, but it happens in real life and I do not want it to be made into an offence under the Bill if it ever reaches the statute book.

Mr. Waller: I do not want to be deliberately obstructive. We have had a good discussion about the problem, and I accept that three years is not necessarily the right age. I am not entirely satisfied with the responses I have received but in the interests of making progress and to provide an opportunity to discuss matters that are still important, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Waller: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 1, line 27 at end insert—

'(3A) Regulations under this section shall include an exemption for any child holding a valid certificate signed by a medical practitioner to the effect that it is inadvisable on medical grounds for him to wear a seat belt.

(3B) If the driver of a motor vehicle is informed by a constable that he may be prosecuted for an offence under subsection (2) above, he shall not, in proceedings for that offence, be entitled to rely on an exception afforded to a child by a certificate referred to in subsection (3A) above unless—

(a) it is produced to the constable at the time he is so informed; or

(b) within seven days after the date on which he is so informed, it is produced at such police station as he may have specified to the constable; or

(c) it is produced there as soon as is reasonably practicable; or

(d) it is not reasonably practicable for it to be produced there before the day on which the proceedings are commenced; and for the purposes of this subsection the laying of the information or, in Scotland, the service of the complaint on the accused shall be treated as the commencement of the proceedings.'.

The Bill as originally presented to the House was seriously defective in that it made no provision for exemption certificates for children who, for medical reasons—physical or psychological—would have difficulty in wearing a seat belt.

The earlier provision preventing children from being carried unbelted in the front of a car, needed another provision about exemption certificates, because it was still possible for children to be carried in the rear of a car. If we passed the Bill without provision for exemption certificates, some children could not be carried in a car at all. Therefore, my amendment provides for exemptions from the wearing of seat belts for children if they hold a valid certificate that has been signed by a medical practitioner.

There has been discussion about the cost of such certificates. Previous legislation provided that in certain circumstances a Minister may stipulate the cost of such a certificate. I suspect that the feeling now is that such a provision is not necessary. However, I am a little concerned about the sorts of figures that are mentioned. I heard yesterday of a medical practitioner charging £18 for writing a certificate to the effect that an adult had a medical difficulty which meant that that person should not be required to wear a seat belt. I can envisage that in certain circumstances, perhaps for a mother on a low income with several children, the cost could cause great difficulties if there were no provision for stipulating the maximum fee. Sometimes medical practitioners ask what may appear to be quite large sums for writing a simple certificate.

It is important that medical practitioners are given some indication of the circumstances in which children should be granted a certificate. Is the fact that a child throws a tantrum every time he is put into the back of a car and strapped in, perhaps thus causing more danger to the occupants of the car, sufficient reason for a medical practitioner to write a certificate? It is important that the circumstances are set out. It might be a good idea if a statement incorporating such provisions were placed before the House. However, one way or another, it is important that the circumstances should be fully set out.

More consideration should be given to the kind of psychological problems which might lead children to be entitled to an exemption certificate. I am persuaded that there are relatively few physical problems that would require an adult or a child to be granted an exemption. Experience since the wearing of front seat belts was made compulsory suggests that there are relatively few circumstances in which a physical deformity or physical problem makes an exemption certificate necessary or desirable. However, there are psychological problems and such problems probably arise more in relation to the rears of cars than to the fronts, because some cars have constricted rear areas. Some children who are belted in might feel uncomfortable. From my discussions with parents, I know that that is the case and that parents are concerned about it. I am confident that my hon. Friend the Minister will give the matter his careful consideration.

I am glad that the amendment that I tabled originally has been corrected and that the new amendment takes into account the amendment made in section 1(2) of the Road Traffic (Production of Documents) Act 1985, which amended section 33A of Road Traffic Act 1972 by changing from five to seven the number of days allowed for the presentation of a certificate at a police station. That seems a reasonable alteration. It also added new paragraphs (c) and (d) to subsection (3B), effectively saying to drivers that a certificate need not be produced if it is impracticable to do so.

There may be greater difficulties about the presentation of a child's certificate. Drivers would probably carry their certificate with the other driving documents. I am glad that the extra provision is incorporated in the Bill and that the amendment appears to be acceptable. I commend it to the House.

1.45 pm

Mr. Day: My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) is to be congratulated on the conduct of his arguments throughout this and earlier stages of the Bill, and especially on this matter. The Bill is currently modelled on section 33B of the Road Traffic Act 1972 which does not provide for the arrangements that he has described. I am certainly willing to accept the amendment and I trust that my hon. Friend the Minister will do likewise. In view of the time, I hope that hon. Members will then allow us to move on.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I welcome the amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) has picked up the distinction between the need for exemption certificates for rear seat travel and the absence of such a requirement for front seat travel. The promoter has rightly congratulated him on spotting that. I might briefly point out to those reporting our proceedings that to describe the Bill as having a rough passage would be an exaggeration as some of the amendments have been both sensible and acceptable. I trust that there will be an opportunity briefly to recognise that the efforts of all concerned have led to improvements in the Bill and I hope that it will make further progress today.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 18, in page 2, line 3, at end insert—

'(2A) In section 199 of the 1972 Act (exercise of regulation-making powers and Parliamentary control)—

(a) In subsection (3) after "33A" there shall be inserted ", 33C"; and

(b) In subsection (4) for the words "or 33A" there shall be substituted the words ", 33A or 33C".'.—[Mr. Day.]

Mrs. Gorman: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 2, line 6, column 3, leave out '2' and insert '1'.

The Bill provides for penalties to be inflicted on parents or other drivers who fail to ensure the use of restraints in the rear seats. The penalty is at level 2 of the standard scale, which is a fine of £100. In my view it is bad enough for parents to have to go through the trauma of being taken to court for what I regard as a very trivial matter, but it is even worse to fine them £100.

In real life, children may be naughty. They may undo their belts. Other people's chidren may be difficult to control. There may be a number of children in the car. We have been through all the factors which make a nonsense of the Bill, but as the purpose of my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) is to get the Bill into law we must consider the level of fine.

I do not wish to delay the proceedings today, so I ask my hon. Friend for an assurance that he agrees that the level of penalties is inappropriate for an offence under this measure. No normal person would agree that parents should be punished to such an extent for such an offence. It is reasonable to caution them, to issue a warning and to explain the necessity for doing as the law requires, but the fine envisaged is entirely inappropriate. In my view, even £50 would be pretty hefty and I should prefer there to be no financial penalty. I hope that my hon. Friend will give an assurance that he will reconsider the matter and definitely drop the idea of level 2 penalties.

Mr. Day rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Has the hon. Lady finished? If so, I shall put the Question.

Mrs. Gorman: No, I am just giving way.

Mr. Day: I am willing to accept the amendment and gain some progress for the Bill. It is not a draconian measure; it is meant to encourage people. I am not seeking to make people penniless. So I accept the amendment and any assurance that the Minister gives.

Mrs. Gorman: After that assurance, I shall withdraw the amendment——

Mr. Peter Bottomley: May I intervene?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot do it that way. I must put the Question. The Question is——

Mr. Bottomley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) was allowing me to intervene in her speech.

Mrs. Gorman indicated assent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I do not want the House to be confused. The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) was moving the amendment and I am not clear whether she has completed her speech.

Mrs. Gorman: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I beg the hon. Lady's pardon.

Mrs. Gorman: I give way to the Minister.

Mr. Bottomley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I suggest that it would be helpful if she did not withdraw her amendment. Then I could make a brief speech and the House could decide what to do.

Mrs. Gorman: I accept my hon. Friend's advice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question is, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day), who is promoting the Bill, has said that he is willing to accept the amendment. The Government are not keen on it but are willing to accept it in the House, and, if we feel strongly about it, come back in another place. I emphasise that I am not trying to say that we shall hijack the amendment because there will not be so much pressure on time. The Government would want to consider the issue again.

The aim of the supporters of the Bill is not to throw major financial penalties at parents. It is for more parents to use the restraints that they have. That is what the law will be. Outside the law, the aim is for more parents to fit and use restraints. Any parent who decided not to put his child in a restraint, with the prospect of a £15 fine with a maximum of £100 on level 2 or £10 with a maximum of £50 on level 1 would be playing cash roulette with his child's life. I hope that even if the House accepts the level 1 penalty today, the message will go out that the reason for restraining one's child is not to save money, but to save the child.

Mr. Waller: I concede that my hon. Friend might be in a slight difficulty in that it seems that, if we have a level 1 penalty for this offence and a level 2 penalty for not wearing a seat belt in the front of the car, we are giving less priority to the former. However, we should also take into account the fact that we are trying to encourage parents to do the right thing. There are difficulties with the enforcement of this legislation, which we do not face with legislation that is already on the statute book. Therefore, I urge my hon. Friend carefully to consider keeping the amendment in the Bill.

Mr. Bottomley: I suggest that the House incorporates the amendment in the Bill now. We shall consider it seriously. We should not anticipate any future consideration.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

1.53 pm

Mr. Day: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill has had a wide and detailed airing through all its stages. I hope that hon. Members will now allow it to proceed to the other place. If anyone has any further comments, I hope that they will be brief.

We have had an interesting and full debate today. I have already thanked my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) for his contributions to the debate. I also thank the Minister for his help so far. I hope that we can now proceed to give the Bill its Third Reading.

I am absolutely convinced that the vast majority of people believe that the Bill is good and will save lives. It is not in any way intended to be draconian or to intimidate; it is meant to be an encouragement. My acceptance of amendment No. 7 on Report is a sign of my stand on that. People accept the logic behind the Bill, so it will be self-enforcing. The Minister has assured us that there will be widespread consultation and I know that he will return with regulations. I am pleased that we could agree that they would come under the affirmative rather than the negative resolution procedure and I thank the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for raising that issue.

If we pass this legislation many people will be pleased in this place and outside. I hope that the House will feel able to support it on its, I hope brief, Third Reading.

Mr. Forth: I wish to make it clear that I do not support the legislation but that I do not intend to foil it by procedural means. If we vote on Third Reading, I shall be happy because it will enable me to express my view correctly. I do not wish to detain the House unnecessarily or to frustrate the Bill by any false means, but I wish to make a brief speech about my responses to it. Hon. Members may be puzzled that, despite the great support for it of which we are asssured, some hon. Members may be sufficiently eccentric to oppose it.

I came to the House believing, as I still do, that we legislate excessively in too many areas of human behaviour. My main objective is to restrain this propensity to legislate. I am not persuaded that if something is deemed to be good for many people we must necessarily devise a way to force behaviour in that direction. For that reason I am unhappy about a wide range of legislation from this House and even from my Government. Anyone who starts from that position takes much persuading that it is right to intervene, even in a case such as this.

I am not even persuaded when I am told that 90 per cent. of people, when asked, think that this legislation is a good idea. If we ask people on the street whether they think that hanging or capital punishment is a good idea, 80 per cent. will say "Yes". I doubt whether all hon. Members who pray that sort of evidence in aid would want to follow their logic through and legislate every time something is supported by an opinion poll. A moment's thought will make hon. Members realise that that is not a legitimate basis on which to judge legislation or to intervene.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, but not only do the vast majority of people outside want the legislation, so do the vast majority of hon. Members. That is the difference.

Mr. Forth: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but he will recall that earlier today, when we had a closure motion, only 107 hon. Members voted in favour and four against. In other words, only 111 Members of Parliament out of 650 were sufficiently persuaded of the virtue of the legislation to be present. That is not an overwhelming display of support.

Mr. Sheerman: Today is Friday.

Mr. Forth: Friday is a parliamentary sitting day like any other. It has no lesser status than any other day. It is unacceptable for Members of Parliament to say to constituents, "I am sorry that you were not represented on Friday, but I had something else to do." This Bill, known to be a private Member's Bill, is as entitled as any other Bill to the vocal and physical support of Members of Parliament if they are to claim that it has widespread support. Let us lay that to rest and deal with the Bill strictly on its merits.

I think that my hon. Friend the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) have conceded that it has been shown that parts of the legislation raise question marks and doubts. Equally, they have been fair in accepting amendments, not least so that we can make progress and pass the legislation in one form or another. I repeat, I do not intend to frustrate it. They must concede that much work needs to be done and that many issues must be considered.

My hon. Friend the Minister has assured us that he will consult interested parties widely to establish whether the legislation can be made to work in an acceptable and reasonable manner. Knowing the Minister as I do, I am sure that he will do exactly that and embark positively on procedures to bring about what he said would be the benefits of this law in a reasonable and workable way and to achieve a balance between what is practical and what is not.

If the opportunity for a vote arises, I will vote against the Bill because I am not persuaded that it is right for the House to devise ever-increasing measures to dictate human behaviour. I believe—regrettably, fewer hon. Members seem to believe this—in the concept of parental responsibility. My Government talk constantly about Victorian values—whatever they were—the family and parental responsibilities. Opposition Members talk about the family and the role of parents. Why, if we respect the role of parents and the family relationship so much, do we still see fit to legislate to tell people what their responsibilities are and fine them if they do not exercise them? That is an odd way to square the concepts of the family and responsibility on the one hand with the role of the law on the other.

I retain, even after a few years in the House—it is more difficult after a few years in the European Parliament—the naive belief that people know best and should be left to make their own judgments. I retain even more strongly the belief that no hon. Member has a superiority or monopoly of knowledge. I am suspicious of the repeated attempts in the House to devise ways of telling everybody how to live their lives. For those reasons, I will oppose the Bill.

Mr. Waller: My view reflects that expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth).

I hope that the House will have an opportunity to vote on Third Reading and give its view on it. I do not wish to frustrate the House's will that there should be a vote. I fully recognise that hon. Members would like a decision to be made.

There are aspects of the Bill about which I remain profoundly unhappy. This is not a sector where criminal sanctions should be used to persuade people of their responsibilities. The question of what is a reasonable excuse is a tricky one and we have tended to skirt round it. It is one to which we shall have to pay careful attention in the future.

I am anxious that the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which I took to be a commitment, has been cast to one side. He said that he could not conceive of any Government moving to the position of introducing compulsory wearing of seat belts where there is not compulsory fitting.

I hope that when he is considering the regulations the Minister will take account of his predecessor's important words and look at the context in which those unequivocal words were made. That shows the danger of saying one thing and leading the House to approve regulations that might be different to those that were imagined when the primary legislation was introduced.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) will deserve the congratulations of the House if his Bill receives its Third Reading today. I will do everything that I can to ensure that it works and saves lives.

2.4 pm

Mrs. Gorman: I oppose the Bill in principle and practice. I oppose it in principle because I believe that far too much legislation from the House interferes with personal responsibility. As my hon. Friends have already said, there is a strong case for leaving parents to make decisions for themselves on how to raise, transport and generally take care of their children.

Much evidence is building up to show that if, through legislation, we take away the individual's responsibility to make decisions, there is a tendency for people to behave more irresponsibly. Evidence exists, especially with regard to accidents, to support that. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) referred earlier to such evidence and to the research work carried out by Dr. John Adams from London university.

If we introduce such legislation, we tell people that there is a law and the people do not need to worry any more because the Government have taken on the responsibility. That does not apply only to this Bill. I have referred to Cleveland where parents were brought to court for apparent breaches of their duties. We gave powers to the legislature and to bureaucrats to intervene in family matters. That has led to an awful disaster for those parents in Cleveland.

When I mentioned Cleveland the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) blanched and appeared to want to intervene. We gave powers to authorities and that led to a situation in which innocent parents have been dragged into court and subjected to awful experiences with regard to their family matters. The House is largely responsible for that for our over-zealousness in trying to protect people from their own folly.

Ms. Short: I understand the hon. Lady's point. However, she must also understand that we have a problem, that we did not all understand until fairly recently, of serious sexual abuse of children, and we must try to intervene to protect children while having respect for the integrity of the family. Surely the hon. Lady accepts that. Does she accept that there should be intervention in those dreadful cases?

Mrs. Gorman: I entirely accept the hon. Lady's intervention. No one, except those engaged in such horrible practices, would approve of the kind of abuse that occurred in the Cleveland cases. However, there is evidence to suggest that when we give powers to authorities to intervene, those powers—with the best will in the world—cause intervention in family life and create great distress. I do not know whether granting those powers reduces the amount of child abuse. I wish that it did. That might be a reason for granting those powers. However, there is no evidence to support that wish.

More cases may be coming to light and I would support any measures through the voluntary associations to take a greater interest——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is being led astray. She must confine herself to the Bill.

Mrs. Gorman: I accept your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I will return to the specific issues in the Bill and explain why I find it objectionable. I have dealt with personal responsibility, but there is also a question of civil liberties.

Mrs. Wise: Has the hon. Lady considered the necessity and desirability of intervening in the case of babies, where parents have no excuse for not restraining them? Great problems could also arise with older children who might be defiant and deliberately cause trouble, and even create danger in the car by their unruly behaviour. Has the hon. Lady considered the differences in children of different ages?

Mrs. Gorman: I dealt with that point at some length when I made my earlier intervention. I am entirely in favour of persuading people to observe better standards of conduct. The Church, as well as the House, is involved in such activities, but there is a difference between persuading people to behave more sensibly in respect of their children and introducing an element of compulsion—of bringing innocent parents into court to be fined. It worries me that the Minister appears to be in favour of heavy rather than light fines for parents who are nursing babies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley indicated dissent.

Mrs. Gorman: My hon. Friend the Minister is shaking his head, so perhaps I am wrong.

After we have passed legislation such as this, the House tends to think, "That's that. That law is on the statute book and everybody will behave better now." However, there have been numerous studies—many of them sponsored by the Department of Transport—indicating that there is a perverse effect arising out of road safety legislation. That is shown to be particularly so in studies which have examined the relationship between accidents and pedestrians and cyclists. The fact that cars are much safer than they were and that there are many more zebra crossings are among the factors taken into consideration.

Those studies suggest that the number of accidents involving pedestrians and cyclists is not falling as quickly as it should, because although the car driver may feel safer, he probably takes more risks. As a result, more pedestrians and cyclists are injured.

Mr. Peter Bottomley indicated dissent.

Mrs. Gorman: My hon. Friend the Minister again shakes his head, but I have taken the trouble to read those reports. I referred earlier to one of them in particular, by Durbin and Harvey, which was sponsored by the Department of Transport. It alleges—and my hon. Friend will correct me if I am wrong—that the increase in the number of accidents involving pedestrians is 13 per cent. higher than the expected figure. It is 40 per cent. higher in the case of cyclists. Against that, the number of accidents involving drivers of heavy goods vehicles and of buses—we have heard a lot today about Ministers falling under buses—has declined.

There is a perfectly logical reason for that trend, if one takes human nature into account. The driver or passenger wearing a safety belt—whether in the front or back of the car—tends to be over-confident about his safety and is less attentive to what is happening on the road, particularly if he has a car full of people who are all wearing safety belts.

The car may be travelling along the motorway and all those inside it may be playing an "I spy" game. Indeed, there are activity books for children on car journeys which include "I spy" games. The driver's attention may be distracted as he looks out of the window to see something beginning with the letter S. Without realising it, he is endangering others, whether they are the passengers of the car in front or pedestrians. The vehicle ahead may get bashed from behind because of a driver's lack of attention.

There is a strong case to be made against seat belts in general, not just back seat belts, but people do not want to go back and re-examine legislation in that way. In the United States, there has been a good deal of examination of the effect of seat belts on accident levels. Crash helmets have also been investigated, but as we are not dealing with crash helmets today, I shall not say much about them.

When the perception of danger is lowered, other people may suffer as a result. That is the dilemma of all who seek to promote the betterment of behaviour through some form of legislation. There is strong evidence to suggest that there should be fewer regulations from the House so that individuals adopt a more responsible stance.

In his book "Risk and Freedom", John Adams says that, with a view to legislation reaching the House at some stage in the future, he has undertaken a study of parents who frequently transport their children in the back of the car. They said that they felt that they would drive much more carefully—as if they were carrying eggs—if the children were not constrained by seat belts. We are likely to put on the statute book legislation that will withdraw that element of responsibility. Although my hon. Friend the Minister says that he wishes to save 60 lives, he has not given enough consideration—and we are in danger of doing the same—to how many children outside the car, on the street, may have accidents because of the Bill. For that reason, I shall not support the Bill.

2.16 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I shall comment briefly on the remarks of the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) and those of her fellow Right-wing libertarians. While the issue of risk compensation was dealt with adequately on Second Reading—the hon. Lady may wish to look at the record—if she is seriously concerned about risks to non-motor car users she should press the Government, who I hope would be prepared to accept the suggestion, to increase measures that improve pedestrian safety and lessen the risk of accidents of all kinds, rather than blocking a measure that will of itself save lives.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) on piloting the Bill through. I also say, in fairness, that while the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) on occasion entered into a form of debate with me—although not always to the edification of either of us—he has, in the final analysis, played a reasonably responsible role. Certainly, his amendment has assisted the Bill. I welcome the Bill's Third Reading.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Like the official Opposition, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) on what he has achieved. I also acknowledge the help of the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety and its advisers.

More than 600 children are killed and over 7,000 injured each year while travelling unrestrained in the backs of cars. There is increasing awareness of the value of wearing seat belts in the rear of cars as well as in the front. Since the Bill was first debated in the House at the beginning of February, sales of seat belts and child restraints have soared. One leading manufacturer reports sales up by over 40 per cent. That demonstrates the parental support for what the Bill aims to do.

The "That's Life" campaign in 1986 led the way by highlighting just how vulnerable our children are when travelling unrestrained. It is irresponsible of us as drivers to expose them to an unnecessary level of risk. More and more people are having rear restraints fitted to older cars, and all new cars must now have them fitted, anyway. The Bill proposes that where such restraints exist they should, where practicable, be used by child passengers.

There are many issues still to be resolved in deciding how the law should apply in practice. The enabling regulations, which will require the approval of both Houses of Parliament, will need to accommodate a wide range of circumstances—the large family, the school run and so on. The Bill requires only that restraints that are fitted should be used and not that all children in the rear of cars be restrained. A large group would not be prohibited from travelling together.

When drafting the regulations and considering the timing of their introduction, we shall, as the law requires, consult widely. In particular we shall need to discuss with the police, who wholeheartedly support the Bill in principle, with family organisations and other interests, including taxi interests, the enforcement implications. We shall proceed step by step.

The powers that the Bill seeks to introduce are the same as those we already have in respect of adults travelling in the rear of cars. We have not used those powers and we have no plans to do so. I believe that timing is crucial if we are to achieve a high level of compliance. One of the reasons why Britain has the highest front seat belt wearing rate in the world is that the law was in tune with the climate of opinion that existed at that time. For the time being, we want to continue to do everything possible to encourage the voluntary use of rear restraints by adults.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) raised the issue of the comments of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Ruschcliffe (Mr. Clarke). What we are proposing is less than that envisaged by my right hon. and learned Friend. If we began to say that all cars must have rear seat belts fitted, we would be going as far as my right hon. and learned Friend was suggesting. We are going less far. We could be criticised for that, but not in the way offered by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley.

There is growing body of public opinion that we should move towards the obligatory use of rear restraints for children. The Bill reflects that shift. No responsible parent would want to wait for the law before fitting and using child restraints.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Abortion (Amendment) Bill

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on consideration.

Hon. Members: Object
Debate to be resumed on Monday 16 May.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Following the reply by the Leader of the House during yesterday's business questions, and given that the Abortion Act 1967 was enacted at the seventh attempt only when the Government of the day gave time to enable it to make progress, I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman, through you, Sir, can tell the House whether he has been able to consider further the early-day motion which has been signed by 113 hon. Members and the representations which he has received from thousands of people that time should be provided to decide this important matter, which is the concern of millions of people.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If it is unparliamentary and out of order for an hon. Member to accuse another hon. Member of being a liar or a hypocrite, surely it is unparliamentary and out of order for an hon. Member to accuse another hon. Member of being in support of the murdering of babies. That charge was made earlier today by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith), who accused those who had taken part in the debate on new clause 1 and the——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Member is going back to something that apparently took place much earlier in the day. We cannot return to that point at the present time.

Mr. Madden: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If the Hansard report bears out the fact that the hon. Member for Rochdale accused hon. Members who had participated in the debate on new clause 1 of being in support of the murdering of babies, will you ask Mr. Speaker to request the hon. Member for Rochdale to withdraw what many of us who took part in that debate regard as a grossly offensive and unparliamentary remark? Will you ask Mr. Speaker to ask the hon. Member for Rochdale to withdraw that remark, which was made specifically against a group of hon. Members who had taken part in the debate? I have reason to believe that the occupant of the Chair at that time did not hear the remark. I ask you, Sir, to look at the Hansard record. If the allegation is reported there, will you ask Mr. Speaker on Monday to ask the hon. Member for Rochdale to withdraw the remark? The hon. Gentleman has left the Chamber and I have reason to believe that he is prepared to withdraw it if requested.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall all be able to check the Hansard report. I shall of course draw the hon. Member's comments to the attention of Mr. Speaker.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) raised his point of order, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) addressed a question through you to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, who made no immediate response. That may well have been because the hon. Member for Bradford, West wished, quite properly, to raise a point of order. We have had no answer from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

Last Friday, and again in a sense today—I make no comment on today's debate—we have seen a determined attempt by a minority to frustrate the progress of a Bill which had a substantial majority on Second Reading, passed through the Committee stage and completed its Report stage, save for the votes at the end. May I ask the Leader of the House, through you, Sir, whether he will comment on the way in which private Members' rights are being abused and the will of the majority is being made a mockery? Will he do something about it?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to reconfirm that it is not the Government's practice to grant time for any individual private Member's Bill, however important the issues with which it deals. As I said yesterday, we believe that it would be a very grave step to intervene in the process of private Members' Bills. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), the promoter of the Bill, have asked me to consider other ways in which hon. Members could consider the matter. I understand their point and will of course bear it in mind. As the Leader of the House, I am always happy to see them, or any other hon. Member, to discuss the matter.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have been in the Chair for much of today. To prevent repetition in answering accusations of parliamentary mugging, foul play and cheating, will you confirm that the two Bills debated today have been debated absolutely properly and in full conformity with the Standing Orders and that no hon. Member has been called out of order? As Mr. Speaker has said, any accusation by the media of parliamentary mugging would be exaggerated and very much out of place.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Further to the point of order Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let me deal with the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, South. It is a simple answer to a simple question: the hon. Gentleman is correct.

Ms. Short: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must be fair to hon. Members who have other Bills on the Order Paper. I intend to take them now.

Private Members' Bills

MISUSE OF DRUGS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 8 July.

CERVICAL CANCER (TESTING AND TREATMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

UNDERGROUND FIRES (RESEARCH AND CONTROL) AND LAND PROTECTION BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 8 July.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order, given that the last Bill refers specifically to a unit being set up by the Department of the Environment, that objections should come from Conservative Members other than those in the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I realise that the hon. Gentleman is disappointed. However, we have been through this on many occasions at 2.30 on private Members' Fridays and what has occurred has been perfectly in order.

RIGHT TO LIVE BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day?

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. Gentleman have the authority of the Member in charge of the Bill to name a day?

Mr. Haynes: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker—Friday 15 July.

On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not think it is fair. This is an important Bill about living. Government Members seem to want people to die——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his point. There is the additional point that we could not have taken this Bill any further because it has not been printed.

LANDLORD AND TENANT BILL [LORDS]

Read a Second Time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House. —[Mr. Carrington.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported without amendment.

SOLICITORS (SCOTLAND) BILL

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House —[Mr. Darling.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be read the Third time on Friday 20 May.

HORSES, PONIES AND DONKEYS (No. 2) BILL

Read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House —[Mr. Amess.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment; read the Third time, and passed.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. With regard to the one Bill that has passed all its stages today, and the two Bills that passed all their stages except Third Reading, without any word of explanation or even commendation, and certainly without debate in the House, would it not be advisable if procedures were changed at least to enable the promoters of Bills to explain what we are doing in the space of five minutes to change the laws of this country?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that the Procedure Committee is likely to be set up fairly soon. This is not a matter for the Chair, but he may wish to refer it to the Committee when it is set up.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) named Monday 16 May for further proceedings on his Bill. Can you confirm, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that Monday is not a day for private Members' legislation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It will appear on the remaining Orders.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to make it absolutely clear to the hon. Lady and to others that we shall be back with the Bill every single day.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) has talked outside the House of parliamentary mugging, political trickery and all the rest of it. If any attempt was made to take over another day that was designated for private Members' motions, not private Members' Bills, I think that you would be guilty of that crime, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Alton: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thank the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) for his welcome advice, but I shall not be taking it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that it would be wise now if the whole House reflected on the matter and if we proceeded to the Adjournment.

Quest for a Test for Cancer

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Lightbown.]

2.56 pm

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Last year, 2,500 women died of cervical cancer. All of us in the Conservative party and, I suspect, the vast majority of Opposition Members, greatly respect the commitment of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health to the eradication of cervical cancer, and fully accept everything that he, his Department and our hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security are trying to do to introduce a recall system as fast and as effectively as possible.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend will accept that, sad to say, it does not look as if we shall get a full recall service by the end of the year, but we are working towards it. I am sure that he will also accept that one of the problems with the present test is that it is not as accurate as we should like. In fact, it could be up to 20 or 30 per cent. inaccurate. Another difficulty that I am sure my right hon. Friend would accept involves speed. The cytologists can deal with only 25 to 30 slides a day and sometimes it takes up to a month for a women who is very worried about whether she has cancer to hear the result.

The debate about an organisation called Quest for a Test for Cancer, which is battling against the problems that are besetting the country. The trouble is that it is also battling against some civil servants in the Department of Health and Social Security. I have no criticism of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State or of the respective private offices. From my experience on the Select Committee on Social Services, and through day-to-day correspondence, I have nothing but respect for the professionalism of those in the private offices and the conscientious why in which they respond to our letters.

I should like to tell the House a little about the test that has been discovered. Many in the medical profession would call it a breakthrough. The test, which was pioneered by two well-known and distinguished research doctors at the academic department of obstetrics and gynaecology atthe Middlesex hospital, detects pre-cancer in normal-looking cells with a staining technique which causes the nucleus, or control centre, of pre-cancerous cells to appear darker than those of healthy cells. The difference in staining is measured by an instrument called an integrating microdensitometer which shines a beam of light through the nuclei, scanning them and measuring how much light passes through. This value indicates whether the cells are pre-cancerous and how potentially malignant they are. A computer is used to store and analyse the results.

The test has been described as the major breakthrough of the decade in cancer detection. It is fast, reliable and cost effective, and it is the only routine test which detects potential malignancy in normal-looking cells. It replaces a decision based on human observation with measurements of a highly accurate instrument. The present cervical screening involves clinicians examining smears from normal-looking cells. The automatic staining machine can take 180 slides at one cycle, each taking one and a half minutes. That compares with the conventional cervical screening when a single cytologist can process 25 to 30 a day. Furthermore, of the 187 women who have been screened at a field trial, which has been written up in The Lancet and other medical journals, there has been a success and accuracy rate of more than 95 per cent. It goes without saying that the Department was and still is interested in the matter. It made overtures to Dr. Sincock and Mr. Steele who have been pioneering these experiments. I should tell the House of the chronology of events affecting the two doctors.

The DHSS invited Dr. Sincock to apply for funds, and the first discussions were held as long ago as 20 May 1987. It was made clear to the Department that the test had to be put through a final clinical trial before it could be adopted for routine cervical screening. On 17 June 1987 representatives visited the laboratory at the Middlesex hospital to see the test in action. They were highly enthusiastic and encouraged Dr. Sincock to make an application for funds as soon as possible. They promised to process such an application as soon as possible in view of the importance of the work. On 6 July 1987 the DHSS made a further visit to the Middlesex hospital laboratory and brought representatives from a commercial company, the name of which it is not appropriate to mention at this stage. One of them, the research and development manager, explained that his company had ready for production a machine that would quickly and reliably read cervical smear preparations.

In July 1987 a formal application was made to the DHSS procurement directorate. In order to expedite its processing, the DHSS had checked and passed a draft version submitted previously. The decision was promised for 30 November 1987 and I have letters from Ministers confirming that. On 3 August 1987 Dr. Sincock was visited by Dr. Rutovitz of the Medical Research Council unit in Edinburgh. His group had been actively involved in the development of the commercial machine. He confirmed that the machine was nowhere near ready for production and that there were some technical problems. On 9 November 1987 the DHSS visited the Middlesex. Dr. Sincock was informed that the application would have to be amended and that the work was now considered low priority.

Two further amended applications were submitted to the DHSS, one at the end of November and the other at the end of December. On 14 Decemer 1987, the procurement directorate advised that the application was to be considered by a scientific committee that was scheduled to meet on 25 February 1988. On 28 January Dr. Sincock visited Dr. Rutovitz at the Medical Research Council unit in Edinburgh to give a number of lectures about the test and to inspect the commercial machine. He was alarmed by the number of technical problems with the machine and clearly thought at that stage that it was unable to fulfil the promise of automating the reading of cervical smears, despite many years of development.

On 21 April 1988, Quest for a Test for Cancer received an official rejection of its application from the DHSS. Quest for a Test for Cancer and those at the department of academic obstetrics and gynaecology at the Middlesex hospital—those who pioneered the test—have been horrified by that decision. The DHSS has been dragging its feet for a long time. Even today there has been no scientific explanation of why the test was rejected. I hesitate to say, but nevertheless I shall do so, that there was much unpleasantness between officials and Mr. Steele and Dr. Sincock.

[Mr. Jerry Hayes]

On 18 April 1988, Dr. Sincock received a letter from Mr. Kennedy of the supplies technology division about the test. It says:

"I am writing to you following our telephone conversation of 15 April. First, I regret to have to confirm that the expert panel which met on 26 February did not recommend that your project be funded by the NHS Procurement Directorate. Second, I wish to apologise on behalf of DHSS for the excessive and inexcusable delay in letting you have a written statement of the decision of the meeting and for the fact that during our conversation it took me some time to get to the point that the expert panel had effectively turned down your proposal."

At this stage, I should make it clear that all the people who worked to get the project off the ground did everything they could to accede to the requests made by the DHSS and to change specifications. I have been told by those who were involved that they acceded to every request.

We are talking not about an idea but something that has been pioneered, developed, has had clinical trials on 187 women and has proved to have a 95 per cent. success rate. All the funds about which the DHSS initiated the discussions have gone. The chances of getting the test off the ground without £105,000 so that 2,000 or 3,000 women can be tested are remote, unless money is forthcoming from the Department.

A note was sent to Mr. Kennedy by Mr. Steele of the Middlesex hospital in response to the letter of 18 April. He said:

"I do appreciate your apology but find it quite astounding that we were not informed before now particularly in view of the fact that an application for funds was invited by the department and that we have had to revise our proposal several times since that invitation was issued after we visited the department.

As you will know from the papers, we sought a grant in order to validate on a large scale the reliability of this method of screening for cervical neoplasia. Almost daily in clinical practice I meet problems arising from the limitations of cervical cytology and a more reliable method of screening would both save lives and be more cost effective than the present method. I note that you wish to discuss with us the question of commercial exploitation of the assay with the company. As I think Dr. Sincock told you we were not impressed when we met this company last year. They have no particular experience of the type of work which Dr. Sincock is doing and while I am aware that they have been working on the automation of cervical cytology for some years I do not think that this work links in particularly closely with our own nor am I satisfied that they would be the most appropriate people with whom to co-operate. In any case, it seems to us quite illogical to be talking about commercial exploitation before we have a complete appraisal of the method of screening for cervical neoplasia which we have researched. I must say that I find the attitude and response of the Department of Health in this matter very strange."

It is with sadness that I received this morning a letter from Dr. Sincock, who pioneered this work. He said:

"Just a brief note to provide you with an update of information for your . . . debate on 13th May. Mr. D. Kennedy from the NHS Procurement Directorate has yesterday spoken on the phone with Mr. S. Steele, the Head of this department. He will not speak to me in case any information is passed to Quest for a Test for Cancer. Mr. Kennedy did not succeed in getting Mr. Steele to commit himself to further time wasting meetings and discussions. Indeed, it would be fair to say that at the end of the phone call Mr. Steele was of the impression that nothing was being done to resolve the present serious situation and further the Department seemed to be totally confused about our application frequently making contradictory statements.

I have today offered my resignation. I am forced to do this as a result of the grave damage that has been done to my project by the DHSS. Also, some of their recent comments reflect on my professional credibility as a senior research scientist."

Needless to say, Mr. Steele has not accepted that offer of resignation. However, I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health is deeply concerned about this and, probably more than any other Member, is committed to the Health Service and to preventive medicine. I ask my right hon. Friend not simply to give an explanation for what has happened, because what is past is past. I want him to consider that since 15 January, the test has effectively been abandoned.

Millions of women may be suffering from cervical cancer and we know that thousands die every year. The test may provide hope for those women and it will also save the Health Service a great deal of money. I ask my right hon. Friend to give an undertaking that the Department will reconsider the request for very modest financing of £105,000.

3.12 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) for raising this matter and I shall say a word about the overall background of screening for cancer. I want to make it clear, especially in relation to what my hon. Friend said about it being later this year before cervical cancer screening systems will be in operation throughout the country, that my colleagues and I in the Department, about whom my hon. Friend made some kind and generous remarks, are proud that, as a result of our efforts, we are the first and only country in the European Community with a comprehensive national cervical cancer screening service based on computerised call and recall.

The entire family practitioner system has now been computerised. That has been a massive exercise for which everyone involved deserves thanks. In addition to its application to cervical cancer screening, that new system offers many possibilities for the prevention of other types of disease.

Incidentally, we are also the first country in the world to launch a nationwide breast cancer screening service and my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow is aware of that, as the West Essex health authority covers the site of one of the first elements of that system. Already the family practitioner computers are being applied to inviting women for mammography and every region in England now has at least one breast cancer screening service with the whole country due to be covered by 1990.

Those two developments—the cervical cancer screening system and the developing breast cancer screening system—provide a record of which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I can be rightly proud.

I move on to the specific issue my hon. Friend has brought before the House. What I have said is not to suggest in any way that we might not do even better if we could overcome some of the problems of cervical cancer screening. One of them is the quality of the smears that are taken. It is important that my hon. Friend should understand that quality problems are the biggest cause of false negatives. I shall say more about that later, if there is time.

Another problem, to which my hon. Friend's remarks have been principally directed, is the misinterpretation in the laboratory of the smears which have been taken. We would be anxious to adopt any system that could be proved to make a significant reliable contribution, against the criteria we must use, to the improvement of laboratory testing. The requirements of a diagnostic test suitable for routine use in NHS laboratories are that it should be robust—that is, it should be capable of being performed in different types of laboratories and by operators with varied levels of skill; it should use readily-available reagents and instruments; it should be reproducible; and it should have a high sensitivity and specificity.

Similarly, any new method for identifying pre-cancer of the cervix must offer advantages over the existing technique. It should be more accurate, faster, require fewer trained technicians, and have an objective end-point. Ideally—or at least it would be an advantage—it would cost no more than the present test.

In considering the test developed by Dr. Sincock, the research director of Quest, we have been applying the criteria I have just outlined. His hydrolysed DNA—or HDA—test still uses a routinely collected smear, which is why I emphasised earlier that the principal cause of false negatives is inadequately collected smears. The difference is that with Dr. Sincock's test the smear is treated with acid to remove everything but the cell nuclei, which are then stained by a special technique. The intensity of that staining, which indicates whether there is a pre-cancerous condition, is measured objectively in a semi-automatic machine. There is the added potential for full automation of density measurement. Doctor Sincock claims that even normal-looking nuclei from an abnormal area of the cervix are positive in his tests. If that is so, it may be an earlier predictor of pre-cancerous changes than the current smear test.

At the end of 1987, as my hon. Friend has said, Dr. Sincock published preliminary results from 187 smears. His measurements showed good discrimination between normal smears and those with pre-cancer on that small sample of specimens. In the past few years, discussion of the problem of diagnosis of cervical cancer has stimulated a great deal of interest in the scientific community. By the end of last year, in addition to the application of Dr. Sincock, the Department had received 12 others—some for the automation of the current screening technique and some for new methods of diagnosis. On 26 February this year, an independent group of experts was called together, chaired by the Department's chief scientist, to review all the applications. That expert group thought that Dr. Sincock's test required greater precision than was likely to be sustainable in routine NHS laboratory use, and they found the technique very exacting. They thought that the method of measuring the staining intensity was still fairly slow, and that alternative instrumentation would be preferable.

The application as submitted was not supported for funding but it was recommended that a study should be undertaken in another laboratory to assess whether the method could be reproduced elsewhere. As my hon. Friend's closing remarks indicated, Department officials have been involved in discussions with Dr. Sincock and with a commercial company to explore the possibility of a joint funding venture aimed at securing an independent valuation of the test in another laboratory. If that proves successful, there would be a possibility that the test could be commercialised.

In answer to one of my hon. Friend's points, commercialisation of the test is needed so that it can be made available as a complete package of reagents and instruments ready for use by NHS screening laboratories. Only if that is done can the benefits of the new test be brought to the women who use the screening service.

I realise—and I have firmly registered what my hon. Friend has said—that the Department appears to have taken a long time, especially from the point of view of Dr. Sincock and his supporters, to consider a proposal whose advocates believe that it provides a solution to the problem of accurate smear analysis. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree, however, that it would be wrong to embrace such an idea without being fully satisfied both that it is an improvement and that it is suitable for use in the NHS. The Department has sought, with the help of its independent advisers, to help Dr. Sincock to formulate his proposals and to give them a fair hearing. It is still seeking to work with him and Mr. Steele to see whether a way can be found of taking forward the evaluation of the test.

When I heard that the debate was to take place, I asked for a detailed history of the contacts between the Department and Quest for a Test and Dr. Sincock. I can find only one occasion on which it can be said that things really went wrong. Officials had told Quest that a final decision would be received on the request for funds to evaluate the test by the end of March, but it was not notified formally until 18 April. That notification was in the end conveyed in the letter, part of which my hon. Friend read out. The notification, from Mr. Kennedy, contained a clear and ample apology. It is also fair to note that the delay was due in part to the efforts that my officials had been making to find an alternative way of having the test evaluated along the lines suggested by the expert panel.

It has been suggested that Dr. Sincock's application for support was rejected on scientific grounds, and that he was not told what those grounds were. I have already explained why the expert panel felt that it could not support his proposals. Perhaps my officials could have been more explicit; however, confidential commercial matters were involved, and they were at the time seeking to meet Dr. Sincock to explain the position face to face.

I also ackowledge that Dr. Sincock was originally told that his application would be considered at a meeting in November, as that was the intention at the time. However, as I have explained, 12 other applications were received, and it seems to me that it was more sensible in those circumstances to look at them all together. The panel of independent experts was set up, and that caused a delay in responding to Dr. Sincock's application. That was perhaps unfortunate, but as the total applications amounted to some £1·5 million and the available funds were limited, it was obviously important to select those likely to produce the best results. That could not be done on a piecemeal basis.

I should perhaps make it clear that our officials strongly dispute the suggestion that Dr. Sincock was told that his work was of low priority. He was, I understand, told that the external referees to whom his original application was referred had some reservations about his proposal, which had received only cautious support, and he was asked to amend it in the light of their comments. He has been assured—I re-emphasise this—that the whole subject of cervical cancer is of high priority within the Department, and that any new methods that could improve the laboratory diagnosis are, and will continue to be, carefully and seriously considered.

My hon. Friend suggested that we might, even at this stage, finance Quest for a Test's work, despite the background which he has covered from his perspective, and which I have covered from the perspective available to me from the Department. I hope that I have explained that we have considered the application very carefully, as has the independent expert panel convened specially for the purpose, and given the reasons why funding has not been provided. With regret, I do not see that what my hon. Friend has said provides a basis for changing that decision. I do not wish to raise false hopes, although in view of my hon. Friend's final remarks I am willing to say that I will have a further look at the matter. That is said with no commitment, and without seeking to raise expectations, which might prove false, of finding any alternative way round the difficult position that he has described.

The House may be interested to know something about the projects that the chief scientist's expert group considerd as suitable for funding by the DHSS. One was a monolayering machine. The Department had already helped to fund the development of a prototype of that machine, which is now ready for field trials. It prepares a single layer of cells from cervical smear material that can then be screened by an automatic image analyser. That machine is crucial to the development of the other project that has been regarded as suitable for DHSS support. That machine is called "Cytoscan", which is being developed for automatic pre-screening of cervical smears and is intended to scan the single layer slides.

I mention that, even at the expense of including some scientific jargon, to make it clear to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow and to Quest For a Test for Cancer that there is no question of the Department not being willing, when the advice suggests that it is the right course, to find support for particular proposals designed to improve cervical cancer screening. We are firmly committed to that. We are not, at present, pursuaded that we should act in the way in which my hon. Friend urged in the latter part of his remarks. However, I shall have a further look at the matter in the spirit in which I have sought to respond to my hon. Friend.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-five minutes past Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Safety Standards

1. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on safety standards in the aviation, railway and shipping industries; and if he will institute an inquiry into the safety aspects of public passenger transport.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Paul Channon): I regard safety as an overriding priority. Safety standards in the railway and shipping industries are the subject of continuous review by my Department. Safety in civil aviation is a matter for the Civil Aviation Authority. I see no need for a special inquiry.

Mr. Morgan: Does the Secretary of State agree that the public are demanding a thorough look at the way in which the pressure of continual competition is prejudicing public safety, particularly following the revelations in the Daily Mirror on Friday that only nine months after the original disaster another P and O ferry sailed with its bow doors open, precisely because of the pressure to make up time? That caused the original disaster, which was the worst, apart from the Titanic, in British maritime peacetime history. In the light of that revelation, does the Secretary of State agree that he must now look at this whole question? The public are demanding that he sets up a proper commission of inquiry.

Mr. Channon: I am conducting an inquiry into that important allegation, as is P and O. The hon. Gentleman rather overstates the matter when he says that the vessel put to sea. As I understand it, the ferry was moved from one berth to another inside the harbour.

Mr. Wilkinson: As aircraft cabin fires are by far the largest cause of death in otherwise survivable air accidents, has the CAA reported to my right hon. Friend on its assessment of the effectiveness of cabin sprinkler systems, which offer the best chance of saving life?

Mr. Channon: Water sprinkler systems are under investigation and tests have recently been carried out by the CAA. My hon. Friend raises an important matter and one on which I hope progress can be made.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Secretary of State also look into the fact that on 10 May 1988 the Pride of Bruges ferry did not have sufficient crew on board with the proper marine evacuation certificates and had to use its catering staff to make up the number?

Mr. Channon: The Pride of Bruges must have had the right number of crew on board with sufficient qualifications, or my surveyors would not have allowed it to sail.

Dr. Michael Clark: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the increasing public anxiety about the number of near misses in the airways over the United Kingdom? Is he sure that air traffic controllers are properly trained? Does he feel that there should be more of them, or that different systems should be used to ensure the safety of our skies?

Mr. Channon: I disagree with my hon. Friend's analysis. If he looks at the figures he will see that the number of air misses is decreasing, not increasing, and that is an important point to bear in mind. The training of air traffic controllers is for the CAA, and the Select Committee on Transport is undertaking a full investigation of this and all relevant matters. Obviously, we shall wish to see what its report says. I have no evidence to suggest that the training of air traffic controllers is in any way inadequate.

Mr. Robert Hughes: It seems that almost everyone in the House and elsewhere is worried about ferry safety, except the Secretary of State, who is strangely reticent from time to time. Will he advise the House whether his Department sent a confidential report to the International Maritime Organisation? If so, will he publish it? Has he seen the other reports from an institute in Bradford about ferry safety and fatigue? Does he realise that the matter will get worse with commercial pressures, not better?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman's opening remarks were most unreasonable. He knows perfectly well that since I have been Secretary of State for Transport we have taken more measures on ferry safety than were taken in perhaps the previous generation. I resent and repudiate what he said on that score.

We have taken international action with the IMO to ensure that foreign and British ships coming into our ports are safe, and we are conducting a programme of research into all these matters and the allegations that have been made. It is regrettable that many Opposition Members make vague allegations, rather than specific ones, and never send us any evidence.

British Rail

3. Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Rail; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

18. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet the chairman of British Rail; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

Mr. Channon: I shall be meeting the chairman on 24 May to discuss matters of current interest.

Mr. Anderson: Is the Secretary of State aware of the conclusions of the "Better Rail" report published in March by National Economic Research Associates? Will he ensure that he discusses the findings of that report with the chairman, and will he commend the initiative of the rail unions, which led to this report on punctuality and other matters that are vital to rail users? Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the findings of that report are injected into the current studies of rail services in London and the south-east?

Mr. Channon: There have been several recent reports, and the one to which the hon. Gentleman refers was one in which the National Union of Railwaymen played a prominent part. I look forward to discussing the report with the union in early June, and I shall certainly discuss it with the chairman of British Rail. The Government and British Rail share a common objective—better quality of service on the railways.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Secretary of State give an undertaking to the chairman of British Rail that he will encourage inland customs clearance depots when the Channel tunnel is built so that freight traffic from the north can be customs-cleared in the area where it is manufactured and need not be trans-shipped at some point in the south-east?

Mr. Channon: I shall certainly discuss that subject with the chairman of British Rail. I am anxious that the benefits of the Channel tunnel should be felt in the north and in areas other than the south-east. Indeed, I am awaiting a special report by British Rail on rail links for the Channel tunnel. I hope to have it within the next month.

Mr. Soames: When my right hon. Friend next meets the chairman of British Rail, will he ask him to institute an inquiry into the way in which British Rail makes such arbitrary changes to its timetables? Is he aware that in Balcombe in my constituency, where many people bought houses because of the ease of commuting to London, several timetable changes have greatly inconvenienced rail users?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend will appreciate that timetabling is entirely a matter for British Rail, but I shall draw the chairman's attention to that matter when I see him.

Mr. Raffan: To return to the point made by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), is my right hon. Friend aware of the serious concern in Wales about the fact that neither mid Wales nor the south of the Principality will benefit fully from the Channel tunnel unless there is a significant upgrading of the track from the south coast? This is an urgent matter. Will he do his utmost to bring pressure on British Rail to respond fully to the feelings in Wales and in the north, which it does not appear to do at present?

Mr. Channon: That is a little unfair. My hon. Friend knows that I am expecting a report from British Rail next month. I shall study it with interest and bear in mind what he said.

Mr. Cartwright: Will the British Rail report on improving access to the Channel tunnel from the north and the midlands include provision for a new rail crossing of the Thames to the east of London in view of the necessity for such a facility to improve access to the Channel tunnel?

Mr. Channon: It is difficult for me to say what is in the report when I have not seen it.

Mr. Tredinnick: When my right hon. Friend meets the chairman of British Rail, will he mention the Rugby road railway bridge at Hinckley in my constituency, which is causing great anxiety? British Rail proposes to raise it by only a few millimetres, yet it is the unanimous opinion of the district council that it should be raised by much more. Will my right hon. Friend consider the matter?

Mr. Channon: I shall ask the chairman of British Rail to look into that important matter.

Mr. Snape: Does the Secretary of State accept that there is widespread anxiety on both sides of the House about British Rail's future investment proposals in the light of the Channel tunnel? Without wishing to be castigated for being unduly alarmist, may I ask the Secretary of State to accept that projects in connection with the Channel tunnel should be outside the normal, strictly laid down investment criteria for British Rail——

Mr. Forth: Why?

Mr. Snape: Because even the most Neanderthal Conservative Back-Bench Member should appreciate that the true potential for the railways of the Channel tunnel will not be realised unless those facilities are in place before the tunnel opens.

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that the Government will support any worthwhile investment proposals that have a sound prospect of improving railway finances. I shall look at British Rail's proposals in that light. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman should get too depressed, because we have not yet seen the report, let alone decided whether to accept it.

Emergency Exercise (Solent)

4. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the last major emergency exercise took place in the Solent.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): The last major emergency exercise was conducted on 6 November 1986.

Mr. Field: My hon. Friend will be aware of the considerable expertise gained by the land-based emergency services from the major exercises involving road, rail and air incidents. I understand that my hon. Friend's attention has been drawn to the fact that a large ship recently lost its main propulsion engines while manouevring in the Solent. Given the problems of real-time exercises involving large ships, will he mount an exercise to give the emergency services the necessary expertise to deal with a large-scale emergency?

Mr. Mitchell: There is a major joint emergency plan for the Southampton, Portsmouth and Isle of Wight area known as Solfire. It is well prepared—it was updated in February—it is exercised from time to time and it will be exercised again in October 1988. It falls under the command of the harbour master and I have every confidence in it.

Mr. Colvin: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to congratulate Bristow Helicopters on tendering successfully for the air-sea rescue services for that area? Will he confirm that those services will be as good as, if not better than, those previously supplied by the Ministry of Defence? When are those services likely to come into operation?

Mr. Mitchell: The new service, operated by Bristow Helicopters, will be better equipped for night and all-weather flying than ever before. I am happy to announce that the new civil search-and rescue helicopter took up its post at 8 pm last night and was in operation at 11.06 this morning, when it was scrambled to pick up a sailor from HMS Newcastle who had suspected appendicitis.

Taxi Drivers (Proficency Test)

5. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from Basildon seeking the introduction of a higher standard of driving proficiency test for taxi drivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: None that I am aware of.

Mr. Amess: Will my hon. Friend recognise that some of my constituents not only feel that the present test is inadequate but are fed up with having to travel over 15 miles to the nearest test centre? Will he accept that the present test does not teach taxi drivers how to defend themselves against the increasing number of incidents of violence against the person? As two taxi drivers have recently been murdered and one seriously assaulted in Essex, will he please introduce an emergency service for taxi drivers?

Mr. Mitchell: Basildon is not a typical place, and we like to have typical places for driving test centres. It has an extensive one-way system, wide open junctions, well-planned roundabouts, few traffic lights and a pedestrianised town centre. There are four alternative test centres within 13 miles. My hon. Friend had an Adjournment debate on the safety of taxi drivers on 15 February. I announced an extension to allow taxi drivers to be represented on the standing panel on assaults on bus crews. It met on 5 May, and I much regret that taxi drivers were not represented.

Bus Deregulation

6. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest assessment of the effect of deregulation of buses under the Transport Act 1985 on the introduction of minibuses.

Mr. David Mitchell: There were about 40 places served by minibuses prior to the enactment of the Transport Act 1985, involving 400 vehicles. By the end of 1987 a further 5,200 minibuses were serving an additional 350 places. It can therefore be seen that the end of over-intensive regulation and local monopoly has brought visible benefits to the users of bus services.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply, which will be welcomed by all hon. Members. As to the term "minibus" in its wider sense—by that I mean anything up to 25 seats; some people refer to them as midibuses—will he comment on the obvious uses for such buses in rural areas and the benefits of having smaller vehicles operating within and linking council estates? We are experiencing an enormous growth in urban areas in this sector.

Mr. Mitchell: As operators must satisfy customers, rather than have an automatic monopoly, they are finding many innovative ways of doing so, and my hon. Friend drew attention to one of them—the operation of varying sizes of smaller buses, including midibuses, which operate on estates and call much closer to people's homes. They are much valued by the users.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Does the Minister accept that the whole industry believes that the boom in minibuses is over and is going back to double-deckers? If public transport is so good following deregulation, why has the first independent survey concluded that the number of passengers carried has fallen by between 10 and 12·5 per cent. in metropolitan areas, which means a loss of 185 million journeys per year? Does that not show the failure of deregulation?

Mr. Mitchell: As the hon. Gentleman well knows, that decrease is associated with the reduction in the subsidising of fares in the metropolitan areas. As for his allegation that the growth in minibus use is tailing off, I must tell him that, if anything, interest seems to be growing. For instance, I am pleased to note that a new operator—Merry Hill Minibuses Limited—has started work in the Birmingham area.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Does my hon. Friend agree that, like the deregulation of coaches in 1980, the deregulation of local bus services has brought benefits to the public which outweigh the previous restrictive system in terms of more routes for passengers, greater flexibility, more jobs for people in the bus industry and more buses being built in this country?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has hit the nail neatly on the head and I thank him for doing so.

City Commuter Services Group

7. Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received the report of the City Commuter Services Group; if he will discuss it with the chairman of British Rail; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Yes, Sir. My right hon. Friend has had several discussions with the chairman of British Rail about the need for new rail investment in London and the steps that British Rail is taking to improve reliability and quality.

Dr. Marek: If the Minister does not believe what he has been told by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, the National Union of Railwaymen and the Transport Users Consultative Committee about the state of the railways in the south-east, will he believe his friends in the City? Will he give a categorical assurance that when the Channel tunnel opens and international trains come to London, City commuters will in no way be inconvenienced by the extra traffic?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman has asked two questions. I recognise that in much of Network SouthEast the quality is not as good as it should be, although on many lines it is very good indeed and up to continental standards, and I pay tribute to the staff for what they are achieving. I shall shortly be meeting the director of the south-east sector to see what can be done about the laggard lines. Very substantial investment is taking place in new rolling stock, signalling and track improvements designed to deal with the problems.

As for City commuters and Channel tunnel trains, I am expecting from British Rail early next month a report looking into that aspect over the next decade.

Mr. Simon Coombs: What discusions has my hon. Friend had with the chairman of British Rail about the principles of park and ride schemes? At the next meeting, will he raise with the chairman the social value of such schemes to medium-sized towns such as Swindon in trying to supplement the existing public transport infrastructure in those areas?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend makes a valuable and useful point. Park and ride schemes have not only social advantages but substantial commercial advantags. British Rail is alive to that and is looking for suitable sites. I am sure that if my hon. Friend has one in mind he will write to the chairman of British Rail.

Mr. Foulkes: Has the Minister seen the proposal to use alternative rail routes around London—through the midlands of England and over Settle and Carlisle, on which I understand he is to comment later, and up to the Kilmarnock line—as ideal routes for Channel tunnel traffic? Is he seriously considering that proposal? If so, will he consider siting one of the customs clearance depots at Kilmarnock, which is an ideal centre for the whole of the west of Scotland?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman may rest assured that British Rail is currently studing carefully the pattern of freight movement and where it will be brought together in all regions of the country. British Rail will be reporting on that in due course, and when it does I shall bear in mind the attractions of Kilmarnock. I shall be in Scotland later this week and will take the opportunity to discuss the matter with ScotRail.

Mr. Jack: In addition to discussing matters concerning London, will my hon. Friend find time to convey to British Rail the thanks of those of us in the north-west for the improved timetable, the increased investment in traction units and the improved track maintenance facilities that are benefiting services on the west coast main line? Will he also take time to ask the chairman of British Rail to take into account the needs of tourism in the north-west in planning his future train capacity?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall be happy to draw the chairman's attention to those points, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for recognising British Rail's considerable efforts to improve the time-keeping and efficiency of the west coast main line, the benefits of which are now beginning to appear.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Will the Minister also discuss with the chairman the restoration of local railway facilities, which can be beneficial commercially and environmentally? Does he appreciate that many local authorities would like to go ahead with various schemes but are prevented from doing so by the Government's control of the purse strings?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman knows that British Rail has opened 50 new stations in recent years—including a number in Wales. If he knows of any commercially beneficial services that could be run but are not being run, perhaps he will let British Rail know, as it is always on the lookout for commercially viable opportunities.

Road Maintenance Contracts

10. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further measures his Department is taking to ensure better value for money in its awarding of contracts for road maintenance.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): New regulations have been made requiring more works to be put out to competitive tender. We are also extending lane rental contracts to a wider range of works. Better design standards should ensure that roads last longer.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that helpful answer. On behalf of all M1 users, may I ask what he does to balance the concepts of value for money on the one hand and the time taken to effect repairs and maintenance on the other? For example, is there any possibility of doing more repairs at night to try to minimise the disruption caused on the M1—and no doubt by future repairs on other motorways?

Mr. Bottomley: We try to use the value of motorists' time as an incentive to those doing the work to complete it more rapidly. Lane rental has led to a 30 to 40 per cent. speeding up of the road works on the M1. I look forward to the day when we have caught up with the backlog that we inherited from the last Labour Government, and I hope that we never get such a backlog or such a Government again.

Mr. Crowther: What steps does the Minister take to penalise contractors who close lanes for unnecessarily long periods? Does he appreciate the frustration caused to drivers—as well as the losses to companies—when cars, buses and lorries are held up by the thousand for an hour or more by the closure of a lane in which there is no sign of any work taking place?

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman has correctly analysed the whole purpose of the lane rental scheme. However, many of those who use our roads need to realise that with 120,000 vehicles a day passing through some contraflows it takes only one person to make a mistake for people to get killed. I pay tribute to the motorway maintenance people, who do much dangerous work while the rest of us scoot past pretending that they are not there.

Mr. John. M. Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to get value for money from maintenance is to build motorways properly in the first place; for example by making the Oxford to Birmingham section of the M40 three lanes all the way?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend will want to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for ensuring that motorways are now built to last for 40 years without serious work, as opposed to the 20-year period that we inherited from the last Labour Government.

London Underground (Safety)

11. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the board of London Regional Transport to discuss safety standards on London Underground.

Mr. Channon: I met the chairman and managing director of London Underground Limited on 18 April, when he briefed me on the action the Underground is taking following the fire at King's Cross.

Mr. Cohen: The Secretary of State will have seen London Underground's "103 points for greater safety". While that contains many good points—begging the question why they were not implemented before—it leaves many problems unsolved. For example, instead of messing around trying to service wooden escalators, should not London Underground replace them, and should not the staff reductions that have made the Underground more dirty and dangerous be reversed immediately? Will the Minister answer the safety points and put up all the money to make the improvements to which I have referred?

Mr. Channon: I am anxious that the Underground should be safe and be seen to be safe. I welcome the 103 suggestions made by London Underground Ltd., covering removal of wooden cladding from escalators, installation of fire-resistant materials in stations and a host of other matters of which the House will be aware. I support what London Underground is doing. There is a question about staffing on the Order Paper, so I shall leave that matter. There is no question of expenditure being a constraint on the Underground carrying out its work. Safety is a top priority.

Mr. Dykes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that we must be grateful to The Evening Standard for yet again, today and last week, highlighting the dangers revealed in the King's Cross inquiry concerning the regrettable inadequacy and old-fashioned nature of some of the fire prevention equipment on Underground stations, including those in the open air, which can be a greater fire hazard than we often imagine? The existence of a few dilapidated sand buckets at stations is no substitute for ensuring that there is proper fire prevention equipment at frequent intervals. Notwithstanding LRT's direct responsibility in these matters, will my right hon. Friend have further discussions with LRT on this important issue?

Mr. Channon: I am in continuous touch with LRT on this matter. There is to be a new post of senior fire officer in LUL. His first duty is to review the fire equipment and procedures. Under the present rules there is a daily check to ensure that there are extinguishers in each carriage, a fortnightly check by engineering staff and a full annual overhaul. I shall certainly draw London Underground's attention to my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to confirm, or deny, that of the 103 points in the action plan none concerned a recommendation made to London Underground before the King's Cross fire and none was prevented from being implemented because of lack of finance?

Mr. Channon: I made it clear that LRT had taken action on several matters in advance of the investigation, including those that I have raised. There is no question of the inquiry making recommendations yet. We shall have to see what recommendations to improve safety emerge from the King's Cross investigation. The House will want to take that matter extremely seriously. In the 12 years before the King's Cross fire there was only one accident involving a passenger fatality in some 35 billion passenger miles travelled. London Underground's safety record should be studied in its entirety.

King's Cross Fire (Inquiry)

12. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost to public funds so far of the inquiry into the King's Cross fire.

Mr. David Mitchell: The cost to my Department has so far been £498,000. In addition, the Treasury Solicitor is responsible for payment of fees to counsel for the investigation.

Mr. Banks: Why did the Secretary of State, through the Treasury Solicitor, refuse to cover the legal costs of the Association of London Authorities, which wished to give evidence to the inquiry? Was it because the ALA intended to raise some serious matters about safety and the Government's position in terms of the investment requirements that they impose on London Regional Transport? While the hon. Gentleman is considering the response to that part of the question, will he tell the House whether the Secretary of State intends to insist on a 7 per cent. return on capital investment from LRT—which effectively rules out many investment schemes with a direct safety aspect—or does he make a capital return calculation on dead bodies?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman must be well aware that those offensive remarks are wholly unjustified. I emphatically reject any suggestion that any question that should have been asked has not been asked. No one who has followed these matters can conceivably accuse counsel for the inquiry of having used kid gloves. In any case, the inspectors said that, on the evidence so far, the presence of the ALA has been of marginal assistance to the investigation. It did not appear to us, therefore, that it was warranted to incur those charges on the public purse.

London Underground (Staffing)

13. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has discussed with the chairman of London Regional Transport the programme of cuts in station staff now being implemented on the London Underground; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. It is for the boards of London Regional Transport and London Underground Ltd. to decide staffing arrangements in the light of LRT's statutory duty to have due regard to efficiency, economy and safety of operation.

Ms. Ruddock: I thank the Minister for that reply. He must be aware that substantial staff cuts have occurred since the King's Cross fire disaster and that London Underground is embarking on a scheme whereby staff numbers will be reduced by one third by the 1990s. Does the Minister agree that he must be concerned about such matters? Surely the safety of the travelling public depends on staff in uniforms, rather than on machines on walls.

Mr. Mitchell: When we introduce new technology and modern working practices, we often do not need as many staff as there were before. Indeed, that is much of the justification for investment of that sort. Moreover, when new ticketing machines are introduced, fewer ticket-selling staff are needed. That has nothing to do with the safety of the Underground's operations. More effective use of staff, and ensuring that they are available to help the travelling public, are more important ways forward, and LUL is pursuing them.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Will my hon. Friend consider the safety of members of the public at London Underground stations and ascertain whether a member of staff or a member of the police force could constantly be at stations, so that the public, particularly the elderly and the young, would always he protected from violence?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes. Indeed, we have already given London Underground Ltd. £15 million for crime fighting. As a result of the activities that it has been pursuing, particularly in respect of alternative ways of policing the southern end of the Northern line, there has been a 25 per cent. reduction in muggings. I am sure that the House will welcome that.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister said that it is the duty of London Regional Transport to conduct its operations with due regard to economy and safety. Is it not a fact that there has been too much regard for economy and too little regard for safety, particularly in respect of personnel on station platforms, and, conceivably, deep-level tube crews? With the new financial objectives that the Secretary of State will give LRT after the King's Cross inquiry, will the Minister pay much more attention to balancing safety with economy, without prejudice to the latter?

Mr. Mitchell: I can only say that London Underground Ltd. and LRT have a statutory duty to have regard to safety. Nothing that we do will in any way damage or inhibit that——

Mr. Spearing: The Minister has done so already.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister has cut the subsidy.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong if he is implying that the Government have in any way denied London Underground Ltd. the resources that it needs to fulfil its statutory duty in regard to safety.

Railway Safety

14. Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss improvements in railway safety in the light of the report by the railways inspecting officer on the Colwich junction collision in September 1986.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, Sir. The British Railways Board will be formally reporting to the Secretary of State on all aspects of the report in the near future.

Mr. Snape: It must be a matter of some concern that the passion for economy that pervades British Rail management can lead to a reduction in the number of locomotive inspectors who are available to travel on west coast main line trains. Is it not a worrying aspect of modern technology that a train travelling a few yards past a red signal can come into head-on collision with a train travelling at 100 mph? Is it not a tribute to the skills of those who work in British Rail Engineering Ltd. that, despite the severity of the accident described in the report, not a single passenger lost his or her life?

Mr. Mitchell: I join the hon. Gentleman in paying full tribute to British Rail's improved standards in the rolling stock that it is manufacturing these days, compared with the designs of some years ago. Indeed, that is and should be a matter of some considerable pride to the railway supply industry. On the hon. Gentleman's point about locomotive inspectors, I am informed that the ratio of drivers to inspectors is lower in recent years, and, thus, efficiency of supervision has improved.

Mr. Wigley: When the Minister is discussing improvements in safety with the chairman of British Rail, will he ensure that some attention is given to the worries expressed on the Cambrian coast line about open and unmanned crossings, in view of the number of accidents that have occurred? Will he impress upon the chairman of BR the need to take into consideration not only railway matters but the feelings of local communities when such problems arise?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman will know that there are clear rules as to what form of level crossing is appropriate, and in which circumstances. Those rules have recently been revised in light of the Stott inquiry. I am also conscious of the fact that it is incumbent on BR to explain what it is doing to the people in the vicinity where change is proposed, because whenever change comes there is fear. I am satisfied that the arrangements are perfectly safe, but I am certain that the hon. Gentleman is right to want BR to explain that to the local people.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Court

56. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Attorney-General what further representations the Lord Chancellor has received seeking the establishment of a family court; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The Lord Chancellor continues to receive representations from both hon. Members and others, and the Government are actively working on the issues comprehended by the concept of a family court. High priority is being given to the rationalisation of the law relating to the care and upbringing of children, which is an essential precursor to any reform of court structures.

Mrs. Bottomley: Bearing in mind that it is 16 years since Finer first raised its report, and recognising the Lord Chancellor's commitment to the rationalisation of family and child law, is my hon. and learned Friend aware that this is a necessary first step, not a final one? So long as many family cases are heard in courts that primarily exist for criminal purposes there is little likelihood of proper justice being done in such cases. When does the Lord Chancellor envisage responding officially to his own consultation document, to which many have made representations?

The Solicitor-General: I well understand the point that my hon. Friend is making. A response will be forthcoming. Some of the answers are to be found in the White Paper of January 1987. Once we have the rationalisation of the law well in train, we hope to come forward with a formal response, as my hon. Friend has requested.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is the Solicitor-General aware that the profession that is generally most opposed to change, the legal profession, is virtually unanimous in the belief that a family court system is urgently required? Immediate attention should be given to the dual jurisdiction of magistrates' courts and to the hostility that county court matrimonial proceedings inevitably engender because of the adversarial system that is still retained in those proceedings.

The Solicitor-General: Yes. The rationalisation of the law will provide a helpful first step in the process, and then we can look to the court structures. When the hon. and learned Gentleman refers to unanimity within the legal profession, he may refer to unanimity over the belief that something should be done, but there is less unanimity within that profession about what should be done.

Mr. Sims: If it is the view of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor that changes in child care legislation should precede rather than follow changes to set up a family court, may we have an assurance that such changes, particularly legislation on child care, will form an essential part of the Queen's Speech later this year?

The Solicitor-General: I can say that they will be given high priority.

Prosecution Policy (Car Drivers)

57. Mr. Allen: To ask the Attorney-General what representations he has had on prosecution policy relating to deaths caused by car drivers; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Representations have been made to me by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and on behalf of the campaign against drinking and driving.

Mr. Allen: I thank the Attorney-General for that reply, and I also thank his staff for the sympathetic way in which they have handled the case with which, as the Attorney-General is aware, I am involved. Is he aware that there is a great legislative gap between death caused by reckless driving and driving without due care and attention? Is he also aware that the North committee on road traffic laws has reported to the Government on that omission? When does he believe that the Government will bring forward proposals to fill that gap, so that tragedies such as that which befell my constitutents, whose small daughter was killed by careless driving, may be remedied?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful for what the hon. Gentleman has said. I express my thanks to him for the whole tenor of his approach to this sensitive and difficult matter, which causes much sadness and distress to the relatives of people killed in road accidents. The hon. Gentleman rightly identifies the difference between reckless and careless driving. He knows that an offence of causing death by driving is an offence only where recklessness can be shown. He knows also that the prosecution service must be satisfied that there is a proper case.

The hon. Gentleman refers to the recommendation of the North committee that there should be an offence of causing death by bad driving while under the influence of alcohol. He will know that the decision to introduce that is for my right hon. Friends, not for me, but they will heed what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the depth of feeling that exists, not only in families, but in constituencies countrywide, about the small sentences of fines and totting-up points imposed upon people who while under the influence of drink, have killed ordinary citizens. The depth of feeling is strong and the Government will have to do something about it. Is my right hon. and learned Friend satisfied that the Crown Prosecution Service is accepting fewer pleas of guilty to careless driving in such circumstances? Is he satisfied also that the North recommendation to uprate charges from careless driving to reckless driving in such a situation will be adequate to satisfy public demand?

The Attorney-General: I understand the depth of feeling that there is in the country, and I have said what I think I can sensibly say about the recommendation of the North committee. The judiciary must be responsible for deciding what penalties it shall impose out of the range that is made available by Parliament. However, my hon. and learned Friend will remember the guidelines laid down by the Lord Chief Justice regarding death caused through driving. I believe that sooner or later we shall arrive at a scale and practice that will meet the proper anxieties of all our constituents.

Mr. Fraser: Is the Attorney-General aware that a prosecution can pass without the family of the victim knowing what has happened? I have come across cases where the trial has been taking place on a plea of guilty without the family knowing about it. Will he ensure that the families of victims receive more consideration? When it is a borderline matter of whether to prosecute for careless driving or causing death by reckless driving, although the decision must rest with the prosecuting authorities, will they consult the families of the victims before coming to a conclusion?

The Attorney-General: I recognise what the hon. Gentleman has said. Of course, primarily it is the responsibility of the police to notify the families of victims of the outcome of prosecuting decisions and of cases. The Director of Public Prosecutions is alive to the need to treat this issue sensitively. Accordingly, local offices of the CPS will, on request, inform relatives of victims of the basis on which a decision was taken. The CPS is prepared also to offer the opportunity of a meeting with a senior member of the CPS staff. I cannot agree with the suggestion that the question whether to prosecute should rest with the opinion of the relatives.

Extradition (Irish Republic)

58. Sir John Biggs-Davison: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on progress on extradition arrangements with the Irish Republic.

The Attorney-General: The Attorney-General for the Republic of Ireland and I had positive discussions in Dublin on 10 May. We discussed the basis upon which extradition from the Republic of Ireland to the United Kingdom of suspected offenders can be undertaken in the light of changes now effected by the Republic's legislation. We have now reached a clear mutual understanding in respect of matters of concern and we confidently hope that in all proper cases extradition will now take place, in conformity with the new Irish legislation.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Does my right hon. and learned Friend say that the Irish Republic is no longer treating the United Kingdom as the least-favoured nation for this purpose? Is not one of the consequences of the Anglo-Irish Agreement that undue pressure is constantly being put upon Her Majesty's Government, without any obligation to make concessions on the other side? Is it not time that the Agreement was replaced by an equal treaty?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend will allow me to comment that questions as to the merits of the agreement go rather wide of the original question. The British Government resisted the proposal to pass the new legislation, but it is now in place. Accordingly, we must recognise that any request for extradition from the Republic, if it is to succeed, must conform with the requirements which the Irish law imposes upon the Irish Attorney. It is in that regard that we had the discussions to which I referred, and it is in that context that we mutually hope, with confidence, that, in proper cases, extradition will now take place.

Mr. Winnick: Does not that understanding or agreement with Dublin give the lie to all those on the Government Benches who have argued that Dublin is not interested in reaching agreement on extraditing to Britain those who are suspected or accused of terrorism? Is it not a fact that there is now a serious responsibility on the Attorney-General himself, whatever views he may have of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, to make sure that the agreement on extradition works?

The Attorney-General: All of us want to see that there is no hiding place for guilty offenders in either of our countries. I do not believe that it is fruitful to harp upon unhappy differences in the past, even in the recent past. We now have to see how we can best co-operate to ensure that, in conformity with our own legislation, guilty or properly suspected offenders are extradited to face justice.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Official Aid

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of gross national product was provided as official development assistance in 1987; and if he will make a statement about his policy on progress towards attaining the United Nations 0·7 per cent. of gross national product target in 1988-89.

Miss Joan Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of gross national product was provided as official development assistance in 1987; and if he will make a statement about the Government's policy on progress towards attaining the United Nations 0·7 per cent. of gross national product target in 1988-89.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Chris Patten): We do not yet have the figure for 1987.

As to the attainment of the 0·7 per cent. United Nations target, I can only say that, like previous Administrations, the Government are not able to set a date for achieving this. But, as the House will know, the aid programme is now growing in real terms and its quality is high.

Ms. Mowlam: Can the Minister explain how he knows that the aid programme is now growing in real terms if, as he told us at the beginning of his answer, the figures are not available? Can he tell us why there is that delay? Surely he has the figures for the aid budget and for the GNP, and surely he can add the two together. Does the Minister have something to hide?

Mr. Patten: First, I am afraid that, in her engaging supplementary question, the hon. Lady was making confusion. We know the public expenditure figures, which have already been published. They show that our overseas aid programme is growing in real terms. To establish what proportion of GNP was represented by aid last year we have to take, first, the growth figures for last year and, secondly, the figures for official development assistance, which we announce to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. We shall do that, as usual, at the beginning of June. Because of the record growth rate last year, I would expect that the percentage figure for this year to be lower, even though the aid programme is growing in real terms.

Miss Lestor: May I equally engage the Minister in further deliberation on this matter? First, the figures were published in April and early May in the past. I am a little perturbed about the delay in publication. Is it because the revised figure that he gave last week in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) showed that the proportion given previously for last year had fallen rather than risen? Secondly, as the Minister has already announced the figures for the SADCC countries for 1987, is it not unbelievable that he is unable to do the arithmetic to which he has already referred and give us the figure that we are all seeking, so that we can begin to see what progress, if any, we are making towards the United Nations' target?

Mr. Patten: I think I am right in saying that the hon. Lady is confusing the 1986 figure to which my hon. Friend referred in a reply to the House last week and the 1987 figure, which, as has been customary, will be provided for the OECD in early summer—in this case, in early June. I repeat what I said earlier to the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam)—perhaps the hon. Lady did not hear what I said—that I expect the figure to be lower for 1987 because the economic growth rate was 4·5 per cent. I imagine—this is one of the perverse consequences of using the percentage of GNP—that if the Labour party were in Government the economic growth rate would be lower and therefore, without changing our aid programme, the proportion of GNP taken by aid would be higher.

Mr. Lester: Does my hon. Friend, as one who, by voice and vote, has continued to press for an increase in the overseas development budget, agree that when it comes to our principal policy of aiding the poorest people in the poorest countries, what is important is not always cash resources, but human resources—people who will work in those areas to achieve the change that we desire?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right. That is why I am pleased that we have made yet a further increase in the grant for the Voluntary Service Overseas and other organisations which send young and not so young volunteers to work in other countries. I should also draw attention to the fact that the last review by the OECD commended the quality of the British aid programme, and particularly the fact that we provide more aid to poorer countries than do most other OECD members.

Mr. Wells: Surely it is more important to target our aid so that it increases the value given to each country than to chase after a mythical United Nations figure of 0·7 per cent. Is it not the quality of the aid projects and what they achieve that is important, rather than a simple statistic? Is it not time to think of reversing the decline over the past 15 years in real terms of our aid programme in the Caribbean?

Mr. Patten: I wondered where that question was going to finish up, and I was not surprised when it was the Caribbean. It is extremely important that we have a good quality aid programme in the Caribbean. It is also important to provide Caribbean countries with the trade opportunities that they need—for example, for bananas and sugar. I was arguing that in a meeting between the ACP and EEC countries only last week. As to targets, my hon. Friend knows that we shall have exceeded the UN target for official and private flows in every year except one since 1979. Our total private investment in developing countries is almost as great as that of the rest of the European Community put together.

Ms. Armstrong: Is the Minister aware that this week marks Christian Aid week, when millions of British people will be reaffirming their commitment to development and growth in the developing world? Is he further aware that many are looking to the Government to exhibit a similar commitment to increasing opportunities in the Third world? Will the Government make an announcement this week which will support and encourage this voluntary giving?

Mr. Patten: I am happy to tell those people that this year the British Government will be spending £70 million more through our aid programme than last year and that in 1990-91 we shall be spending £115 million more than we are this year. I also refer those people to the extremely important initiatives that we have taken in the context of African debt.

Text books for Africa Project

67. Mr. Rhodes James: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Textbooks for Africa project.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Textbooks for Africa project aims to make available surplus O-level textbooks from Britain for secondary schools in Africa where they can be used to good effect. The project is being run by the British Council, the Ranfurly library service and Rotary International. I have agreed to provide up to £75,000 this year to the Ranfurly library service to help with the work load involved.

Mr. Rhodes James: Is my hon. Friend aware that this project has caught the imagination of a considerable number of people, incuding many of my constituents, who want to make a personal and private contribution to assisting education in Anglophone Africa? It is a project that fully deserves his support, for which we are grateful. I hope that, eventually, it will not be limited to Africa. Is there not an enormous potential in this idea, involving Churches, schools, local authorities, higher education, private individuals and Her Majesty's Government? Will my hon. Friend give a commitment that he will continue to give it his full support?

Mr. Patten: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for those remarks. I assure him that we shall continue to give this important project our full support. I have written to the local education authorities and to bodies representing independent schools. I am delighted that the response has been very encouraging. For example, we have heard from 44 local education authorities so far, and 41 have agreed to contribute books to the scheme.

Sub-Saharan Africa

69. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received regarding aid to sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have frequent discussions with representatives of sub-Saharan African countries. It is the subject of a large proportion of my mail bag.

Mr. Yeo: Despite the fact that Japan has significantly increased its aid budget, does my hon. Friend share my view that not enough Japanese aid goes to sub-Saharan Africa?

Mr. Patten: As my hon. Friend says, the Japanese Government have made a welcome increase in their aid programme, a point that Mr. Takeshita made during his visit the other day to the United Kingdom. I think that Japan would like to do more in Africa and I intend, I hope later this year, to go and talk to the Japanese Government about how we can, perhaps, do more with them in sub-Saharan Africa. For example, I should like the Japanese Government to put some of their funds through British non-governmental organisations such as the Save the Children Fund and Oxfam.

Settle-Carlisle Railway

The following questions stood upon the Order Paper:

35. Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects to make a decision on the future of the Settle-Carlisle railway.

54. Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the future of the Settle to Carlisle railway.

3.30 pm

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): The Settle-Carlisle line is about the most impressive example of our Victorian railway heritage. It runs through spectacular scenery and attracts tens of thousands of tourists each year. Many travel long distances simply to ride on it. Only about 20 per cent. of its usage is for local transport needs as opposed to leisure.

Although currently the line makes a substantial annual loss, I believe that it has considerable potential for development as a tourist attraction. This is a specialised activity for which, quite properly, British Rail is not particularly well qualified. It would be more appropriate for the private sector. The Transport Users Consultative Committee investigation has shown that hardship would be caused to a number of local users, but my right hon. Friend's view is that this would be largely met by the provision of guaranteed bus services. Accordingly, my right hon. Friend is minded, on the evidence before him, to consent to British Rail's proposal to cease operations. We have been advised to delay the final decision until the end of November to enable any new evidence to be taken into account. We plan to allow a further four months thereafter before British Rail operations cease, to enable any prospective future operators to complete their arrangements.

In connection with the prospects for a successor operation, British Rail tells me, first, that it is prepared to negotiate a dowry with a suitable private sector operator. Secondly, British Rail will help to end the uncertainty about the cost of restoring the Ribblehead viaduct by undertaking the repair of one of the 24 arches this year. Thirdly, English Heritage has generously offered £1 million towards the viaduct's repair. Fourthly, the local authorities offered to contribute £500,000 while withdrawing their previous annual support of £70,000 a year. Even that offer was hedged with restrictive conditions. Fifthly, a number of public and private bodies are offering support in cash or kind and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall list these in the Official Report. Financial assistance may also be available from the English Tourist Board and the Manpower Services Commission. I am hopeful that this will lead to a new future for the line, and I am ready to make my good offices available to assist in this direction.

Mr. Cryer: Will the Minister accept that his statement will be viewed with massive dismay by all sections of the community, including many Conservative voters? They will be dismayed that the Minister is making such an unimaginative and vicious decision for the people who use the line and the many millions who regard it with very great affection. Will he also accept that this campaign by British Rail was begun with a programme of organised neglect that has led to the present position with the Ribblehead viaduct?

It is appalling that the Government should promise to make money available for a private sector solution when that money is not being made available to the best organisation to run it as part of the national network, namely, British Rail. The restoration and running of an 80-mile line is beyond the resources of a private sector solution. I speak as the founder of the Keighley and Worth Valley light railway back in 1961. This statement will be greeted with extensive dismay, and I regard it as a sad moment for the Settle-Carlisle line when the Minister was brought to the Dispatch Box to make such a heavy-handed and uncaring statement.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman talks about massive dismay at British Rail ceasing to operate and the private sector coming in to run a successor operation. Even in his question just now, the hon. Gentleman added to his long and loud protestations about British Rail's stewardship. I do not see how he can at one and the same time complain about that stewardship and object to our finding specialists in tourism railways. The hon. Gentleman should realise that British Rail's priority is to invest in a modern railway system for the 21st century, not to provide pleasure rides for railway archaeologists.

The hon. Gentleman referred to preserved railways. Let me tell him that the North Yorks Moors railway, with only 18 miles of track, has as big a revenue as British Rail has on the whole of the Settle-Carlisle line—and, moreover, that the Severn railway has as much income as the whole of British Rail's running costs on the line.

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) will join me in welcoming the delayed decision to take the line out of the hands of British Rail, which does not want it and which tries to forget it, and into the hands of private enterprise, which will give it the chance of a viable future oriented towards exploiting its tourist potential.

Does my hon. Friend the Minister agree that a long-term future cannot lie with British Rail, which wants to get rid of the line, but must lie with those who are prepared to update it commercially and make the necessary investment? Will he elaborate on his remark that British Rail is prepared to give a dowry to a successor company? Will he say what support will be available, and guarantee that there will be an active Government campaign to attract money that will lead to a proper privatisation of the railway? Finally, will he ensure that his remarks about the needs of local inhabitants, who are in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border, will be looked after genuinely and with a great deal of understanding?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has made a number of cogent points about better exploitation of the opportunities on the line as a tourist line by those who specialise in that aspect, rather than by British Rail. In answer to his specific question about the dowry that I mentioned—I know that the House is interested in that—British Rail is anxious to cease its own operations on the route, but is prepared to negotiate a dowry to a suitable private sector operator running a preserved railway. This will reflect the transfer of assets and liabilities. I understand that the dowry will include the two rail tracks, signalling, structures and land, and that British Rail would undertake to lift, remove and pay for continuously welded rail surplus to the private owner's operating requirements. That could amount to up to £850,000.

My hon. Friend also asked about the protection of local people's usage of the line. We intend to ask the TUCC to give us further advice on bus substitution routes and timing.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): To say that I am disappointed by the statement is an understatement. Three generations of my family have driven engines on the line, so I hope that no one says that I do not know anything about it. Today's decision will mean job losses in my constituency. It will mean that the local authorities—I quote from a letter to the Minister from the chairman of the action committee, Mr. William Cameron——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not read, please.

Mr. Martlew: Does the Minister agree that the provision of local authority money was subject to the proviso that British Rail continued to run the line? The amount promised was £500,000, and that money will not be available to the private sector. Does the Minister agree that this is not a toy railway to be run by enthusiasts, but an integral part of the British Rail system, which should stay there? In my constituency, the Minister's name will go down in history alongside Lord Beeching's.

Mr. Mitchell: I am fascinated by what the hon. Gentleman says. I held three public meetings with the assistance of the local authorities in Settle, Appleby and Carlisle. At the meetings in the first two places there was a large attendance and at Carlisle nobody turned up.

Mr. Martlew rose——

Mr. Mitchell: May I say that, with regard to the Cumbria contribution, it has offerd to pay approximately £166,000 per year for three years, but at the same time proposes to cancel the continuing £70,000 a year that it has provided in recent years. That is a very small net increase, and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman would wish to mislead people into thinking that it was as generous as it at first appeared.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Will the Minister understand that this is a most disappointing decision? Will he further understand that it would be churlish not to acknowledge his own personal efforts over many months to find a solution that would allow this glorious line to be kept open? To give us some idea of what the successor management has to cope with, can he tell us what is the current loss on the line and will he also say that his own Department will give assistance to potential operators? Does he not agree that what we need now is optimism and endeavour, not the gloomy approach of saying, "It can't be done," which we had from the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer)?

Mr. Mitchell: I understand my right hon. Friend's feelings and very much recognise them, having been on the line myself and seen how spectacular it is. I know the intensity of local loyalty to the line. However, at present, the revenue to British Rail is just under £1 million a year. British Rail says that the maximum that it could expect to achieve in future is between £1 million and £1·5 million. I have asked it to recheck those figures during the summer. The operating costs are currently £2·7 million, but British Rail expects them to be reduced to £2·1 million, including the amortisation of the Ribblehead repair, through modernisation and replacement with different signalling and new Sprinters. Nevertheless, that means that the loss, even on the basis of modernisation and cutting costs, will be about £750,000 to £850,000 a year. On the other hand, I have to say to my right hon. Friend that since the Severn railway can achieve a revenue of £2 million a year, that puts into proportion the ability of the private sector to do rather better than the current operators.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I have used the line twice in the past couple of months, and whenever I have been on the line, particularly recently, it has been quite busy, in so far as it is part of Cumbria's industrial heritage. May I ask him a simple question? He says that, in choosing between the public and private sectors, it is more economic for the private sector to run the line. If private sector support cannot be found at the end of the day and it does not come forward to keep the line afloat, will the hon. Gentleman have a look at the matter again, or will he simply say that it must close, and that will be the end of it?

Mr. Mitchell: As I said to the House earlier, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make a final decision in the light of any new evidence at the end of November, but, meanwhile, he has made it clear that he is minded to accede to British Rail's request to close. The hon. Gentleman referred to the ridership. In 1983, it was 93,000 a year and in 1986-87 it was 300,000. British Rail says that that figure is now levelling off.

The hon. Gentleman says that I said that it was more economic for the private sector to run the line. When he checks Hansard, he will find that I did not say that. I am saying that the private sector has more specialised ability to run this type of operation as a tourist attraction than British Rail. That is demonstrated by the fact that a number of preserved railways have a far higher revenue than British Rail achieves on this famous line.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): While I hope that a private sector solution can indeed be devised, may I ask my hon. Friend to agree that the £500,000 which local authorities were asked to contribute was on the footing that it would lead to the retention of the railway by British Rail? Does he agree that if a private sector solution is to be devised the long time spent on considering this matter could have been used to better effect in devising that rather than leaving it to this last-minute appeal? Does my hon. Friend further agree that although everyone will make every effort to bring about a private sector solution now, there will be deep disappointment that the matter has been handled in this way?

Mr. Mitchell: I understand my right hon. and learned Friend's disappointment. No undertaking was given to the local authorities about their contribution. They were told that it would weigh in the decision, and indeed it did. But it had a considerably reduced effect because, instead of offering £500,000, it turns out that the contribution is £166,000 a year for three years and that at the same time the local authorities intend to cut the regular contribution of £70,000 a year that they have been making for some years. Therefore, the net effect is a small addition. The conditions included a 20-year guarantee, that this should be a one-off payment only, and that no further request for financial support should be made. Against that background, the contribution looks less generous than it at first appeared.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does the Minister accept that many people will be not only disappointed but appalled by many of his statements this afternoon? Will he give the assurance that, if the package is forced to go ahead as the only solution acceptable to the Government, British Rail will have the right to operate trains on that line, should the west coast line not be open? Will he further state what will happen if the private sector cannot deliver and maintain that line when the west coast line has a problem?

Mr. Mitchell: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman should be appalled by anything I said this afternoon. Perhaps he is appalled at the revelation of the losses, which are probably larger than he hoped or imagined. British Rail would have to negotiate the use of the line for diversionary purposes with the new operator of the line. The route would have to be surveyed to ensure that British Rail was satisfied with it for its rolling stock. Those are commercial matters for negotiation between the parties.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Can my hon. Friend tell me what contribution Lancashire county council has offered to make to this initiative? Does he expect that private individuals will have an opportunity to subscribe to a potential new operating company under these proposals? Is this opportunity for private capital to run such a rail service a precursor of private capital in other spheres of the Department of Transport?

Mr. Mitchell: On the latter point, one is increasingly finding that the private sector can finance the expansion of various forms of rail transport, particularly light rail which is being developed in several parts. I cannot be exactly precise, but I understand that Lancashire county council is paying one third of the £166,000 a year—between £50,000 and £60,000.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): The Minister knows that from the beginning this campaign has been led by people in the area who want to retain a railway service, not a Toy Town railway. He will know that the petition I brought on their behalf referred specifically to the fact that it is not that British Rail cannot run the service but that it has deliberately decided that it does not wish to. To suggest that replacing the service with buses will somehow provide adequate cover for local people is a disgrace for a Minister of Public Transport.

Mr. Mitchell: We are seeking further advice from the TUCC about appropriate bus substitution. It is anticipated that there will be a bus from Giggleswick for the people of Settle to go to Carlisle. I have walked to Giggleswick from Settle and it is not an arduous journey. From Appleby to Carlisle it is envisaged that there will be a bus to Penrith and the journey will take the same length of time. I accept that Settle to Appleby will be a considerably longer journey than otherwise, but since on average only about half a dozen people make that journey for local purposes, as opposed to tourism, the hon. Lady may not feel that it is necessary to spend £750,000 on their behalf.

Mr. Terrence Higgins (Worthing): Is the Minister aware that his efforts to consider the matter with first-hand experience are very much welcomed? We must hope that this proposal is successful. We should also recognise that British Rail must allocate its resources to areas which produce the greatest return to the public.

Mr. Mitchell: My right hon. Friend is correct. British Rail has embarked on the largest modernisation programme since switching from steam to diesel. It is not part of British Rail's remit to organise pleasure rides for people who travel on the line only to enjoy the scenery.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will the Minister stop all this talk about Toy Town railways and pleasure trips? He must know that the line provides necessary local public transport and that it has the potential to provide transport from the cities of the east midlands and Yorkshire to the heartland of industrial Scotland. If all the goodies and the extra finances that have been provided to try to flog the line off to some capitalist to make a profit had been given instead to British Rail, does the Minister believe that British Rail would have changed its mind and run the railway itself?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman should remember that Cumbria's own figures show that more than 60 per cent. of people use the line purely for the pleasure of going on it. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for saying that he expects the line to be so profitable in the private sector that the various gentlemen whom he thought would make profits out of it will appear. I hope that his confidence will be fully justified and that those profits will guarantee the future of the line well into the next century.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): My hon. Friend will be aware that many of my constituents are extremely interested in the railway and will agree wholeheartedly that there is substantial scope for its redevelopment. If in November, or the four months thereafter, a deal looks even remotely in the offing, may I take it from my hon. Friend's answers that matters will be delayed to enable the deal to be stitched up?

Mr. Mitchell: I have told the House what my right hon. Friend is minded to do. We shall have to see the position when we reach that stage, but there have already been large contributions from the private sector and from the public sector, too. English Heritage will give £1 million. Grand Metropolitan is prepared to put up £25,000 as pump-priming and £100,000 if it is matched by a dozen or so others. Scottish and Newcastle Breweries will also contribute, as will a range of firms including British Aggregates Construction Materials Industry and the Federation of Resin Formulators and Applicators. The House should pay tribute to those private sector firms, which have nothing to gain but which are prepared to put themselves out to provide materials either at cost or at lower prices, and even to provide labour to help to save the Ribblehead viaduct, to which so many hon. Members of the House are attached.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Is the Minister aware that this decision will be seen by thousands of British people as an act of political vandalism? Will he confirm that the Settle-Carlisle line is the least loss-making line of the group known as "other provincial services"; that the sum of £750,000 would not buy more than 100 yards of motorway; that to talk about "railway archaeologists" in relation to the thousands of people who protested about the proposed closure of the line is downright insulting; that to take £1 million from the budget of English Heritage when his Department will not cough up £750,000 is another act of political vandalism for which he and the Secretary of State will be remembered; and that this parsimonious, niggardly and short-sighted decision represents a victory for the Secretary of State for the Environment over the Secretary of State for Transport? The Minister should be aware, knowing the character of the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), how much the right hon. Gentleman's political victories will cost the Conservative party over the next few years.

Mr. Mitchell: I am not quite sure of the relevance of most of the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I thought that he was a friend of British Rail, that he wanted it to enter the 21st century with massive investment in modernisation and not try to run a tourist attraction that makes a loss year by year. Losses on the line are such that, during the non-tourist season, it would pay British Rail to hand a 20 quid note to each person and ask them not to travel on the train.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the wretchedly unsatisfactory nature of the answer to my question, I intend to raise the matter on the Adjournment at the earliest opportunity.

Following is the list of public and private bodies:

English Heritage has offered up to £1 million or 40 per cent. of eligible costs—whichever is the less—for the restoration of Ribblehead viaduct subject to certain conditions, notably that the line should stay open to provide a means of access to towns of historic significance.

Grand Metroplitan is willing to help initiate any project associated with the line which promotes both employment and tourism opportunities. Grand Met has offered to contribute up to £25,000 as pump-priming for such a project, but is prepared to raise that to £100,000 should the offer be matched by a dozen or so other private sector companies.

Scottish & Newcastle Breweries plc has indicated that it would be prepared to consider a sponsorship arrangement, worth up to £25,000, for the branding of either a viewing and restaurant car or a refreshment car.

The following commercial firms, many of them under the auspices of the British Aggregate Construction Materials Industries and the Federation of Resin Formulators and Applicators, have offered to supply materials (and, in some cases, labour) at reduced cost to help with the restoration of Ribblehead viaduct:

The Rural Development Commission is prepared to consider an application for a grant of up to £100,000 from the rural transport development fund for the restoration of Ribblehead viaduct. This offer has been made because the commission believe that continued rail services will afford benefits to the rural communities. The commission will also consider on their merits further projects which could benefit the social and economic development of the area.

The Countryside Commission considers that the line can improve access to the countryside and bring significant benefits to the rural communities. It is in principle prepared to make grants up to £100,000 to match capital investment in tourism and related projects by other bodies, or to support marketing initiatives and the provision of new passenger services on the line.

Broadcasting Standards Council

3.55 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Broadcasting Standards Council.

I am glad to tell the House that Sir William Rees-Mogg has agreed to serve as the first chairman of the Broadcasting Standards Council.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Tory apparatchik.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hurd: The unique power of the broadcasting media to shape perceptions and their influence over attitudes and actions are widely recognised. We drew attention in our election manifesto to public concern over the display of violence and sex on television. In line with that commitment, we now propose, by setting up the new council, to srengthen standards in this sector and to reinforce the work of the individual broadcasting regulatory bodies.

The Government will put forward proposals to the House for placing the new Broadcasting Standards Council on a statutory basis. We intend that it should be set up soon and function for a time on a non-statutory basis. During this settling-in period, it will, first, draw up, in consultation with the broadcasting authorities and the other responsible bodies in broadcasting, cable and video, a code on the portrayal of violence and sex and standards of taste and decency.

Secondly, it will monitor and report on the portrayal of violence and sex, and standards of taste and decency in television and radio programmes received in the United Kingdom and in video works.

Thirdly, it will receive, consider and make findings on complaints and comments from indivuiduals and organisations on matters within its competence and ensure that such findings are effectively publicised.

Fourthly, it will undertake research on matters such as the nature and effects on attitudes and behaviour of the portrayal of violence and sex in television and radio programmes and in video works. Fifthly, it will prepare an annual report, which the Home Secretary will lay before Parliament and publish.

In addition, the Government will consult the council on the implications, for the matters within its remit, of the negotiations under way in Europe for the regulation of transfrontier broadcasting, and on the implementation of the result of those negotiations.

Sir William Rees-Mogg has suggested that the council might function best if it were to preview some imported fictional material before it is broadcast. I have therefore asked him to explore, with the relevant broadcasting bodies during this pre-statutory period, an arrangement under which they would make available to the council, before transmission, fictional material acquired from abroad that is believed to give rise to special concern, and on which accordingly they would find the council's prior comments helpful.

Sir William will discuss with the broadcasting authorities how best they should publicise the council's views on programmes and programme standards. The BBC, IBA, Welsh Fourth Channel Authority and other relevant regulatory authorities will remain responsible for exercising their powers and duties under existing provisions, as will the Broadcasting Complaints Commission.

The Government will frame their proposals for the statutory powers of the new council in the light of progress made meanwhile in making sensible arrangements for co-operation between the new council and the broadcasting authorities.

The administrative arrangements for the new council are well in hand. Further details, including its membership, will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Is the Home Secretary aware that, although his statement was clearly intended to be bland, it will cause great disquiet among those who believe in the freedom of broadcasting and broadcasters? No one seriously believes that the new council will simply be the combination of think tank and complaints box promised in the Tory manifesto. It is the thin end of a highly authoritarian wedge and we shall continue to resist every attempt by the Government to interfere with free broadcasting in a free society.

Is the Home Secretary aware that the power to vet and veto individual programmes which he has trailed today as the wish of Sir William Rees-Mogg is wholly unacceptable? The idea of a further regulatory body superimposed on the BBC and IBA, which act under legislation and charter to observe acceptable standards, is simultaneously dangerous and absurd. The additional power to regulate gives the Government the chance to impose their wishes on broadcasting. That is an unacceptable practice in a free society.

I warn the Home Secretary that fears about his real intentions will be heightened by the appointment as chairman of Sir William Rees-Mogg. Sir William played an ignoble part in the suppression of the "Real Lives" programme when he was vice-chairman of the BBC, and he is one of the few people of any standing to have publicly condemned a television programme—"Airbase"—and then gone on to admit that he had not seen it. Moreover, he has openly—most recently yesterday afternoon with the Daily Mail—demanded the right as chairman of the new council to vet and veto individual broadcasts. He is a wholly unsuitable chairman. He does not have the support of the Opposition and he will not have the confidence of the broadcasters. Only a weak Minister would have appointed a chairman who first announced his terms of reference in public and now proposes to negotiate them after his appointment has been announced to the House today.

I emphasise once again that to give the Broadcasting Standards Council regulatory powers is wholly unacceptable to Opposition and broadcasters alike. It will be resisted in the House and I believe that broadcasters will not co-operate until the legislation has passed through all its stages in the Commons and in the House of Lords.

In the light of that, I wish to ask the Home Secretary five specific questions. First, will he give a categorical assurance, without any doubt or attempt to equivocate, that the BSC will cover only matters relating to sex and violence—that is, matters of so-called taste and not matters of politics? Representatives of the Conservative Back-Bench broadcasting committee said on television yesterday that the powers of the council must be extended to other matters in addition to sex and violence—[HON.

MEMBERS: "Hear, Hear!"] I want an assurance that the Home Secretary will not succumb to the "Hear, Hears" that we have just heard from Conservatives below the Gangway.

Secondly, what powers will the council have over video sales and the commercial use of videos? For instance, is Sir William to spend his evenings in assorted hotel bedrooms deciding what is appropriate for broadcasting in that arena, or is commercial video to be excluded from the terms of reference?

Thirdly, how will the council's judgment affect the broadcasting of current affairs? If it is concerned with violence, will Sir William have a view about what can be broadcast concerning murder and mayhem in Belfast and Beirut?

Fourthly, will the Home Secretary give examples of the kind of programme that concerns him? For his announcement to have any veracity or honesty, he must say what it is that concerns him. We must have examples of the type of programme that it is intended that Sir William should suppress.

Finally, is not the truth of the matter that the programmes to which the Government object are concerned not with sex or violence or taste but with the Government's political inconvenience? We believe that the new body will eventually be expanded to inhibit those who dare to criticise the present Administration.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) spent a good deal of last week in the media and in his letter to me stirring up confusion on this subject, and it is clear from his questions that he has managed thoroughly to confuse himself. He has tried to invent a link between the straightforward carrying out of an election manifesto pledge and what he erroneously believes to be the Government's intention to impose their wishes on broadcasting. His attempt has entirely failed, as the outcome will show.

The right hon. Gentleman's criticisms, following those of one or two broadcasters, of Sir William Rees-Mogg personally are grossly unjust. Had we selected a person who knew nothing whatever about broadcasting or about the creative life of this country—[HON. MEMBERS: "You have."]—the right hon. Gentleman would have had some grounds for irritation and criticism. It is clear that the main criticism of my choice for this appointment is that, as a former editor of The Times, a former vice-chairman of the BBC and actual chairman of the Arts Council, Sir William knows a great deal about the matters in hand. I should have thought that that was a qualification rather than a disqualification.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook asked a number of specific questions. I confirm, as our manifesto and all that we have said on the subject made clear, that the setting up of the Broadcasting Standards Council has nothing to do with politics—[Laughter.]—or political bias and nothing to do with the treatment of political matters by the broadcasters.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Of course not.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no point in shouting from a sedentary position. It takes up time and it does not help.

Mr. Hurd: Some of my hon. Friends will suggest that the council should concern itself with such matters and there will be plenty of time to discuss those suggestions —[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—but that is not the Government's intention.

As regards video, contrary to what has appeared in parts of the press, we have had considerable discussion with the broadcasters about the scope of the new council. One of the points that the broadcasters made most insistently was that the realm of video must be within the council's remit if it is to deal effectively with the matters with which it is supposed to deal. As my statement today made clear, the council will be concerned with the portrayal of sex and violence.

In answer to the right hon. Gentleman's last point, in my view two of the biggest social changes in this country in recent years have been the immense increase in the amount of time that people, especially young people, spend watching the television and, secondly, a considerable increase in violence. Research on the subject is inconclusive. That is why one of the points with which the council will deal is the provision of research. Nevertheless, even if a link between those two major changes in society —the growth of television viewing and the increase in violence—exists only in a small number of cases, we must pay proper attention to it and strengthen the means by which we deal with it. The creation of the Broadcasting Standards Council has that objective in mind.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a private Members' day and that a large number of Back Benchers wish to take part in the subsequent debate.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): This is a very important issue.

Mr. Speaker: It is indeed, but it will be bad luck for Back Benchers if they cannot be called in the next debate. I ask hon. Members to put single questions and to be brief.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Does my right hon. Friend agree that none of this would have been necessary if the broadcasting authorities had exercised the necessary restraint and control over the unacceptable amount of television violence and sex to which society has been treated in recent years?

Mr. Hurd: The broadcasting authorities do pay attention to this. As we said in our manifesto, we believe that responsibility for enforcing broadcasting standards must rest with the broadcasting authorities, but they need reinforcing by the setting up of the Broadcasting Standards Council.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Is the Home Secretary satisfied that the council will in no way conflict with the existing role of the BBC's governors and the members of the IBA? What real consultation did he have with the BBC and the IBA before reaching his decision and making his announcement today?

Mr. Hurd: In October last year, we undertook considerable consultation with all the broadcasting authorities, and I have a wedge of correspondence resulting from that. Last week, we went over the ground with them again and discussed the contents of the statement. Those discussions will be carried forward by the chairman.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Broadcasting Complaints Commission meets at lengthy intervals and on rare occasions and that it sometimes takes many months for a complaint to be dealt with properly and findings produced? In his review of the commission's work, could he also tighten up the arrangements for broadcasting complaints?

Mr. Hurd: I note what my hon. Friend says. As he knows, the Broadcasting Complaints Commission has a narrow remit and, on the whole, Lady Anglesey and her colleagues perform it well. During the pre-statutory period, they will continue to do their job and no doubt they will take note of my hon Friend's remarks. One of the things that need to be considered before drafting legislation is how the Broadcasting Complaints Commission could be subsumed in the new standards council.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): If the Home Secretary takes the view that there is a need to tackle sex and violence further, why has he thought it appropriate to create a new quango rather than examining the regulation or operation of the two authorities themselves? What does he intend to do to secure the freedom of broadcasting of current events—a point to which he has not yet addressed himself?

Mr. Hurd: I believe that the second point is the responsibility of the broadcasting authorities and it would be dangerous territory for any Government of any party to enter. That is why I replied as I did to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). As the hon. Gentleman knows, over the past year the broadcasting authorities have examined their own arrangements and codes for dealing with violence in particular—partly in response to two rounds of representations from me. For the reasons that I have given, I believe that there is a need for a clearer focus for public concern on these matters than the existing arrangements allow, and the Broadcasting Standards Council will provide that.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): I suggest to my right hon. Friend that what is needed is not so much a Pope who will issue encyclicals and offer prayers as an ombudsman who can rectify grievances both before and after. Why has my right hon. Friend confined himself to standards relating solely to sex and violence when standards of truth and accuracy are equally matters of concern to the public?

Mr. Hurd: I know that that is my hon. Friend's view and, as I have said, he will have full opportunities to develop it. The BCC deals with accuracy and fairness as they relate to individuals and their grievances. For the reasons that we gave in our manifesto and during the election campaign, we believe that the new standards council ought to concentrate on excessive sex and violence and their portrayal.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Does not this announcement come at the end of a lengthy period of attack and assault on public service broadcasting? Is not this an appalling step to take? Could not the Home Secretary have asked the Prime Minister to do her own dirty work? Clearly, she is not concerned with standards, as she has been forcing upon us deregulation in both television and radio. For radio, light or no regulation is recommended. Is not the truth that the Government are not concerned with standards at all? They are worried only about what they would regard as a dirty play; under the Prime Minister's proposals, all the rest can be pap. Is not that combination of the patrician and the philistine appalling for standards in this country? Is it not the case that under this Government censorship has increased, is increasing and should be abolished?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has the balance completely wrong. In a whole range of policy work, we are trying to combine and reconcile the deregulation of radio and television and enlargement of choice for the individual —for the hon. Gentleman's constituents—that modern technology now makes possible with the maintenance of the standards that we expect in this country. It is a huge task—international as well as national. Today's announcement is part of that, but throughout our policy work we are concentrating on those two objectives, and the hon. Gentleman should recognise that they can indeed be reconciled.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Is it not a little curious that, some years after giving up pre-censorship of the London theatre by the Lord Chamberlain's office, we are to enter into similar arrangements for broadcasting? Will my right hon. Friend treat very cautiously Sir William's request for prior censorship of programmes, because it would undermine the role with which the IBA and the BBC governors are charged?

Mr. Hurd: I understand my hon. Friend's point. If he reads my statement carefully he will see that I am proceeding cautiously—indeed, step by step. I think that it is reasonable that Sir William should discuss with the broadcasting authorities the question whether it would be sensible, as I personally believe it would, to have some arrangements whereby the new Broadcasting Standards Council could preview certain types of material—particularly imported material. It could then make a finding—not act as a censor—at the same time as a broadcast, rather than afterwards.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Can the Home Secretary confirm that, under the present arrangements, anyone making a controversial programme in independent television is bound to consult the Independent Broadcasting Authority? Will he further confirm that the IBA has very carefully laid-down and detailed programme guidelines, contained in a lengthy booklet? Will he explain how the new arrangement will work if the Broadcasting Standards Council gives one piece of advice to the producer of an independent television programme and the IBA gives another? Which advice should the producer take?

Mr. Hurd: That is not quite the position. It is perfectly true that the IBA has a tradition of previewing, which the governors of the BBC do not have. That is one of the complications in the arrangements. For the great majority of material, the new body will receive complaints and comments after a broadcast, as the public will not be aware of the contents of a broadcast until after it has been transmitted. It will review those comments and discuss them with the broadcasters and then make a finding. One aspect that will need to be discussed during the settling-in period—and eventually settled by this House in legislation —is how the finding is to be effectively publicised. Presumably, it will be in the same slot as the original broadcast.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be very warmly welcomed? Does he agree that nothing could be more out of touch with the mood of the public than the defence by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) of television companies' right to depict gratuitous and repulsive scenes of violence? Will he bear in mind that it is important that the new body should not act as a cushion against complaints for the broadcasting companies and that the test will lie in the measures and in the new body's powers to enforce its views as well as speaking out when it regards material as unacceptable?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with my hon. Friend's last point. His first remark was also true. It would be a mistake for the House to underestimate the deep concern felt on this subject, particularly by parents. It may not be felt by huge numbers, but it is very deep. I recall a meeting in my constituency a few years back at which parents expressed their anxiety in passionate terms. If, through the council, we can provide such people with a focus for their anxieties and an assurance that they will be properly followed up, it will be a considerable advance.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Who is more out of touch with public taste than Sir William Rees-Mogg and establishment retreads? Does he know much about young people's attitudes to violence and sex? Given that the Home Secretary has made this decision, will there be a regional dimension to the Broadcasting Standards Council? Will he reassure us on the weasel words about the arrangement that Sir William Rees-Mogg will make with the IBA and the BBC authorities? Can we be sure that it will not be one in which he will intrude on their regulatory responsibilities?

Mr. Hurd: Those involved in the discussions that are now to take place will try to illuminate the last point. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is so patronising about Sir William Rees-Mogg, whose qualifications for holding views and handling these matters sensibly are very great indeed. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman takes the opposite view. We shall announce to the House the membership of the council. I am very conscious of the Welsh aspect of all broadcasting matters; my predecessor but one taught me that in my cradle, from his own experience. I do not want a council that is regionally balanced or has representatives from one part of the community rather than another. We shall seek, in general, a balance. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be less patronising about the chairman when he sees the results.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I welcome the appointment of Sir William Rees-Mogg, largely because of his experience in advertising and the media. There is, however, one difficulty—three bodies will have overlapping powers. Will my right hon. Friend be careful with the guidelines and ensure that they are published before any decisions are taken, so that Sir William has the clearest view of the line that he should take in appropriate cases?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is sensible that there should be this period when these matters are sensibly discussed before the House is asked to take a decision on the statutory consequences. When we frame our proposals for legislation, we shall take account of the progress that has been made in the discussions between those bodies.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): If obscenity is in the groin of the beholder, what possible qualification does Sir William Rees-Mogg have to act as the nation's groin? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the figure of the high Tory sheriff of Somerset sitting in a darkened room with a copy of The Times in his lap and watching French movies will rapidly become as big a figure of national ridicule as the Lord Chancellor once was? In the interests of the right hon. Gentleman's formerly liberal reputation, will he retreat from this nonsense, which is a censorious and dangerous path?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman misses the point, which is that this body will act as a focus for public concern on these matters—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman, in the intervals of his sniggering, believes that no parent in his constituency is seriously worried about the portrayal of violence on television and does not want a better way than exists at present for expressing concern, he is grievously out of touch.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement. Will the criterion of decency include the responsibility of programme makers in respect of legal proceedings?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is tempting the new council down a dangerous path. I would much rather it concentrated on matters where public concern was greatest, and the discussions will concern those aspects.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Although there may well be justifiable concern about the standards of certain television programmes, bearing in mind the expressed view of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) and the believed views of the Prime Minister, does the Home Secretary agree that this is not the way to tackle the matter? Surely it must be tackled by cross-party and cross-House agreement. Are there not different issues with regard to videos? Will the council have physical or legal control over what might appear via satellite?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman confuses two things. It is perfectly reasonable for my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), as chairman of the Conservative Party, or for Ministers or shadow Ministers, to express strong views about particular broadcasts. There is nothing reprehensible about that. Broadcasters and journalists throughout the media express strong views about us. There is no reason why that should not be a two-way business. That process, which occurs all the time, has nothing to do with the Broadcasting Standards Council.

I have dealt already with the point about videos. There is nothing in the proposal that will alter the "Bright Act" —the Video Recordings Act 1984—on the control of video. Given the amount of time that viewers spend watching video, as opposed to broadcasting, the new Broadcasting Standards Council must be able to take account of the content and standards of video when making its report or conducting its research, and that will happen.

[Mr. Hurd]

The hon. Gentleman raised another question, which I have forgotten——

Mr. Spearing: Satellite.

Mr. Hurd: I have mentioned the international dimension. We are negotiating in Strasbourg and discussing in Brussels the possibilities of a Council of Europe treaty and a Community directive to deal with these matters in so far as they originated in Europe, and that is very important. In my statement, I dealt with the relationship between that process and the new council.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I again remind the House that this is a private Members' day. I shall call two hon. Members from each side and then the Opposition Front-Bench Spokesman; then we must move on. There will be other opportunities to discuss this matter.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I reassure my hon. Friend that the great majority of ordinary households will warmly welcome his decision, not as an attack on freedom of expression but as a check on over-mighty broadcasters, in the hope that the council can hold broadcasters to their self-professed standards. Will my right hon. Friend reassure the House that the Government intend to bring broadcasters within the scope of the Obscene Publications Act 1959?

Mr. Hurd: I entirely agree with the phrasing of my hon. Friend's first point. The answer to his second point is yes —that is another manifesto commitment which we shall fulfil.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Whose idea was it to appoint Sir William Rees-Mogg? Was the job advertised, or did his name just emerge?

Mr. Hurd: It occurred to me as a good one, and I am glad that it has found general favour.

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): My right hon. Friend may be aware that there is one cable channel that broadcasts several hours of pornography every day. Will the new council correct that and, if so, over what period?

Mr. Hurd: I am not quite sure—is my hon. Friend referring to Channel 4? [Laughter.]

Mr. Butler: Cable.

Mr. Hurd: Cable. Some of my hon. Friends have extreme views about Channel 4. Cable will certainly come within the council's remit. We have discussed the consequences of that with the Cable Authority, and Sir William Rees-Mogg will consider it further.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Home Secretary said that parents could be affected by these programmes. As a parent, has he been affected? Has any member of the Tory Cabinet been affected? The right hon. Gentleman must answer that question as a parent. It is no use blaming all these others. Will he answer that question? How does this restriction of liberty fit in with the Tories' oft-proclaimed arguments about freedom of choice?

Mr. Hurd: I have answered the second question already. We shall lay before the House, certainly during this Parliament, a massive broadcasting Bill to enlarge freedom of choice. At the same time, we want to preserve and increase standards. The Broadcasting Standards Council will address itself to the second of those objectives.

Most of our children draw a perfectly good frontier in their minds between what they view and the reality of the outside world, but some children find that difficult or impossible, and their actions outside are affected by what they view. Even if they are relatively few, it can be a desperate business. We must strengthen our fortifications at this point.

Mr. Hattersley: Is the Home Secretary aware that his protestations that there is no desire to have any political influence over the BBC is totally undermined by the identical answers that he gave his hon. Friends? Twice he was asked whether he would extend the authority's powers to interfere in matters of politics and current affairs and he answered, "There will be plenty of time to discuss those suggestions in the future." I have no doubt that there will be, and that the Tory party will want them discussed. I have no doubt that the Home Secretary will capitulate to those influences as he has capitulated to them in the past.

Mr. Hurd: I was being courteous to my hon. Friends and pointing out that there will be plenty of parliamentary time to discuss these matters. I went on to say, as the right hon. Gentleman would have known if he had not been scribbling at the time, that I did not believe that that political path was one down which the new council should go. Handling accusations of political bias is essentially a matter for the broadcasting authorities. The right hon. Gentleman has been trying to stir up a storm in a teacup. Certainly, the waters of the relationship between the Government and broadcasters are a bit choppy at present. I hope and believe that they will now subside to a more normal level and that, as that happens, the Broadcasting Standards Council will be able to work out sensible arrangements for co-operation.

KP Foods Factory (Halifax)

4.30 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The decision to close KP Foods factory, with a loss of 1,000 jobs."

On Thursday morning, without any warning or prior consultation, 950 of my constituents, employees of KP Foods, part of United Biscuits, of which Sir Hector Laing is chairman, were told that the decision had been taken to close the Halifax factory. That was despite the fact that, last year, KP had a trading profit of £36·8 million—up 23 per cent. on the previous year. The Halifax factory played a great part in that profitability by increasing productivity.

If the closure goes ahead, there will be a net loss to the community of £2·5 million, an increase in unemployment benefit of £1·6 million, and an knock-on effect leading to the loss of a further 250 jobs. KP Foods provides nearly 1,000 jobs in a deprived part of Halifax. Unemployment in that area is already running at over 12 per cent. KP is the only significant employer of women in the area. Although wages are low, the factory provides the only opportunity for employment.

The skilled and loyal workers at KP have done everything that the Government have asked, yet they are to be scrapped because, once again, British manufacturing is up for sale. It is a telling indictment of the Government and their lack of any coherent policy on manufacturing and the work force that a catastrophe of that magnitude can occur, when they are giving highly publicised support to Business in the Community. Halifax has been a major part of that focus.

Business in the Community was launched with royal patronage and enthusiastically supported by the whole town. Because of disastrous Government policies, the town has suffered massive job losses, with the social consequences that they bring. Sir Hector Laing is chairman of Business in the Community. If the factory closes, he should resign, because he will have betrayed the trust that was placed in him.

It is both tragic and ironic that, only days ago, I asked the House for a debate on the hostile Nestlé bid for Rowntree—the largest private employer in Halifax. If Rowntree goes, another 3,000 jobs will be lost. The Minister should tell us what the Government plan for manufacturing in the run-up to 1992. Many Opposition Members believe that there will be dozens of UK Foods and Rowntrees in every constituency, unless the Government act soon and give a commitment to protect British jobs. I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to consider a debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that she believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The decision to close KP Foods factory, with a loss of 1,000 jobs."

I can well understand the concern that the hon. Lady has expressed on behalf of her constituents, but, as she knows, the criteria that are laid down require me to decide whether to give the matter precedence over the orders set down for today or tomorrow. I regret that the matter that she has raised does not meet the criteria. Therefore, I cannot submit her application to the House.

Cruise Missiles

4.33 pm

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I raise a matter that was reported in The Independent newspaper. Is it in order for the Secretary of State for Defence to say on television tonight that Britain is to have a new air-launched cruise missile, when the Minister has repeatedly denied to the House that a decision has been taken? The Minister chose not to report on his return from the Nuclear Planning Group, and the House has not had an opportunity to debate whether the nation should have a new generation of nuclear weapons, especially air-launched cruise missiles.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I saw that report, but, of course, we do not know what the Secretary of State will say until he has made his broadcast.

[Mr. Speaker]

Planning Controls

Mr. Speaker: Because of a late start and the fact that 15 hon. Members wish to take part in the debate, I again ask for brief contributions.

4.34 pm

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes Her Majesty's Government's continuing commitment to protect the Green Belts; supports its initiatives to regenerate the inner cities and other areas of urban dereliction; and recognises that the planning system must be flexible enough to encourage and facilitate development on unused urban land while ensuring the protection of the countryside.

You will know, Mr. Speaker, that I am fortunate to have this debate, having won the ballot for private Member's motions. I shall raise subjects relating to town and country planning in general and our planning control system in particular. Such subjects are important, timely and topical, particularly in view of last week's speech by the Secretary of State. I shall raise two matters—green belt policies, and the sites that are suitable or unsuitable to meet housing demands for the rest of the century—and make two suggestions on changes that should be made to our development control system.

Many of the town and country planning problems that we face today have been brought about through the success of Government policies—for example, sustained economic growth and the spread of home ownership—and, of course, dramatic changing social and demographic factors. I welcome the Government's continuing commitment to the protection of green belts. I say without equivocation that the green belt policy has been the undoubted success of our post-war planning system. Green belts are a milestone in English planning history. Not least, they command wide public support. They have not only succeeded in checking the outward sprawl of our conurbations but assisted urban regeneration.

That point was made in a report from the Environment Select Committee in the last Parliament. The Committee stated that green belts should be sacrosanct. I pay tribute to the work of that Select Committee. It brought out some important reports not only on green belts and land for housing but on the operation and effectiveness of the wildlife and countryside legislation, and the appeals system and major public inquiries. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) who chaired and chairs that Committee.

If anyone should doubt the need for a green belt policy in our country, I refer them to the gargantuan concrete jungle that is greater Tokyo. It is an appalling mess. About 30 million Japanese people live within 30 miles of their Emperor's palace in the heart of the city. At least we can say that His Imperial Majesty is in physical touch with a great number of his subjects. Greater Tokyo is the result of the appalling failure to have a sound and sensible planning system. Thirty million is nearly twice the population of Australia.

To protect our green belts is not to plead selfish parochialism. It is in the national interest to leave green and pleasant countryside accessible to city dwellers. I am glad that, under this Government, the confirmed green belt area has more than doubled to 4·5 million acres. That represents 14 per cent. of England's land mass. Of course, the green belts are entirely in England. That 4·5 million acres represents only about 20 per cent. of England's countryside. Even accepting that other parts of the countryside—national parks, areas of outstanding natural beauty, sites of special and scientific interest and so on—are afforded protection of one degree or another, most of our countryside is outside statutorily protected areas.

I want to examine the future need for housing and where that housing demand should be met. I am conscious of the fact that the problems relating to this issue are at their most acute in the south of Britain and not necessarily just in the south-east.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Before my hon. Friend proceeds with the substance of his speech, may I ask whether he has noticed the almost complete absence of the Labour party and the so-called alliance parties from the Chamber? We have only three Labour Members here—the statutory minimum of two plus one—and one representative from the alliance parties. Does my hon. Friend agree that that attendance is a most interesting commentary on the concern felt by those parties about the preservation of our countryside and urban renewal?

Mr. Chapman: It is obvious that my hon. Friend is more of a mathematical expert than I, and I am sure that he is right. I like to be charitable to my political opponents and I am convinced that their numbers today are proportionate to the seats that they hold in southern Britain.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Let me put the hon. Gentleman out of his misery. I suggested to a number of my hon. Friends that they should not attend the debate because I believed that we should leave it to the Conservatives, who are so divided on this issue. The more of them who speak the better, and they should keep it up.

Mr. Chapman: I shall not tempt providence, so I shall say nothing.

I agree with a number of the points raised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his speech last week. I believe that the increased demand for housing in southern Britain in the years to come will arise not because of a significant increase in the population, but because of a need to cater for an increase in the number of households. An increasing number of young people leave their parents' homes and set up homes of their own before getting married. Further and alas, there are more divorces and broken marriages and, whereas one household used to suffice for a family, two households are now needed. Thankfully, more elderly people are living longer and they require accommodation.

Although I agree with my right hon. Friend that there is no net immigration of people from other regions to the south-east, I believe that there is a significant net immigration of people to London from abroad. I believe that that factor must be taken into account.

I welcome the fact that, in the past few years, there has been an increasing proportion of development on recycled land in the south-east. My right hon. Friend informed us that 55 per cent. of housing has been built on such underused urban areas.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): I hope that my hon. Friend will address the problems faced by places such as Portsmouth, which has little open green space. Residents are already worried about the amount of space that has been taken up within the city, rather than being left open and green. Yet those in the countryside who live in homes that were once green fields criticise those who want to move into similar open space around them. Is it not true that today's conservationist is yesterday's developer and yesterday's home buyer?

Mr. Chapman: My hon. Friend makes an important point and I intend to return to that later. People in towns and cities are keen that they should be left their green spaces, which are important, but space should also be left for people living in the metropolitan suburbs. When I spoke about 55 per cent. of housing being built on urban land I meant recycled urban land, which was often under-used or derelict, and not the parks and open spaces of those areas.

I do not believe that anyone in the Chamber would say that there is no need for house building on green field sites, but we need to be convinced, and we are entitled to ask, "How much—where and when?" before we allow building to take place in the countryside. I also believe that we are entitled to be convinced that the maximum amount of house building—within practical reason and taking account of demand—will be in existing urban areas. To that extent, I want the Government to continue their policies of urban regeneration and the development of the inner cities. I believe that the Government have made great strides in that respect. I accept that the process was started some years ago by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), when he was Secretary of State for the Environment, who established urban regeneration initiatives. However, I believe that such regeneration has been given a great push forward by the Government, and I welcome that.

I still believe that there is much more land that can be sought out, unlocked and developed. By that I mean unused and underused urban land and not the necessary green spaces of our urban areas.

Mr. Soley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the Secretary of State that there should be less planning at local level because the housing market must adjust in rural areas to take in people who have left the cities? Alternatively, does he agree with the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who believes that planning should not be conducted in such a manner and that the Secretary of State should not override planning decisions as he has done? The hon. Gentleman should deal with that, because it is the essential issue that should be addressed.

Mr. Chapman: The hon. Gentleman must be a little more patient, because I hope to deal with that issue later, and I shall try to get to it as soon as possible.

I welcome the establishment of the urban development corporations, the simplified planning zones, and so on. About 80 per cent. of us live in urban areas, but so long as some of those areas are a disgrace to any nation that calls itself civilised, people will want to get out and live beyond the suburbs.

The Government must show in their urban policies that there can be inestimable benefit from living in urban areas, such as easy access to vital services and leisure facilities, and much less time taken in getting to and from work. There must also be a much more effective use of existing housing stock in the urban areas.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Surely the difficulty that faces the "southern comfort" lobby is that the urban areas on which my hon. Friend wishes more houses to be built are largely concentrated in the north, whereas the land on which housing is needed is concentrated in the south, where the jobs of the future are increasingly likely to be located. If further planning restrictions are imposed, what hope is there for a large number of those 600,000 new homes which are required in the south being made available for people from other regions who want to seek work there?

Mr. Chapman: My hon. Friend raises an important point. I do not suggest that there are any glib or easy solutions to the problem. I believe that in the next decade the problem will be at its most acute in southern Britain, and it is on that area that I wish to concentrate.

I do not want to be party to any discussion of the possibility of people going from the south to the north or vice versa. I have based my remarks on my right hon. Friend's statistics—he is advised by experts. Although it is easier to find unused land in the urban areas of the north, I believe that if we adopt the right policies in the south we can form a overall national policy, which will benefit the country. Although the problem is more acute in the south, there is still much unused urban land that can be tapped in London and in other southern towns.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): On that specific point, does my hon. Friend confirm that it is important that inner London retains its areas of greenery and that we try to avoid repeating the mistakes of the 1960s when we overdeveloped a fair part of inner London, with obvious social consequences?

Mr. Chapman: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), and I shall refer to those matters.

Apart from trying to make rundown estates and difficult-to-let public sector housing more attractive to people, further initiatives can be taken in tapping the spare accommodation in our towns and cities. That can be done through more encouragement to the private rented sector. A week ago we debated the proposal in the Finance (No. 2) Bill to extend the business expansion scheme to the private rented sector. I hope to show later that there is a great need, especially in London, to cater for the great increase in the number of single person households. Releasing that spare accommodation will be a significant factor in London.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): With regard to the increase in the number of single-person households, if over-rigorous restraint is applied, does the hon. Gentleman accept that the onward march of multiple occupation through the residential suburbs is no more welcome to Conservative Members and their supporters than the arrival of the bulldozers on open countryside?

Mr. Chapman: I agree with that.

The real problem is to what extent future housing development must be met in England's countryside. It would be helpful if the Government recognised that the planning system can play a positive part in dealing with that problem. We must ensure that any development in the countryside is carried out in such a way as to minimise the harmful environmental consequences. The Government, when assessing how much development is necessary for the countryside, must justify the figures updated by the Secretary of State last week. He said that the forecast for the number of new homes in the south-east up to the year 2001—which is only 13 years away—is to be increased from 460,000 to 610,000. A proportion of that number, but by no means the major proportion, will be in London.

I put those statistics to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment who will be replying to the debate. My information is that nearly half of the 610,000 extra homes are needed in London, and 90 per cent. of those will be for one-person households. If that is so, the vast amount of that demand can be satisfied in London and in the other urban areas of the south-east.

More specifically, the public must be reassured that as much as possible of the increased housing demand will be met in urban areas. Encouragement and resources must be given to urban local authorities so that they can realise the maximum potential for recycling underused and unused land.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I understand that on those figures the proportion of new single households projected for 1991 to 2001 in the south-east will be about 95 per cent. Those are the people who the Secretary of State has said should be housed within urban and developed areas.

Mr. Chapman: I said that 90 per cent. of London's demand is for single-person households. Therefore I have no reason to suppose that the overall figure for the south-east is not about 95 per cent.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Are those figures based on an assumption that regional policy will continue to be a failure, as it always has been? I do not especially blame this Government. Further, will the over-concentration of employment in and near London continue? If we had a successful regional policy, shifting the balance in favour of the more northerly parts of Britain, those figures would have to be re-examined.

Mr. Chapman: I know that the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) speaks with great experience on these matters. He is a member of the Town and Country Planning Association council. I remind him that I said at the beginning of my speech that, whatever the regional policy, those figures are based, not on any immigration into the south-east from the other regions, but on a slight net emigration. It is for the hon. Gentleman to say how significant regional policies could be in minimising the demand forecast in these figures.

I refer now to what I believe should be the backbone of the Government's policies relating to the countryside. Development in the countryside must be a policy of last resort. There must be certainty about the policy. Then, we hope, there will be widespread public support for it. Vagueness, equivocation and uncertainty are damaging to the Government's policies. As long as there is doubt about the policies, speculation will be rife and land values will escalate. Taking a median figure, the average price of agricultural land is about £2,000 an acre. It is not an exaggeration to say that some of the prime green field sites in southern Britain have development values of about £1 million an acre. As long as there is doubt, there will be a feeling that there is a free-for-all. That would be a terrible disaster in the planning of sensible policies for our countryside.

Our countryside is a unique heritage and a priceless asset. I am not a rural Member of Parliament, so it is not petty parochial pleading to ask that the countryside be protected from unnecessary development. I believe that it is in the national interest.

I do not want to be seen to be dealing just with planning in the countryside, the urban areas, the cities and the large towns. I am also interested in the hinterland of suburbia, especially on the outskirts of our great metropolis. There are pleasant residential areas there that need also to be protected. They are areas which are worthy of care and conservation.

Due to the sustained economic growth, the spread of home ownership and the social changes, I find in my constituency—I am pleading a touch of parochialism here, although it is not confined to my constituency—that there is a proliferation of new developments, usually blocks of flats, that are hopelessly out of scale, character and harmony with the areas in which they are placed. They are destroying the semi-rural atmosphere of those suburbs which is important to the pleasantness of these residential areas. When they bring with them a significant increase in density in those neighbourhoods, usually with inadequate roads and with inadequate sewage systems, that is a backward step and harmful to the environment.

I have suggested to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that local planning authorities should have the power to designate such pleasant residential areas as "special protection areas"—I have used the acronym SPAs—so that the local planning authority could turn down any application that was out of scale, density or character, and have its decision backed up, if necessary, by the Secretary of State on appeal.

Of course I recognise that there is a need for flats. Indeed, I have referred to single-person accommodation. However, there are appropriate areas for those flats and there are other areas where that sort of development, although needed, is completely inappropriate. I suggest that for such areas my hon. Friend could lay down the condition that permission is required before the demolition of perfectly decent houses is allowed. That proposal was put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). There is a need for such additional protection in residential areas—a sort of halfway house towards conservation.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way because he has given way many times already. I thank him also for referring to the proposals in my Bill, which has now lost the possibility of a Second Reading, but which will return. Does my hon. Friend agree that such a proposal would not hinder legitimate planning developments, where there was a case for the development in the right place, but would provide essential protection in, for example, our outer London boroughs, where developers are indulging in wholesale demolition—I believe that my hon. Friend's constituency suffers from that, as does my own area—and then creating the fait accompli of a development site where a large number of flats will be built without any control by the local planning committee? Does he agree that that should be an essential additional component of modern planning techniques and that the Government should be more enthusiastic about it from now on?

Mr. Chapman: I agree absolutely with my hon. Friend. There is great force in his proposal. I am sorry to hear that his Bill has been denied its Second Reading. I hope that he will persevere.

If the Minister does not feel able to accept that proposal, at least there should be clarity in Government circulars. Indeed, the problem arises from the interpretation of circular 22/80. Local planning authorities feel that they cannot resist such developments because the developments will be upheld on appeal.

I should like to make one other proposal about possible changes in our planning system. I must declare an interest as a fellow of the Royal Town Planning Institute, although I have not practised for years. Complaints have proliferated that some developments are starting without planning permission or are going ahead in contravention of a condition of the planning permission. I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning about that and he has replied that the planning authorities have powers under stop notices and enforcement notices. However, those notices are difficult to institute.

The only solution is that there should be financial penalties for such actions whether or not planning permission is subsequently given. I feel strongly about that, because more and more people feel that there is corruption in the planning system; they see developments going ahead without the necessary permission. I hope that my hon. Friend will respond kindly to that suggestion. I welcome the review of local authorities' enforcement powers against breaches of town planning laws which the Secretary of State has recently announced.

I realise that land use planning is an attempt to meet two irreconcilables—the needs of developers and the interests of conservation. If I had to make a judgment on our town and country planning system over the past 40 years, I would say that the system has not been particularly successful in the planning of our towns. However, it has been reasonably successful in preventing undue sprawl of urban areas into the countryside.

I like to think that we have learnt seven lessons from the experience of our planning system during the 40 years since the passing of the great Town and Country Planning Act 1947. First, there must be reasonable certainty about what the planning regime is and what the Government's policies are. That is essential to ensure confidence.

Secondly, we have learnt that ad hoc changes to our planning system are bad. Thirdly, experience has shown that Government guidelines—whether in circulars or elsewhere—must be unambiguous. There is too much equivocation today on issues relating to development and conservation.

Fourthly, continuing initiatives are necessary to bring forward land that is suitable for development in our cities. I see nothing wrong in the Government setting targets for individual local authorities because I believe that they have a fair inkling of the amount of derelict or unused land in their areas.

Fifthly, there is a need for more positive management of and commitment to the conservation of our countryside. Sixthly, the planning system should be made flexible to cover different needs and conditions in different parts of Britain. That should not be done by stripping away whole parts of the planning system because of short-term needs or whims. Changes must be carefully worked out, and I recognise the great progress that the Government have made on that. They have continued to protect certain parts of the country, especially the countryside, but have made the planning regime much more flexible and much simpler in areas where there is a desperate need to encourage redevelopment.

Seventhly, whatever town and country planning system we have, different types of decision will still need to be taken at different levels. Clearly, there is a part to be played—perhaps the greatest part—by local planning authorities, in the sense of local district councils, but there is also a need for a larger or county overview in, for example, matters relating to nature conservation. I hope that that will assume a greater importance in the Government's policies, especially as a result of the changing regime in agriculture. However, there is also a need for a regional overview, even if there is not a need for statutory regional authorities.

I believe that SERPLAN the South-East Regional Planning Council—can work. I do not say this in a party political sense, but the experience of the Greater London council showed that there was conflict between the GLC and many of the London boroughs. There should be an attempt at consensus. I hope that individual London boroughs will work in harmony with SERPLAN and the London planning advisory committee.

The Government should build on our 40 years' experience of our town and country planning laws. There must be a common-sense attitude if we are to succeed in reconstructing our inner cities, caring for and containing our towns and suburbs, and conserving our countryside.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I welcome the choice of subject of the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman). It is a subject that he knows a lot about and about which he is known to know a lot. I do not disagree with one word that he said. I hope that his remarks have made it clear that for 40 years or thereabouts, there has been consensus in Britain, among politicians who have considered the issue and the people who are knowlegeable about it, that we need to use planning and the tools of intervention, by both Government and local government, to balance the interests of housing and conservation—and, indeed, that is what has happened.

The debate has made it clear that the Secretary of State —I concede this willingly—has accepted that there will be intervention. He has not pretended that there will be a free-market approach with no restrictions. As the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet knows, part of my constituency is in the London Docklands development corporation area, and I see the evidence of intervention around me, as we try to attract into the inner city, thereby regenerating it, what would otherwise go to rural or suburban Britain, or to the home counties. It is right that we reaffirm all-party support for the right approach, which is to intervene in the right way to make sure that there is the right balance.

As to the point made by the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies), unfortunately, the electoral system means that I am the only visible representative of my party from the south-east. My party received half the votes of his party, but the electoral system did not give us half the seats. If it were fairer, there would be more of us here. It is even more unfair because it gives the Labour party, which had even fewer votes than we did, one more seat in the south-east.

I shall be brief because it is right that there should be contributions from as wide a cross-section of opinion in the House as possible. However, I wish to reaffirm my party's commitment to the green belt. This is the first opportunity that I have had to do so under slightly different colours. It is my hope that our colours will become ever more green.

The green belt policy has demonstrated—we have added to this over recent years—the need to resist market forces as the only arbiter of environmental decisions. When developers are queuing to grab land around urban Britain, particularly around London, the green belt is of great importance. My colleagues have always considered that the pressure that developers exert, which increases as the economy expands, means that we have to consider the green belt as even more important. As the pressure increases, it becomes more important that the methods to resist the pressure are seen as strong.

We have to use the green belt not just to preserve the lung around London and other urban areas but to allow other rural communities to have their own identity and characteristics. Recreation, good agriculture and environmental regeneration are all proper. The green belt has not restricted the availability of jobs or growth, and should be seen as a benefit, not as a disadvantage. Furthermore, we must remember that we have the stewardship of the land for future generations and it is not there just for our use. Therefore, our response should be to need, and we should not use demand as the governing criterion.

My party and other Opposition Members have the suspicion that the pressure is greater because of the links between developers and the present Government party. That is evidenced to be a fact, and the row that goes on is the battle between the electors, whose representatives are here and who are concerned to resist development pressure, and some of the Government's paymasters, who clearly want to develop more and find profit in doing so.

When the Secretary of State turned down the application by Consortium Developments Ltd. for a new town at Tillingham Hall, that was not entirely unwelcome to the developers. Consortium Developments Ltd. saw encouragement for its processes of building new towns around the south-east. David Crewe of that company wrote, in the Municipal Journal of 15 April 1988, an article entitled "Case for building new-town hamlets". He made the case that Consortium Developments' basic concept of new towns was supported by the Tillingham Hall decision.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet left out one crucial point. It is that the interests of developers do not coincide with what the Secretary of State, in his speech last week to the Bow Group, described as meeting the needs of those

"at the bottom of the pile".

Developers want straightforwardly to do the kind of building that enables them to make the most profit in the shortest time. Generally, that means up-market homes in desirable green field sites, or along the river in London, which sell for high prices.

The hon. Member cited figures that we can all use, showing that what is needed is not expensive five and six-bedroomed houses in the green belt but sheltered housing for the elderly or homes for single people, which are rented cheap or purchased cheap. There is room for that in the inner city and in infill sites in small villages. In each village, there are probably one or two such sites. I come from a rural background and my mother is chairman of a parish council, and my ear is regularly bent on this issue.

We have to develop gradually, and there are methods for doing so. The Government could bring into use the capital receipts of local authorities and spend them on regeneration and on the sort of housing that is needed. The Government could allow local authorities to be properly funded and could provide a fiscal incentive to building work on existing sites rather than green field sites, whether by alteration of VAT or by some other method. The Government could also put a tax on derelict inner-city land, and I asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question on this. If we respond to the increasing number of households, then we must respond with the appropriate type of housing. The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet left out that one element—that the housing has to be of the right type.

As Government Members will know, in the structure plans for their counties—whether Bedfordshire or Berkshire—there is an over-supply of land as compared with requirements over the next five years. For example, in Bedfordshire the over-supply is 118 per cent., in Berkshire it is 105 to 122 per cent., in Buckinghamshire, 108 to 143 per cent., in East Sussex 126 per cent. and so on. In West Sussex, it is 177 per cent.——

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): What about Wiltshire?

Mr. Hughes: Sadly, my figures do not go far enough west to include Wiltshire. I know that the hon. Gentleman has a valid concern.

In every county in the south-east, there is an over-provision in the structure plan, so there is not the pressure that the developers argue there is. Land is available if inner-city land is used as well.

Surely Government policy should be to proceed slowly. Surely the approach should be incremental, and to infill and to see whether the housing legislation going through the House releases empty property for private letting. That is the way to proceed—certainly but slowly. The figures in London and the south-east are telling. In the private sector, there are 177,000 empty properties and in other sectors, including local authorities, 44,200. That is nearly 250,000 empty properties. If Government policies will bring those back into use, then let them be brought back into use first before we start building on either green belt or green field areas, with disadvantageous results for the local communities.

We have the property and we have provided the land. We must be more clear, and the message coming from the House and Ministers must be clear: it is that green belt and the conservation and protection of our environment—urban and rural—will be the hallmark of Government green belt and housing policy.

5.18 pm

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): I join in the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) not only for his selection of the subject today, which is suddenly topical, but on the thoughtful way in which he presented his argument—an argument with which I do not think anyone in the Chamber will disagree. As has been said, he has a distinguished professional background. I thank him for referring to the work of the Select Committee on the Environment. As a former distinguished member of that Committee, he has contributed greatly to the two reports that we produced on this topic, one in 1984 on the green belt and land for housing and one in 1986 on the planning appeal system.

I found some similarities between what my hon. Friend was saying today and some of the conclusions reached in those reports and the recommendations that he was instrumental in making. He was right to say that the main problem in this field is and always has been the tension between those who want to develop in response to social needs and those who want to conserve that which already exists.

In comparison with other countries, our planning system has served us very well, although it is always possible to point to individual decisions which could, perhaps with advantage, have been different. We do not need to go as far afield as Japan to see the value of our planning system. Some European countries could well have done with a planning system similar to ours, because in those countries beautiful areas have been spoiled by indiscriminate development.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet was right to say that the essential ingredient in the success of our planning system is the green belt policy. One must appreciate and understand the objectives of that policy, and we must not confuse green belt with green field. That is happening in many of the discussions that are taking place. Green belts are there to stop the growth of large built-up areas, to create around them a sort of cordon sanitaire in order to contain them. Secondly, green belts are to stop urban areas merging with one another and creating an extensive urban sprawl that is virtually without end. Thirdly, the green belt protects the special character of some of our historic cities.

There should be a fourth objective, and it is the one that the Select Committee urged the Government to include in a circular. It should be to assist urban regeneration: through containment, pressures begin to bear upon inner cities with derelict land that can be brought back into effective and economic use. That should be clearly stated in circulars and should not simply be given in answers to parliamentary questions that I have asked from time to time. That is insufficient for people outside the House, because it does not enable them to understand and appreciate that part of Government policy.

I congratulate the Government on the steps that they have taken to increase the effectiveness of urban regeneration. Only a month or two ago, we had a statement from the Secretary of State about the restructuring of derelict land and urban regeneration grants into a new and simplified system. I was assured at the time, and I hope, that that system will be demand-led and not cash-limited. Whatever the Treasury may say, that is essential if we are to encourage developers to move into our inner cities and regenerate land which at the moment has a negative value.

I recognise the acceptance and the adherence of the Government to a green belt policy and an urban regeneration policy. However, people do not have a sacrosanct right to say that no further development may take place in other areas. It is selfish for people to say that as they are the last people to move into an area nobody else can move there. If such people are not living in a green belt or in an area of outstanding natural beauty which, because of its nature, requires some kind of protection, it is quite unacceptable for them to take such a view.

We must recognise the changing nature of our society. We have improved transport systems and different methods of work and people do not necessarily need to be huddled one upon the other in flats in the centre of towns. People should aspire to a different lifestyle during their working life as well as in their retirement. If society adopts that course, our legal structures must be adapted in order to meet that demand while ensuring that excesses do not take place.

This is where I begin to quarrel with the Government. I accept that there is a tension between developers and conservationists; although that poses a dilemma for the Government, they should give a far clearer lead and a clearer picture of their policy than they have done hitherto.

In its report on planning appeals of 1986, the Select Committee identified a mismatch between central and local government planning objectives. The Select Committee noted the vagueness of circulars and it seemed, at the time that the Committee's report was being written, that planning law was being decided by the appeal system. One did not know what was likely to happen until one appealed to the Secretary of State who made the decision. The guidelines were not clear enough to show whether an appeal was likely to succeed. That led to the appeals system becoming bogged down, burdensome and expensive, both to the local planning authorities and to the developers.

The Government should carefully note the last seven points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet. He said that there must be a clearer and more positive policy and that vagueness should be abandoned. I think that he said—if he did not, I certainly say to the members of the Government party who have the good fortune to represent fair county seats—that whatever the pressures from constituents, they should remember that other people in these emerald isles also have a right to enjoy living among the green fields.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): I join in congratulating the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on initiating this debate. I endorse his call for integrity in the planning system and welcome the degree to which that view has been supported.

There was a reference to the number of Labour Members in the House. There is 100 per cent. representation from Labour Members representing south-eastern seats outside London because I am here. Perhaps some hon. Members are hesitant about intruding on private grief and being party to the deepening split between the Secretary of State for the Environment and the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). The right hon. Member for Henley represents a small corner of my garden and has succeeded in safeguarding it from development—except for the part where I have built my compost heap.

[Mr. Andrew Smith]

I agree with the Secretary of State for the Environment on two key points. First, I agree that there is an acute need for extra housing in the south-east. Conservative Members have conceded that that is beyond doubt although we might argue about the precise figures. Secondly, if nothing is done it is the poor who will suffer most of all. So far that point has not been touched on very much. I emphasise that the attitude of the Government and the Secretary of State to local councils in their efforts to provide, directly or in partnership with housing associations, housing to meet local needs is one of opposition. Putting every barrier in the way of local authorities does not help to get a solution to the intense housing problems facing people in the south-east.

Oxford city council has been one of the main victims of the barrier put in the way of lease-back deals in the Secretary of State's recent announcement. The Development of 1,300 houses on green fields next to my house has been at least substantially delayed. The wherewithal to finance a scheme that had the support of the city, south Oxfordshire and the county council will now be found with difficulty, if at all. Ironically, one of the only alternatives would be to sell the whole thing off for speculative housing development, which would not meet local need and would aggravate the problems.

I see the solution to the housing problems confronting the south-east neither in the market liberalism of the Secretary of State—tempered though it may be—nor in the "not-in-my-back-yardism" of the right hon. Member for Henley. If we exercise the rigid restraint for which some Conservative Members in the south-east have called, the pressure will simply build up to intolerable levels in existing urban areas. There will be more and more subdivision of existing properties, and the onward march of multiple occupation will proceed through the suburbs. Furthermore, thousands more will be condemned to live in appalling conditions—in homeless family accommodation, crammed into unsuitable and damp homes, or crowding on to the increasing number of caravan sites proliferating around the edges of the urban areas.

The policy of the Department of the Environment seems to make matters worse rather than better. The Use Classes Order, in effectively deregulating planning control where six people or fewer are sharing a house, has given rise to considerable pressures in my constituency, and I know that the same applies in Cambridge and other southern towns. It gives the local authority no control over the uses to which residential accommodation is put. I fear that the deregulation in the Housing Bill will simply worsen the problem, and make it very much more difficult for families to find accommodation that they can afford.

The reason why we face such difficulties, and why Conservative Members have a particular problem, is a contradiction at the heart of Government policy and current Conservative ideology. The Government advocate the free market and the free movement of capital. They give the free market priority, whether trade unionists are attempting to intervene to protect their members' interests or democratically elected councils are standing up for the interests of the local population. As a consequence, we have seen the free market operating to generate a high degree of economic growth in the south-east, sucking in capital from other regions. We have also seen many people taking the advice of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), getting on their bikes and finding work in the south-east. Although I concede that there may be a small net emigration from the south-east, that is not inconsistent with pressure from the immigration of people looking for jobs.

Workers who come to my surgeries—as I am sure that they come to those of other south-east Members—have seen job advertisements in the local paper, after being unemployed for five or 10 years, and have come down from Scotland or Liverpool, taking the advice of the right hon. Member for Chingford. They have found work and then been unable to find accommodation for love or money. They cannot afford to buy or to rent on the private market, and the council waiting lists are too long for them to have any prospect of accommodation in the foreseeable future. The same is true of housing associations. Nothing in the Government's present proposals or in the Housing Bill will make the position other than much worse. Those people should not be forgotten—people who are separated from their families, which causes the same marital pressure, anxiety and worry that afflicts many thousands in south-east England who cannot find or afford accommodation even when they have been born and brought up here.

I am pleased that Conservative Members are showing some awareness that intervention is necessary in the form of planning controls and an effective regional economic policy. Let me emphasise how important that is. The failure and relative absence of regional policy in recent years bears a large part of the responsibility. I am not saying that it would solve all the problems, but it could certainly alleviate them. We need a much more determined programme of investment in infrastructure and services in the depressed regions. We need a total change in the Government's attitude towards local authorities, with which they should be working in partnership to bring about economic regeneration in other parts of the country, which could lift some of the pressure in the south-east. Similarly, the Government should be working in partnership with local authorities in southern England to address local housing needs.

Let me suggest some of the steps that I think should be taken. In the difficult planning decisions that come before local authorities, there should be an effective voice for local people. Such are the capital surpluses that can be generated by the sort of speculative developments that we see in the south-east that it pays developers every time to engage high-calibre advice, and to put together an effective progaganda machine in favour of their developments. Local people, and increasingly even local authorities, are hard put to match that when it comes either to the planning process or to a public inquiry. The Government should address themselves to the funding of objectors.

I urge the Government to work within the framework and in harmony with democratically formulated county structure and local plans. A number of proposals—including one at Stone Bassett, not far from my constituency—are in clear contradiction of the structure plan. They do not fall within the green belt. The more that the Secretary of State talks about the need to protect the green belt the more worried local people become about other areas of open countryside—notwithstanding the fact that our structure plan clearly indicates parts of the county to which development should be steered.

If—as is the case—additional housing is required, there should be a general increase in targets, and it should be up to local authorities, in consultation with local people, to identify the appropriate pieces of land. Adding some houses in a number of different villages is a possibility: that can do something for village life, and for the economic and social vitality of individual villages. We also wish to see redundant urban land brought into use. But however it is done, it must carry local opinion with it wherever possible. Above all—I do not expect this from the present Government—it is essential to get to grips with the massive amounts of capital to be made in profits on speculative developments.

At present, agricultural land in Oxfordshire sells for about £2,000 an acre and residential land is worth between £500,000 and £1 million an acre, depending on where it is. There are proposals for a 600-acre development at Stone Bassett, which means that there is a potential profit of at least £300 million before one starts. That gives a massive incentive for speculative development by the consortium of developers.

I believe that attempting to plan that process without getting to grips with land values is like trying to steer a car without being able to regulate the engine. As it runs increasingly faster, each little twitch on the steering wheel threatens some damage. I concede that attempts in the past to extract for the community a fair share of development value have not been organised as well as they should or worked as well as one would want. It is an area to which a responsible Government would address themselves, so that those windfall profits do not simply fall into the hands of speculators, but are available to the community as a whole, which, after all, gives the planning approval concerning what is the heritage of us all. It is the community, not the developers, who should benefit.

Sir Hugh Rossi: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned an important point. I hope that the Labour party has learnt from the errors of the past and will not return to the concept of a development land tax or a betterment levy, which were a total failure. The figures are £5 administration costs for every £1 recovered. Section 152 agreements are a far better way of clawing back to the community some of the benefits of the development.

Mr. Smith: I have heard at least one Conservative Member advocate taxation on undeveloped urban land. The principle that, where development takes place, a fair share should come back to the community, is sound and should be pursued with all vigour.

If the form of agreement suggested by the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) could be strengthened and given real bite, and could take the heat and incentive out of the motive to the speculators, I, and certainly the Labour party, would look at that, but one thing remains certain. That is that, as long as there are large profits to be made, as at present, any land that might be taken for development in the south-east will continue to be at risk.

I urge the Government to do this, and Labour would do it where the Conservatives would not. We must examine the distributional aspect, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said. We must consider who will get the houses. It is not simply a matter of where they go and how many there are; it is a matter of who will live in them and be able to afford to do so. Again, if it is left to the market, all those speculative developments will cater primarily for up-market housing. They will not meet the needs of those who are in overcrowded accommodation, stuck on caravan sites or, as is happening increasingly, having to share accommodation with relatives or commute back to Liverpool or Kilmarnock every other weekend to see their family.

What is needed is much stronger and more deliberate intervention to ensure that, where there is development, it provides low-cost accommodation to rent, municipal accommodation available for allocation on the basis of need, or accommodation that housing associations can allocate on the basis of need. I emphasise that low-cost housing for purchase should be provided.

The state of affairs at Stone Bassett gives rise to a great deal of concern in Oxfordshire. The land is outside both the Oxford and London green belts, but it is of a high amenity value—visually, I believe. The proposals are opposed strongly locally by immediately neighbouring residents and villages, which one might expect. However, there is also a great deal of concern across the county that in itself the development will add to the pressure on local services to an extent that will not be compensated by the benefits to the community that the developers might make available. Moreover, there is a great deal of concern that any such development is unlikely to meet local housing needs.

There is also strong concern, so vigorously has the proposal been opposed by the Member of Parliament, the right hon. Member for Henley, and such is the vehemence with which the row between himself and the Secretary of State is developing, that there might be a temptation for the Government to approve the scheme precisely because it falls in the right hon. Gentleman's patch. I hope and trust that that will not happen.

The Government and all parties must look afresh at the Town and Country Planning Act and how it operates when there is such intense pressure for development in the south-east. It often seemed to me, as the chairman of a planning committee for several years, that, in regard to development control, the present operation of the Act is too negative, in that the onus is on what one turns down rather than on what one positively advocates. It is too passive in that local authorities have to wait for developments to come to them, rather than being able to plan the best developments in the light of local needs.

The Act is permissive in that the onus is on local authorities to grant planning permission except where there is good reason not to do so and even when they might have good ideas about what might be a preferable scheme. The Act should be made more positive and pro-active. It should be combined with stronger and more effective regional policy and a genuine willingness to get to grips with land values and to ensure that, where developments takes place, they are applied to the benefit of the whole community.

If Conservative Members who are grasping their way towards realising the importance of interventionism were prepared to go further in that direction, no one would welcome it more than me. As the people of the south-east recognise increasingly that intervention, both locally and nationally, is essential to address the growing problems and stresses arising from the economic pressure in the south-east, they will also recognise increasingly that, if interventionism is what is called for, it is best to elect a Government who genuinely believe in it, rather than try to press the case on a Government who so manifestly do not.

5.48 pm

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on selecting this subject for debate. Many of my hon. Friends and I believe that the issue is of greater importance than the Government currently realise. Any opportunity to give it a full airing is welcome because there is great depth of public feeling about it in many parts of the country.

Last week there were two events of substantial importance, relevant to this subject. First, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a full statement of the Government's position in a speech to the Bow Group. He set out the reasons that prompted the Government to permit a record level of housing development over recent years, and tried to justify why it should continue for the foreseeable future. Secondly, he found himself in the embarassing position of having to acknowledge that his estimates of household growth in the south-east were understated by no fewer than 150,000 households—some 33 per cent.—and that the counties in Serplan should make provision accordingly. Such an error hardly gives me much confidence in the methodology of the Department of the Environment, since the last figures were issued only in 1986.

There is no serious philosophical difference about whether we should have planning controls. They have been with us through all colours of Government for some 40 years and any proposal to sweep them away would be unthinkable and unacceptable. That said, the Government are the final arbiter and, like it not, they have the ultimate responsibility for the strategic planning decisions that effect the nation. At the end of the line, they decide the quality of life of many of our people. They cannot abrogate that responsibility, nor should they. But to conclude, as this Government are doing, that all demands for housing should be met regardless of the consequences for others, is just as irresponsible to present and future generations as abandoning all attempts at planning and merely giving way to market forces.

The difficulties of house building on a massive scale over a short period without the necessary supporting infrastructure came vividly to my attention during the huge housing developments that took place in my constituency. In discussing my anxiety with hon. Friends, the great national importance of this question became apparent. Around every major conurbation developers have been active, and nowhere more so than in the south-east. Therefore, it is disastrous news to hear that the Government expect house building to continue in the south-east at no less than the present rate well into the next century.

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister that the strength of feeling in the Conservative party can best be measured by the fact that 93 colleagues like to have notice of meetings that I may arrange on the subject. It is wrong to suggest that we wish to stop all building at a stroke, but many of us believe that in certain areas the pace must be drastically reduced—at least until recent building can be sensibly absorbed, the roads are upgraded to cope with the extra population, schools and hospitals are built, and open spaces and recreational facilities are dealt with, together with all the other amenities that are normally provided for an established community.

My hon. Friends may have seen the pamphlet "This Pleasant Land" which some of us published. It points to the complementary and acknowledged problems of our inner cities. It cannot be right that our major cities are allowed to fall into a state of dereliction while those who work in them must move further and further out to live and, in the case of London, to live beyond the green belt on massive housing developments which create heavy pressures on all the existing community facilities. The Government recognise the problems of the inner cities and we support what they are doing, but we cannot understand why we do not receive a more sympathetic hearing for our reasoned arguments against green field building beyond the green belt.

The Government can make a start on solving this problem by administrative means. First, they must restore the power of the district council as the principal planning authority. It is best placed to recognise local feelings and the merits or otherwise of individual applications. The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) touched on that when he too made a plea for the recognition of local feeling, for it is on that that we base our case. The Government must realise that, if they do everything centrally, they are bound to face this sort of criticism.

The cancellation or modification of the circular that requires each district to have a five-year land bank would also be required. Many districts are finding their decisions reversed on appeal because they do not have one. That obligation has been the developers' charter. Many district councils without such a land bank are forced to allow unwanted developments because they know that their decisions will be reversed on appeal and, naturally, they wish to avoid the costs involved.

In his speech on Tuesday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State pointed out that some districts, faced with an unpopular application which the council might welcome, reject it in the knowledge that the Minister will subsequently allow it and so eventually carry the odium. Either way, the Government get it wrong and in neither case does the district council get its way. I understand that my proposal would drastically slow the rate of development in some areas, but others would welcome the opportunity to encourage development. I deplore the Government's reluctance to make these vital changes.

My hon. Friend mentioned the concrete desert of Tokyo. The other day I was in Los Angeles and was told that Greater Los Angeles spreads for no fewer than 250 miles. We do not have space on our little island to spread like that; and the electorate is overwhelmingly opposed to a concrete jungle from Kent to Somerset and from Hampshire to Cambridge. Time is no longer on our side. In his speech my right hon. Friend spoke of the need to house the families of existing inhabitants. They are today's electorate and if they had strong feelings and shared his fears, surely they would say so.

Usually, the Conservative party has been highly sensitive to the feelings of its supporters, and in this case in particular the Goverment would be most unwise to ignore the huge groundswell of popular opinion that is opposed to their present policy. It is our intention to keep this matter in the forefront of debate until we obtain a meaningful response from the Government which will allay the fears of our constituents.

5.56 pm

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I join my hon. Friends in congratulating our hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on the many wise statements he made. I should like to concentrate on his plea to the Government to be more flexible in their planning policies and to differentiate more expertly and firmly and with greater stability on the differences between one area and another. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will reply to that specific point, which has been echoed by other hon. Members.

I have some sympathy with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. He has a difficult problem to deal with, as my hon. Friend recognised, and he has undoubtedly been shocked by the new extrapolation of the population. That has been leapt on by some builders as a sort of new builders' charter, but we know that such forecasts are not to be taken literally—and they know that, too. Forecasts are no more than an attempt to extrapolate current trends. They are done every two years and vary widely. They fluctuate and change, so they provide no firm guidance about what should happen in future. We all believe in the importance of planning controls, not least my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi). We have destiny in our hands; it is not left to the whim or the extrapolation of some expert from a census return. We can do something about this, and we should.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was not his usual charitable self in his comments about constituents when he suggested that they were all afflicted by this new disease called nimbyism. There may be one or two, and why not? After all, many people are like that wherever they are. It is to be expected. Some take rather short-term notice of their wider social obligations to the community and the nation's housing problems, but generally I do not find that to be the case.

The area I know best mostly encompasses a large chunk of east Sussex within the boundaries of Wealden district council, which is highly innovative. I shall tell my hon. Friends what we have done there, and this is no account of people stricken by nimbyism. Between 1976 and 1986, the district council areas saw a 13 per cent. increase in housing stock—about 6,000 new houses. During that period, the population increased by about 11 per cent.—at a time when the population in the nation as a whole was not increasing.

The district has many small towns. When I was first elected about 20 years ago, the town of Crowborough had a population of 8,000. In 10 years, it had increased to 17,000, and between now and 1996 we expect it to reach 22,000. The population will have increased three times in one generation. How many hon. Members could point to such an increase in population in the small or even medium-sized towns in their constituencies? It has not just happened in one town in my constituency. It has happened in other towns which people still like to call villages. Nor should we forget that it has happened in a constituency a large part of which has been designated an area of outstanding natural beauty.

The phraseology used by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his speech to the Bow Group can only have exacerbated the anxieties that were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin). The pace shows no sign of slackening. We must gird our loins and stop our nimbyism. We must expect more building on green field sites. That will not mean infilling in my area. It will mean moving straight into areas of outstanding natural beauty. That is where the conflict lies. Not only my small corner of the south-east will be affected. As hon. Members who represent other parts of the south-east know, the problem will affect them, too. That passage in my right hon. Friend's speech is bound to increase anxiety.

The rural parts of some of the most beautiful areas of England are becoming semi-rural, and the semi-rural parts are becoming urbanised, with all the consequent costs and struggle in extending the infrastructure of schools, roads, health and social services, water and sewerage. All those extra services are required at a time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer and other members of the Administration tell us to be careful about our capital costs. The two do not go hand in hand.

What makes the problem much more difficult is circular 15/84. My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare and I have been to see the Department about the five-year supply of land for housing, and we questioned the number of times that Department inspectors had overruled the district councils on appeal. Since our meeting, the position has improved. The difficulty with the circular is that it enjoins district councils always to maintain a five-year supply of land. No sooner are applications for development granted than more land must be included. We cannot continue year after year to pretend that the countryside is sacrosanct and that the quality of life in those villages and towns will be preserved if we must always have a five-year bank of land for building. It leaves no time to plan, let alone to finance the increasing demands of improving the infrastructure.

That is why in the excellent pamphlet—"This Pleasant Land"—to which I lent my name, although none of the writing was done by me, we say:

> "County or District Councils should have the power to prohibit substantial housing or other development in towns and villages where, for architectural, geographical or historical reasons, it would be unsuitable and have a deleterious effect on the existing environment."

The Government try to give the impression that their policies will meet the demand for housing, and their weapon is the release of more land. Of course, if there is no more land, there can be no more building. We see all the perils that I have mentioned, but we do not see the housing problem being solved. Building in the south will certainly not solve the nation's housing problems. Nor will it solve our economic or industrial problems. Land is limited, and the lesson is clear: the Department believes that the market force is in the direction of the south and it does not wish to do anything about it. In that case, its planning procedures are completely against those of the Secretaries of State for Employment and for Industry, the thrust of whose policies is to say, "We do not want the economy of the south-east to overheat. We wish to encourage the development of better housing and a better ambience in the inner cities so that the north and the midlands can become more attractive."

In my constituency, the people who need housing are being priced out of the market, despite the Government's planning policy. I do not know what has happened in the council represented by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). It must be dozy. My district council does not believe that it must intervene or that it should build massive housing estates of the sort that litter the rural and semi-rural landscape. It believes that it can harness private enterprise by encouraging home ownership and house sales with schemes involving joint venture, do-it-yourself shared ownership and self-build. It pursues innovative policies such as mixed tenure schemes for the elderly, and offering property for leasehold purchase, shared ownership or renting. It gets into the same financial planning bed as building societies, housing associations and the like. Much progress has been made.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson-Smith: I would rather not. The hon. Gentleman spoke for 20 minutes, and I do not wish to do the same. Many other hon. Members wish to speak. He will probably discover that there is not much difference between us.

The district council is not unwilling to recognise the need for growth, nor has it lagged behind in providing the land necessary to meet housing needs. But our central point is that we are not meeting the housing needs of the very poor, and the threat of releasing more land causes tension and anxiety. Over-development not only causes invasion of the countryside but destroys the quality of life in our towns and villages.

Against that background, I urge the Government to pay more regard to the points that have been made—some in this debate and some outside the House. First, they should accept that, as there is no free market in land, planning controls should ensure a fairer balance between housing and environmental needs. That means accepting that there is too much substandard housing in London, which is one reason why people want to leave. The SERPLAN report says that housing renovation has been reduced and that if the current rates continue there will be a considerable deterioration in the housing stock. My area has experienced an influx of people from London who want better housing and better schools for their children. If we allow the housing stock to decline and do not begin to arrest the deterioration, we shall accelerate the trend.

One need only look at the north and south banks of the Thames as well as the eastern Thames corridor to realise what a disgraceful state they are in. We look to the Government to ensure, with a combination of public and private enterprise—just as Wealden district council has done—that we get cracking to improve those areas so that people will want to live there and industry will want to move there. Then people can live in a decent environment in an urban area without having to travel miles across the countryside to work. They want to be close to work, and we have the facilities to provide it.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: No. I do normally, but I want to finish my speech so that other hon. Members can speak.

The SERPLAN report says that the land supply for housing over the next five years is considerably more than that required by structure plans. I do not see the need, therefore, for the huge demand for building on green field sites. The report continues:

"For the decade 1981-1991, estimated house building activity will exceed earlier estimates used in preparing the strategy."

The SERPLAN reports points out—SERPLAN is supposed to be the expert in this regard—that,

"for the first half of the 1990s county provisions, taken together, will meet over 60 per cent. of the regional guidance figure for the decade 1991-2001."

That is a pretty good record. Of course there are regions where not enough is being done. The Minister should turn his mind to those regions and not threaten places such as east Sussex.

The SERPLAN continues:

"More attention needs to be paid ... to access to housing."

The problem of access to housing raises the question of those who are just above the benefit level, who are confronted with difficulties in London and in my constituency.

The general sense of the debate is that we are not suffering from nimbyism; we are happy to play our part. We understand that in future there will be pressures and we shall do our best to meet them. There could not be a more co-operative group of people in the private or public sector than those in the area circumscribed by Wealden council, which forms a large part of my constituency. We shall not be able to co-operate with the necessary good will that the Government would expect; we shall not be able to preserve the heritage of our country unless we have a clearer definition of what the Government want to happen in our rural areas.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The wind-up speeches are expected at 6.30 pm. Many hon. Members wish to speak, so I appeal again for very brief speeches.

6.11 pm

Mr. Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): I shall try to be brief and I shall not refer to previous comments.

I should like to move the focus of the debate from the south to the midlands. I should not like it to be thought to be an exclusively southern preserve. I want to move from housing and discuss other aspects of planning coontrol. As to the housing issue, the arguments that I have heard are leading to the conclusion that we need another new town. I speak as an hon. Member who has had a new town constituency. New towns seem to be an answer to many of the points made about urban sprawl taking place beyond the green belt and in green fields. In case I am accused of trying to move the problem elsewhere, I should say that under the structure plan in my constituency we have unwillingly accepted a total of nearly 4,500 extra houses over the next three years.

With the completion of the M42 and the announcement that will shortly be made of the western orbital route around the west midlands conurbation—in the context of the local government boundary review—Birmingham city council is publishing proposals, which have not yet been put to the commission, to expand Birmingham as far as the motorways. It is expanding the boundaries not to preserve the green belt but with a view to development. I should like to hear an assurance from the Government about planning in the green belt following the construction of motorways. I think that that might interest a number of other hon. Members.

In a letter dated 19 January 1985, the Minister's predecessor wrote to me to say:

"The construction and eventual opening of that motorway will not affect the green belt status of the land in any way. If the motorway creates development pressures, then it will be the planning policies of the County and District councils that will have to handle those pressures."

The letter continues to refer to a policy statement about the M25. I fear that the contents of the letter will be set at naught if the ambitions of Birmingham and Solihull are realised. I should like clarification from the Minister about that matter and confirmation that there will be opportunity for public consultation—the views of those living in the area.

A further letter that I received dated 30 October 1985 said:

"There will be extensive consultations, and the opportunity will be given for all local authorities concerned including those authorities with adjacent boundaries and for the public to put forward their views, and be consulted on any proposals that are put forward."

I must tell my hon. Friend the Minister that there is widespread public concern that the extension of Birmingham and Solihull will be put through by a local government boundary review body without adequate opportunity for public opinion to be tested in the affected areas. In an area surrounding a conurbation there are constant pressures on the land, often to allow it to go into disuse so that it may later form the basis of an acceptable application for planning permission. I am happy to say that in part of my constituency that progressive wastage is being countered by an urban fringe project to which the Government have contributed.

In my constituency we experience problems with massive poultry houses and widespread tipping. Those poultry houses are excluded, if they are of certain dimensions, from the operation of planning control under class VI of the general development order. As such, those buildings, which are not only of considerable floor area but reach up to 20 ft in height, surmounted by noisy electric fans that are in constant operation, may be built next to somebody's home without planning permission, consideration of disposal of the slurry or access of trade vehicles to the premises.

I understand only too well the pressure on the farming community and the need to look for alternative uses of land, but those factory units are a clear abuse of the general development order. I should like to hear that the proposals for stricter controls that were mentioned in a letter from the Minister dated 26 October 1987 are making progress.

As to tipping, land under the general development order land filled in for agricultural purposes is excluded from control. Thus, it falls to the county council as the waste disposal authority—the district council has no standing in the matter—to license the tipping operations. In effect, that is limited to setting conditions governing tipping, which prove extremely difficult to enforce. In practice, it has been found in my constituency ever since I represented it that those tipping operations encompassed not merely filling of the land but domestic and industrial waste and occasionally poisonous chemicals.

The controls are not adequate to deal with the problem, quite apart from the question of damage done to roads and verges and the flooding occasioned by the use of country lanes by traffic for which they were not designed. It appears that the tipper makes no financial contribution to the cost of repairing or widening those roads. It must be borne by the ratepayer, who has not only the nuisance but the penalty of having to pay for it. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister, when considering the general development order, will give consideration to the question of financial contributions.

Finally, there is the question of councils awarding themselves planning permission, which I believe can lead to abuse. My district council gave itself planning permission for a hotel on a set of allotments while turning down a private application. In those circumstances, it is djfficult to convince the developer that the council's decision was unbiased. I hope that when the planning controls are reviewed consideration will be given to that difficult question.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I shall be extremely brief and ultra-selective so that others have the opportunity to take part in the debate.

I believe that the Government's broad strategy is absolutely right. Urban and suburban regeneration and development should be the main thrust of housing and planning policy and the green belt must remain sacrosanct, although there will be a need for some topping up by green field development to accommodate the 2 million additional households that will need accommodation by the end of the century.

Two further points have been insufficiently stressed in the debate so far. All Members are significantly influenced by constituency experience, and I am no exception. In my constituency, the demand for housing is overwhelmingly locally generated. It is not a matter of people flooding in from other parts of the country. We had the major development in the 1970s and early 1980s. Now another generation is growing up and its demand for housing must be met. Insufficient attention has been paid to the fact that we are not drawing people down from the midlands, the north, or wherever, but predominantly seeking to provide housing in Basingstoke for Basingstoke people.

Insufficient attention has also been paid to the revival of the rural economy, although my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) alluded to this briefly. I believe that the problem is far greater and cannot be considered in isolation from questions of planning. To solve the economic problems of agriculture and to restore balance to village communities, the release of some green field sites is necessary. Ironically, many of the constituents who write to us protesting about planning applications are the very people who complain about village schools being closed, bus routes cut and shops closed down and sold.

I suspect that in this context my views differ slightly from those of some of my hon. Friends in that I am not entirely afraid of green field development. On the contrary, I believe that it has a significant part to play in planning policy and that some of the fears expressed are not entirely justified.

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): My hon. Friends the Members for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) and for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) have considerable experience in planning matters. I very much hope that the points that they have made today will be taken into account as I find myself in full agreement with almost all that they have said.

As has already been mentioned in several speeches, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a speech on these matters last week. I especially welcome those passages in which he spoke of the policy to maintain the green belt. It is important that they be fully publicised as they have not so far received a very fair press and people have been left with a somewhat confused impression of what my right hon. Friend was saying about the green belt.

The Government's record in this respect is good. Appeal decisions and structure plan decisions have maintained the green belt. I welcome especially the comments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the needs of people living in towns. He said:

"They need parks and green spaces and gardens too and resent the implication that all development can just be dumped in their back yard. Remember too that the concept of green belt was to give 'green lungs' for city dwellers."

I presume that that also covers metropolitan open land —the open space within London recognised by my right hon. Friend's predecessors as of strategic importance for the metropolis as a whole.

I am not satisfied that the Government's commitment to the green belt and to metropolitan open land is fully understood either by the people who are to benefit from it or by the press and the developers. It is important to consider why that is so. One reason, in my view, is that whenever the Secretary of State is confronted with a thoroughly outrageous planning application to develop green belt or open space, perhaps in a massive way, he feels constrained to adopt a policy of silence in the belief that he has no power to act until the matter comes to him for an appeal decision.

Even when a proposal is plainly contrary to a local plan or development plan, the Secretary of State feels bound to go through the whole paraphernalia, if necessary, of a massive appeal involving great expense, a great deal of inspector time and considerable cost for all concerned. For example, shopping malls have been proposed for green belt sites. Adjacent to my constituency—I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe) is equally concerned about this—there is a massive proposal to develop metropolitan open land at Osterley with a large housing estate and large-scale shopping and industrial buildings. Since 1963, a succession of planning applications has been made in relation to that land and local people have repeatedly felt obliged to raise money to fight the proposals. I believe that if my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State interpreted his powers differently he could help immeasurably in making all of that unnecessary.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, therefore, to re-examine his powers. A large school of thought considers that he has power to refuse to entertain a planning appeal in respect of a hopeless case—that is, if he decides that planning permission cannot possibly be granted, he has power to refuse to entertain an appeal. The Department of the Environment interprets that as being limited to legal power, but it can be interpreted as covering situations in which the proposal is totally at variance with planning policy. I ask my right hon. Friend to re-examine his powers and to consider whether he should refuse to entertain some of the really hopeless planning appeals involving green belt sites and metropolitan open space. That would be of great convenience to the people who were intended to benefit from the policies and would achieve a real saving in inspector time. It would also help to make the Government's policy on these matters more clearly understood. I therefore strongly urge that that course be considered.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): This excellent debate has evinced unanimity on the need for greater certainty in our planning system. We also need much greater political will if we are to achieve the kind of certainty that both developers and those seeking to protect the environment wish to see.

I question the assessment made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about demand. Too often, the figures appear to be estimates made by house builders rather than an assessment of actual need, as the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) pointed out. There are still 600,000 empty homes in this country. Much more work should be done on that. Our planning system should enable us to preserve our countryside, enjoy a high standard of living and modernise our industry. It should allow us to have our cake and eat it; I do not shrink from saying that.

Many of my hon. Friends have argued—none better than my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin)—that the planning system is failing the nation. First, it is failing to protect green fields from overdevelopment. Secondly, it is failing to promote the development of inner cities. Thirdly, it is failing to provide for low-cost housing, which we want in all our constituencies. Fourthly, it is accelerating, if not promoting, the movement of population which has very serious social and infrastructure problems attached to it.

I shall restrict myself to commenting on the provision of low-cost housing, which I believe to be particularly important. The present system is failing to provide such housing, and the problem is not being addressed. Even in this debate it has been suggested that the overdevelopment of green fields would somehow enable us to deal with the problem. It would not. We must get the private rented sector going. More needs to be done and more finance provided for housing associations and sheltered housing schemes.

Furthermore, planning authorities need much greater quality control. For example, they need the power to order greater density in certain parts. I mean not only in the centre of Peckham in inner London, where I was a candidate for five years, but in the centres of our villages and towns, whether in the middle of Dorset or anywhere else. Lastly, I believe that the movement of population is extremely dangerous and gives rise to great social problems.

I would like the Secretary of State to change the statutory presumption in favour of development and to uphold local authority planning decisions to a greater extent. As he knows, I think that there is an urgent need to modernise the circulars. I want planning authorities to have much greater powers to control the quality of development and a tighter system of structure plans once those structure plans have been agreed between central Government and local authorities. Our planning system is failing the nation and it needs to be changed.

6.32 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I am glad that the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) won the ballot and chose this subject. The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) closed by saying that he would attempt to keep the issue in the public eye until the Government do something about it. I assure him that he will have my absolute support.

I say that for two important reasons. Sadly, the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet ducked one of them—the whole question of demographic change—in his motion. I make no apology for saying that the second has to do with the political changes that that implies. That is why the Conservative party is so troubled by the change, which is doing to the Tory party what previous demographic changes did to us. Conservative Members must think through the consequences of that in order to understand what is happening.

The desperate crisis in housing in this country relates to the planning problem. The crisis has come upon us largely because the present Secretary of State and his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Hesletine), who sets himself up in opposition to him, created it between them. Both of them undermined local authorities' ability to provide and plan effectively. The right hon. Member for Henley has the audacity to attack the present Secretary of State for setting loose the Frankenstein's monster that he designed.

Conservative Members claim that they are innocent of any responsibility, but the right hon. Member for Henley was the Secretary of State who ordered Berkshire, his own county, to increase the housing supply by 8,000. Furthermore, although he now says that civil servants in the Ministry of Defence should go north, he was the Secretary of State who cancelled the previous Labour Government's order to move the Property Services Agency up to Middlesbrough, which would have meant 3,000 jobs going to the Middlesbrough area.

The present Secretary of State has nothing to write home about either. He is another disaster area. Consider what is happening in Hammersmith. The Hammersmith Broadway development is one of the largest developments in an inner-city area. The appeal against it is already won. The inspector says that it is not appropriate and that there is not enough housing. What does the Secretary of State do? He overrules that decision, even though the developer and London Regional Transport, which proposed the plan, have agreed that it is not appropriate. Everyone agrees that the development is not appropriate but the Secretary of State steps in and overrules the decision, and one of the options that would have provided low-cost housing to take the strain off the areas about which Conservative Members complain. I certainly complain about my area, which has 10,000 people on the housing waiting list and 700 people in bed and breakfasts. When we left office there were none in bed and breakfast and only 4,000 on the waiting list and I thought that was bad enough. The Conservative party has created a nightmare.

Mr. Hardy: There is another monstrous likely development. There is a serious fear that sites for opencast mining will be identified and agreed without the public having to be informed and the normal planning process pursued. That means that anyone who considers their green belt an attractive area—I can think of several green belt areas in my own constituency that are enjoyed by local residents—may lose that enjoyment without having the opportunity to protest as the residents of Hammersmith have protested. Would my hon. Friend care to suggest that the Minister comments on that in her reply?

Mr. Soley: I shall not only suggest that the Minister comments on it. We should do something about making the developers pay some of the costs of the inquiries—an argument advanced by some Conservative Members and one with which I would agree.

The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare said:

"If the Government say that because a house can be sold it should be built, then I am afraid that this is an issue on which we will take them on."

So much for this unreconstructed free marketeer. The free market can operate, but not if it affects Tory voters. We know that in housing and planning, as in a number of activities, the free market can be an unmitigated disaster unless we take an overall view of what is happening in the economy and in the nation generally.

I am sad that the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet did not address the real issue in greater detail. I agree with him that we need local planning controls and involvement, but we also need a strategy for Greater London, for the south-east of England and for the nation. That is where the Government have failed and where the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet has failed in his motion. Uneven economic development is hardly touched upon. The hon. Gentleman does not mention the fact that it will cause a crisis in the south-east.

The hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) was right to say that he needed low-cost housing in his area, but he is not getting it. If he goes around Old Basing, he will find houses selling for between £150,000 and £250,000. They are certainly not being sold to those on low incomes in his area, and he knows it. What do the Government do? They break up the Greater London Council——

Mr. Hunter: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Soley: It would be at the expense of the Minister, I fear. I am not attacking the hon. Gentleman. I am simply saying that houses in Old Basing are selling for £150,000 to £250,000. They are not going to people on low incomes —a point that the hon. Gentleman made himself. The Government abolished the GLC, yet the GLC was one of the first organisations, along with some of the universities, to spot the fact that demographic change was crucial. We are witnessing something akin to what is happening in Los Angeles. At the very least, we are heading back to the development of new towns by accident.

I suspect that there is a far greater movement even than that, and that demographic change is moving people out of the cities back into rural areas far faster than ever before. It is probably the obverse of what happened in the last century or two, when people were moving from the rural areas into the cities. If that is right, we are looking at the possibility of an urban parkland stretching from Kent to Devon; the idea of a 250-mile limit like that for Los Angeles ceases to be a joke and becomes a reality.

It has suddenly occurred to Conservatives that this has political implications for them. About 450,000 new dwellings are needed in the south-east by the turn of the century. About 150,000, at the very least, are needed in London. The political pressure is building up. The hon. Members for Basingstoke, for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) and for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) already have differences of opinion about whether the present Secretary of State or the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) is right. That is why there are little articles in their local papers saying either, "I back the present Secretary of State for the Environment," or, "I back the previous Secretary of State. He is right." That is the trap for them.

The problem is not just about nice views out of windows but about job availability, environmental protection and enhancement and, above all, housing. The housing market in the south-east is frightening. The companies building the Channel tunnel employ engineers from all over the world. These companies have to offer to pay their engineers' mortgages because they cannot attract them without offering that incentive. In the Wirral, British Nuclear Fuels plc made some trainees redundant and one company found that potential recruits could not bridge the housing gap.

According to a report by Income Data Services,

"One manager admitted . . . that he 'fiddled' young employees' mortgage applications by counting overtime pay as basic earnings."

The Employment Institute has a similar point and reiterates what the IDS recognises, that there is a need for more low-cost housing in the form of council or housing association housing. Again, the Government are damned by their own statistics. There has been a two-thirds cut in council housing in Britain. In two years, only 138—not 138,000, 13,800 or even 1,380—new houses were built by housing associations in rural Britain, yet such houses have been sold off in rural areas faster than anywhere else because they are attractive to buy. If nothing new is built, the people who live in those areas have had it.

The 1981 census revealed that 70 per cent. of properties in some Cornish villages were unoccupied most of the year —that is what I mean by the "urban park" stretching for 250 miles. There is not one young family in a village in Dorset called Worth Matravers. The majority of properties there are second homes, selling for £90,000. The average manual worker's pay is between £80 and £90 a week. What are such people to do? What will happen to market rents when the Housing Bill comes into effect? The Minister can deal with that matter. The market rent on a property of £90,000 must be at least £200 a week, which is more than twice the average wage in that area. This is devastating.

The position is horrendous for what are, in effect, new clearances. Local authority dwellings have been sold at a much faster rate in rural areas than elsewhere. The private rented dwellings are often tied housing, and the Housing Bill will make a marginal difference to that. One article describes the position in Purbeck, Dorset and refers to

"Robert and Lesley Gillespie's three-bedroomed cottage in Langton Matravers."

The article states:

"Until February it housed them, three daughters, a son, two sons-in-law and three grandchildren. One daughter and son-in-law have gone with their baby to a winter letting in Swanage, which they must leave when the tourist season begins. The other young family has been told that if they were 'less choosy' about where they wanted to live they would be offered a council house 20 miles away in Bere Regis. There is no bus service back to the son-in-law's job in Langton, and he cannot drive. Forced to choose between housing and work, he asks: 'Why should people like us, who've always lived here, have to move out to make way for people who are just lucky enough to have a bit more money than the rest of us?'".

It is more than "a bit more". Whether it is a house for £150,000 or £250,000 in Old Basing or for £90,000 in Dorset, such people do not have a cat in hell's chance of buying or renting; I see that I am taking one or two Conservative Members with me. What the Government have done to the low-cost rented accommodation sector is catastrophic. One million homes have been lost from the rented sector since 1980, half from the Government's much-loved private rented sector. Already half are outside the terms of the Rent Acts, yet the rate of decline is accelerating.

In London there are organisations such as the Campaign for Homes in Central London, and we have written to the Minister to try to do something about the provision of homes in London. We should not have this joke from Conservative Members about the urban areas using up all the derelict land. There is derelict land to be used, but I say as a Londoner that I love the country—I want some country in London. I am fed up with the idea that we should all either move out to the country or face an urban sprawl, whether in the suburbs or in the inner cities.

The Government could do a lot worse than look at the policy put forward by Rural Voice, which would provide a way forward on some rural issues. We are faced with the horrendous possibility that housing for people on low incomes—whether rented or purchased, private or public —will not be available for a number of years. Even if the Government do a complete about-turn on their present policies and design more bizarre and taxpayer-funded Rachmanite schemes such as the business expansion scheme, the ability to increase the supply of rented property at low cost in less than three or four years is minimal. This will hit us devastatingly hard.

Why are there more homeless than ever before? Why are people packed into bed-and-breakfast accommodation? Why are council lists over-subscribed when people prefer council properties to private rented properties, as we know from the surveys? The reason is that the Government have slashed council house building. The Conservative-controlled Association of District Councils makes no bones about it. The ADC says, "The Government have sold off all our properties. They are not letting us build again." By not letting councils build again, the Government are destroying the rural communities, as the ADC rightly points out. That is what is upsetting the Conservative party, and it will end up upsetting it even more.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Marion Roe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on his speech. I welcome the opportunity presented by the debate to set out some of the key features of the Government's policy on planning matters.

Forty years of the post-war town and country planning system have served us well. The modern planning system had its origins in a perceived need to regulate development proposals that did not have proper regard to their impact or consequences on the locality. The present Government have successfully directed their energies to the encouragement of economic growth and enterprise, but we have always recognised that the planning system must also provide an effective mechanism for protecting amenity and the environment.

Much has been said today and in the past few months about the pressure for development in the south, south-east and rural areas. The terms of the motion recognise the strength of our policy on green belts.

In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller), I make no apologies for restating our commitment to the protection of green belts or for repeating that, since 1979, the area of approved green belt has more than doubled, from some 1·8 million acres to 4·5 million acres. Furthermore, we have said that developers who persist in pursuing applications for major developments in the green belt to appeal and through lengthy inquiries can expect to have costs awarded against them, as well as having their applications turned down.

However tight the control, some individuals will be tempted to find ways round the system, and that often concerns the public. Although local authorities have a wide range of powers to enforce planning controls, for a variety of reasons they do not always seem to be able to use them effectively.

We have recently carried out a review of the Department's procedures, with a view to improving efficiency in the handling of enforcement appeals. The action plan will be published soon. But, clearly, some local authorities think that the present powers are too difficult to operate or that, in some respects, they are inadequate. We are urgently setting in hand a policy review of the enforcement regime that I hope will lead to improvements in its effectiveness.

More recently, the focus of concern has shifted. Both here and outside, my colleagues and I are being pressed to adopt policies that would force all development into older urban areas and prevent any development elsewhere in the south-east. Paradoxically, we are simultaneously receiving representations to the effect that development pressure within urban areas is resulting in unsympathetic development that is changing the character of outer suburbs.

From rural areas, we are increasingly hearing complaints about the lack of housing that local people can afford. All those are real concerns. But we cannot have it all ways. We cannot simultaneously avoid any high-density housing developments in rural areas and make provision for the low-cost housing that is so clearly needed in those areas.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Roe: I am sorry. I cannot give way.

We cannot simultaneously preserve the integrity of the suburbs and refuse to allow development on new sites. It is precisely because they are real conflicts to resolve that the planning system is so vital. The reality is that pressure for development and, in particular, for new housing provision is a result of changes taking place within society. Because we live in and cherish the rights of a free society, we cannot control such changes, but must come to terms with them.

Several factors contribute to the demand for housing in the south-east. Migration from outside the region is one of the least significant. Far more important are factors such as increased life expectancy and fitness in old age, higher divorce rates, and the increasing tendency for people to marry later. That means more and smaller households. It needs to be understood that demand is coming mainly from within the south-east. If we deliberately curtail the supply of housing, those who will suffer will be those who are least able to afford the high prices that will result—for example, young people setting up their first home. In that case, there is unlikely to be a sudden widespread change in social attitudes or wholesale migration out of the region, but there might well be an increase in homelessness and in other social problems.

On the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin), my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has invited SERPLAN to consider the revised household projections provided by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. Those projections update earlier forecasts in the light of more recent trends. At present the forecasts are for discussion; they are not being imposed on the authorities concerned.

My right hon. Friend will shortly be meeting SERPLAN to discuss the effects of the latest projections of population and household formation on housing land supply in the south-east for the period to the end of the century. In his letter of 11 May to the chairman of SERPLAN, my right hon. Friend drew attention to three salient points about these projections. First, forecast housing needs will arise predominantly from the projected increase in population and in household formation within the south-east and Greater London, because of the factors that I mentioned earlier; secondly, forecast housing needs could easily be met if house building continues at the average level of the past few years, so we do not need to think in terms of a huge increase in house building in the south-east; and, thirdly, there is no reason to think that those needs can be met only at the expense of the green belt, areas of outstanding natural beauty, or any other statutorily protected areas. Of course the need to protect the countryside "for its own sake", as put forward in the ALURE package, still stands.

I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet and the hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) that, in the Housing Bill, we have introduced measures that will encourage the revival of the private rented housing market and provide for an enhanced role for the housing association movement.

It is often suggested that we should divert development pressure into urban areas by encouraging the use of derelict or unused sites in such areas, or that we should direct development towards regions outside the south-east. I am delighted to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) that the assistance of urban regeneration is one of the five purposes of green belts, set out in paragraph 4 of planning policy guidance note 2, which was published in January. Planning policy guidance notes are becoming the main source of Government advice and guidance, in clearer and more accessible form than circulars.

Of course we are encouraging development to take place in urban areas. Our inner-city initiatives are playing an important part in releasing land for development. Derelict land grant is helping to reclaim and bring back into use nearly 1,000 hectares of land every year. Since 1979, the proportion of grant spent in the inner cities has increased from 7 per cent. to 30 per cent. The success of the London Docklands development corporation in bringing development into an area of industrial dereliction is evident to anyone who visits the area. Much of the land made available by the corporation is providing sites for housing.

[Mrs. Roe]

With another nine urban development corporations in existence, in addition to those in London docklands and Merseyside, we can expect to see more under-used urban land available for development. We recently announced a consultants' study into the scope forhousing development on large derelict sites bordering the Thames in east London, which, if they were brought back into use, could provide land for 20,000 to 30,000 houses.

Much development does take place on land that has previously been developed. Nationally, 46 per cent. of land used for new housing is reused sites or vacant land in urban areas. 55 per cent. of housing in London and the south-east is on such sites. The initiatives that I have described make a significant contribution to meeting the need for housing land in that way. But, despite all that is being achieved, it will be possible to meet the demad for new housing only if some carefully selected sites are also provided. To their credit, most local authorities in the south-east recognise that, and are matching up to their responsibilities. We cannot force development into inner cities, but if we did, and if sufficient such land were available—which it is not—it is questionable whether the environmental damage and the social consequences would be tolerable.

We must not neglect the needs of the rural areas. From visits to many parts of the country, I am particularly aware of housing problems faced in rural areas, especially by young people on low incomes seeking a first home. I am grateful to hon. Members representing such areas who have drawn some of their problems to my attention. The Government are looking to see what measures might be taken to help, and we hope to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Roe: I am terribly sorry; I cannot give way.

Our primary aim has been to create the right conditions for the market, by stimulating the potential for growth based on private sector initiatives and resources. Equally important, it is no part of Government policy to direct people where to live or where firms should set up. That would risk losing development altogether.

So far I referred mainly to more strategic issues and to the kinds of national and regional guidance that are reflected in county structure plans. It is important that plans should make proper provision for development and that they should be kept up to date. Where that is done, there will, I believe, be less cause for anxiety about the possible development of sites not identified in plans. Local plans provide the means of working out sensible solutions to the problems of reconciling the needs of development and the interests of conservation. It is disturbing that the coverage of local plans is still incomplete. It is the local plan that makes detailed allocations of land and which should form the basis of most day-to-day planning decisions. But large areas of the country, even in those parts of the south-east that are under the greatest pressure for development, have no local plan.

Some local planning authorities seem to prefer to be without a detailed local plan, so that development proposals can be considered ad hoc as they come forward. Other authorities have adopted a practice of preparing "informal" or "bottom drawer" plans as a basis of development control, without subjecting them to proper procedures of public consultation and formal adoption. Neither is a satisfactory alternative to the preparation of a proper local plan. Informal documents and ad hoc decisions give no satisfactory guidance to developers, and afford no reassurance to local people about the overall pattern of development. Where there is no local plan, the local authority may find itself in a weak position in rejecting development proposals that should not be approved.

Likewise, the Secretary of State and his inspectors are greatly assisted in dealing with appeals if they can be considered within the framework of a relevant and up-to-date local plan. Indeed, inspectors necessarily take account of a local plan if it is up to date and formally adopted.

The Government's consultation paper on the future of development plans, published in September 1986, proposed that there should be comprehensive coverage of districtwide development plans throughout the country. The Government are confirmed in that view by the response to the consultation. We shall shortly be issuing for consultation a new draft circular on those lines, drawing local authorities' attention to the role of local plans.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet is concerned at the impact of unsympathetic development on some residential areas in the suburbs of London. He has proposed the establishment of special planning areas for areas that do not justify designation as conservation areas but which, nevertheless, have a character worthy of protection. It is important that we should not devalue the status and protection available in conservation areas. An area does not require any special designation to enjoy protection against inappropriate development, as normal planning control already provides it. In our view, special planning areas would add another layer to the planning system and to the bureaucratic apparatus needed to administer it. It is not realistic for national planning policy guidance to prescribe solutions for what are essentially local issues about the scale of development in particular areas.

I believe that the Government's policies for green belts and for protecting the countryside deserve and attract support from all quarters in the House. The concept of green belts is enduring and enjoys widespread popularity. If those policies are to be effective they must be balanced by equally effective policies for development. Conservation alone is not enough. Housing development is not a form of environmental pollution; it is about people, families and home ownership. The planning system exists both to facilitate development to assist national economic development and to conserve our natural——

Orders of the Day

Civil Evidence (Scotland) Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This morning I was in Falkirk to inaugurate the building of the new sheriff court; if the Bill becomes an Act the new evidential requirements will be practised in that court.

The Bill is the Government's response to the Scottish Law Commission's report on corroboration, hearsay and related matters. That report was published in May 1986. The report is part of the Scottish Law Commission's overall consideration of the law of evidence. That subject was included in the Scottish Law Commission's first programme of law reform.

I am sure that hon. Members who represent Scotland and elsewhere and who are present would wish me to take the opportunity to pay tribute to the detailed consideration which has been given to this particular matter by the commission. The House would not, of course, expect anything less. Since its establishment by the Law Commissions Act 1965, the commission has produced a substantial number of reports dealing with a considerable range of issues. Those issues cover a wide spectrum of activity, some involving complex and technical legal matters, others involving matters of great social importance.

The Scottish Law Commission was set up by section 2 of the Law Commissions Act 1965 for the purpose of promoting the reform of the law of Scotland. Those somewhat formal words might suggest that the proposals put forward by the Commission are restricted to technical legal matters—"lawyers' law"—as some might put it. As I have suggested, that is far from the case. One has only to think of measures such as the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985 and the Debtors (Scotland) Act 1987 and family law legislation to realise that the areas of law dealt with by the Scottish Law Commission involve, to a considerable extent, the individual people of Scotland. The commission's work goes wider than that, as it can, in concert with its counterpart, the Law Commission for England and Wales, produce joint reports on matters of a United Kingdom interest and application. A recent example of such a report is the joint report on choice of law rules in marriage.

I think that the general regard in which the work of the commission is held can be ascertained from the rate of implementation of its reports. In its 22nd annual report the commission comments in paragraph 1.21:

"the rate of implementation by Parliament of our proposals continues to be a source of much encouragement to us".

I have worked out that, since its establishment in 1965, the Commission has produced 107 reports. That includes of course the commission's programmes of law reform and its annual reports. Of the 82 proposals that have been made for reform of the law, 72 have already been implemented and a number of those remaining unimplemented, include recent reports, one of which is the report that we are considering.

I am sure that my colleagues on the Front Bench will not take it amiss if I say that the Government cannot claim complete credit for the number of reports recently implemented. Over the years, a number of Scottish Law Commission reports have been implemented by private Members' Bills. In the past, as a Back Bencher, I played a part in the removal of the stigma of illegitimacy by promoting the Law Reform (Parent and Child) (Scotland) Bill to implement the recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission in its report on illegitimacy. For that Bill I even rated a minor mention along with the noble and learned Lord Wilson of Langside, in the Scottish Law Commission's 21st annual report covering its work during 1985-86. I have been glad to support the work of the commission and to have the good fortune to secure the enactment of some of its proposed reforms. So it is especially interesting now to be involved in the law reform process once again.

Hon. Members will know that reports of the Scottish Law Commission generally proceed after a comprehensive consultation process. That usually involves the issue of a consultative memorandum to interested people and bodies. Views on the proposals are then taken into account by the commission in coming up with its final recommendations contained in the report.

The Bill is no exception to that arrangement. In 1980 the commission produced consultative memorandum No. 46 inviting comments on propositions for reform of many aspects of the law of evidence. The commission, in paragraph 1.1 of the report, expressed its gratitude for the many constructive comments it received. In preparing its report, the commission also had the benefit of a research paper on the law of evidence prepared by Sheriff Macphail. I know that that paper is highly regarded by those with an interest in the law of evidence. Indeed, I note that the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) has a copy.

The report on which the Bill is based is therefore clearly the result of careful consideration by the Scottish Law Commission. It is worth making the point that when the report was submitted to my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate he also arranged for views to be sought on the commission's actual recommendations. Those views were, of course, carefully considered by my noble and learned Friend before he formulated the policy now contained in the Bill. On Second Reading in the other place my noble and learned Friend paid tribute to those who had taken the trouble to comment on the consultation carried out on his behalf. I have no hesitation in echoing his tributes. The comprehensive consultation carried out by the commission and by my noble and learned Friend, the detailed scrutiny of the proposals and recommendations and the constructive comments and criticisms received have meant that the Bill has what I believe to be a very sound base for the reforms contained in it.

It would be for the convenience of the House if I took this early opportunity to make it clear that the Scottish Law Commission's proposals are concerned with evidence in civil proceedings only. As the title of the Bill implies, it does not in any way disturb the existing requirements on corroboration and hearsay in criminal proceedings.

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

In arriving at the recommendations contained in its report, the Scottish Law Commission had in mind two guiding principles:

"First, that the law should be simplified to the greatest degree consistent with the proper functioning of a law of evidence; and, secondly, that as a general rule all evidence should be admissible unless there is good reason for treating it as inadmissible."

To my mind those are principles with which all hon. Members present could readily agree. I think that they would commend themselves particularly to those of us who have sought to unravel some of the existing complexities of the law of evidence while advising clients or trying to present a case in court.

When the Scottish Law Commission came to apply those guiding principles to the existing law of evidence, it found that in certain elements the rule requiring corroboration and the rule against hearsay could present barriers to the presentation of an otherwise good case. The commission took the view that, although corroboration had been regarded as a safeguard against the acceptance of unreliable evidence, its consideration of current law and practice led it to conclude that a formal requirement of corroboration was not in the overall interests of justice. It arrived at similar conclusions on the rule against hearsay. It found that the development of the rule against hearsay had led to its acquiring qualifications and exceptions that made the law complex and difficult. It involved fine and difficult distinctions. The commission came to the view that the exclusion of hearsay could, in many cases, lead to a risk of injustice.

I shall deal later in a little more detail with the difficulties of the present law. Suffice it to say for the moment that the commission recommended in broad terms the abolition of the requirement for corroboration and the abolition of the rule against hearsay. The aim is to achieve a situation in which, in very general terms, a court should have available to it all the relevant evidence from whatever source. The Bill implements those recommendations and achieves that aim in clauses 1 and 2.

Having set the scene, as it were, I think that it would be helpful to the House if I dealt with the Bill in detail.

Clause 1 implements the first main recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission, which is to abolish the requirement for corroboration in civil proceedings. I think that it would be helpful to hon. Members if I briefly ran over the position under the present law. This will, I think, serve to illustrate why the House should, in the Government's view, look favourably on the abolition of corroboration.

As hon. Members know, under the present law the general rule is that to be successful a party must establish his ground of action by providing certain crucial facts. The general rule is that a crucial fact cannot be proved by the testimony of one witness alone. That witness's testimony must be supported by evidence from another source—in other words, corroborative evidence.

For example, let us suppose that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) were to engage a builder to construct a wall and laid down requirements that it should be a 6 ft high wall made of red brick. Let us suppose also that the result was that the hon. Member found that the wall had been built of yellow brick and to an entirely different specification. Now, if the hon. Member was a prudent man, he would have had all the specifications written down in a written contract. However, if he had not written it down, because the pressures of parliamentary business were too great and he had conducted the matter quickly by telephone, he would not have any corroboration of the fact that he had requested the wall to be built according to certain specifications and colour. In those circumstances, he would have little chance of success if he pursued the matter in law against the builder.

Let me make it clear that I do not for one minute discount the importance of corroboration. However—this is one of the key factors in my argument—what we are considering is whether, as a matter of law, someone should always be precluded from success if he is unable to provide corroboration on every point necessary for the establishment of his case. Hon. Members will, I am sure, agree that such a situation should be avoided if the law of evidence is to cater for the proper resolution of disputes in civil proceedings.

If we were to look at the development of case law in this area, we would come across instances where the courts have found it possible, when satisfied as to a witness's reliability, to be satisfied also that corroborative evidence can be found in what the Scottish Law Commission describes as "circumstantial evidence of flimsy or doubtful import".

Some hon. Members may ask why, if the courts are, in certain circumstances, prepared to find corroboration so readily, the requirement needs to go. However, although such instances can be found, equally there are instances where a court has been compelled, however unwillingly, to come to a decision based on the absence of corroboration. There is therefore a view that in certain circumstances an otherwise honest and credible case is doomed to failure —indeed, is doomed never to be heard—simply because the often technical barriers of corroboration cannot be surmounted.

Parliament has sought to remedy this situation, albeit in piecemeal fashion. For example, in section 9 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1968 —[Interruption.] Perhaps the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) was a Minister involved in that legislation.

In section 9 of that Act the requirement for corroboration was removed in actions for damages for personal injuries. More recently, under the powers in section 2(2) of the Divorce Jurisdiction, Court Fees and Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1983, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate made orders prescribing undefended divorce cases based on two and five-year separations as actions in which corroboration is not required.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garcadden): I am encouraging the hon. Gentleman to go on rather more lengthily than he otherwise would. He referred to the debate on section 9 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1968. No doubt he will have read of the splendid attack on that led by the present Lord Wylie from the Conservative Front Bench, and will remember that the Conservatives voted to exclude that clause from the Bill. I wonder why there is the change of mind.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am glad to say that we are only too happy to learn from experience. When the Bill was submitted in the other Chamber, both Front Benches gave it a warm welcome. One of the key points was that for over 20 years the Act had been successful in that respect and there had not been any problems.

The House will see, therefore, that the removal of the requirement for corroboration is not a novel idea. In the cases I have just mentioned, the provisions have worked well and have not had any adverse effect on the administration of justice. In addition, hon. Members will be aware that certain types of civil dispute, involving matters of considerable importance to the parties, are determined by tribunals and inquiries. Many of these bodies operate under their own procedural rules in which their deliberations are not bound by the strict rules of evidence applied in the courts. For example, under the rules of procedure for Scottish industrial tribunals, a tribunal is not "bound by any enactment or rule of law relating to the admissibility of evidence in proceedings before the courts of law".

The position of tribunals is now well established under our present law as an effective and efficient means of resolving certain types of dispute. I have already mentioned the important role that they play in matters which are of substantial importance to the parties involved. Their effectiveness is due in no small measure to their ability to consider all relevant evidence, even though that evidence may be uncorroborated or may be hearsay.

The Bill preserves that important feature of tribunal proceedings, while still allowing the conduct of their proceedings to be specifically regulated by their own tailormade rules.

The example and experience of tribunal proceedings is a useful piece of evidence in support of the relaxation of corroboration and hearsay requirements in all civil proceedings.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us whether what he has said applies in the case of someone wishing to make a complaint relating, for example, to defective dental treatment? Do not the regulations and rules relating to tribunals of that nature require corroboration? Does the Bill do anything to relax that requirement?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The tribunals are able to make their own rules, and in certain cases the parties concerned come to an agreement. The Bill would generally relax the rules relating to civil procedures, but, as the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East has said, there may be exceptions. I will look at the case he has mentioned and write to him in due course.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Gentleman is making a virtue of the fact that the Bill ensures that, unless special arrangements are made by the parties to reinstate hearsay and corroboration as it is now, they will have the advantage of relaxation. If I remember rightly, that came about as the result of an amendment from Lord Morton of Shuna and not from the Government.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I make it clear to the hon. Member for Garscadden that we welcome good ideas from wherever they come, and the hon. Member's colleague, Lord Morton of Shuna, welcomed the Bill in the House of Lords. There is no dispute between us on that point.

When the Scottish Law Commission went to consultation on its proposals, the majority of commentators were in favour of the abolition of the requirement for corroboration. That was true also of the consultation carried out on behalf of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate.

For the reasons that I have outlined, the Scottish Law Commission concluded that the requirement for corroboration should be removed in civil proceedings. I fully endorse that recommendation, and take the same view as the Faculty of Advocates. In responding to consultation on behalf of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, it said that the retention of the requirement for corroboration "is out of keeping with the general trend in the development of the law of evidence to remove technical obstacles from the path of truth finding".

I should say to the House that the rules on corroboration and hearsay have substantial practical implications.

The requirement for corroboration can lead to unnecessary expense, delays and inconvenience. One difficulty in this area of the law is that it is not always easy to judge what are the essential facts that must be proved and thus require corroboration. Such a fact may be only a relatively minor link in the chain of evidence and, indeed, may not be contested by the other party. However, a party's advisers may feel that there would be substantial risk of the entire case collapsing because what at first appeared to be a minor point was uncorroborated. That leads to their producing as much corroborative evidence as possible with consequent extra work, expense and taking up of court time.

Under the Bill, while a party would still seek to produce corroboration on major points in dispute, he would be able to do without such corroborative evidence on matters that, although technically essential, are, in practice, formalities. If that were so, I believe that there would be valuable savings both for the parties in preparing cases and in court time.

I appreciate what the hon. Member for Garscadden said about the importance of the best evidence being available to the courts—[Interruption.] Well, that was the implication behind his question.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): That is hearsay.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Hon. Gentlemen can elaborate on their comments in due course.

I should perhaps stress that we are here dealing with questions of admissibility. The Bill does not in any way fetter the power of the courts to decide what weight should be placed on a particular item of evidence. That is an important point, and I am glad to take this opportunity to stress it. The Bill seeks to remove the technical barriers of corroboration, while at the same time retaining the judge's power to decide whether he is satisfied with any particular piece of evidence before him.

The Bill takes the opportunity in clause 1(2) to abolish specifically the concept of corroboration by false denial. That is a special rule applicable only in cases for the establishing of paternity. Under the rule, denial by a defender in the witness box of a material fact which is later proved to be true may be accepted as corroboration of the pursuer's evidence as to paternity. The rule has been described as

"at best a doubtful doctrine".

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

The second main recommendation proposed by the commission is the abolition of the rule against hearsay. That is implemented in clause 2. I think that it would be of benefit to the House and might again serve to illustrate the need for reform if I dealt briefly with the existing law. Under the present law, hearsay evidence is generally not admitted. The rule is, broadly speaking, to the effect that statements made other than by a witness giving evidence in court are inadmissible. The rule applies to both oral and written statements.

However, the present law admits a number of exceptions to the general rule of hearsay. I have mentioned already the practical problems of the requirement for corroboration. Similar problems arise through the exclusion of hearsay evidence. In many cases, the point to which the evidence is directed is a minor or uncontroversial one which the other party is unlikely to dispute. I have already said that in practice such hearsay evidence is often admitted—that was the view of the commission.

However, as with corroboration, a party seeking to establish that fact cannot be certain of the evidence being admitted and thus may go to considerable trouble, expense and time to ensure that direct evidence is available to prove a fact that is not a major issue in the case. The expense and difficulty may be out of all proportion to the importance of the point and in such a case, the rule against hearsay may be said to operate to increase the cost of litigation unnecessarily. Abolition of that rule would therefore contribute to savings both in expense and in court time.

In considering whether the law relating to hearsay should be reformed, the Scottish Law Commission felt that the number of problems and inconsistencies pointed towards the need for relaxation.

For example, res gestae forms an exception to the general rule against hearsay. [HON. MEMBERS: "Define it."] Hon. Members have asked me to define it. Res gestae are statements which form an integral part of, or are closely connected with, the facts in issue and go to the essence of a case. Thus, a witness could give evidence that he heard an injured colleague at work shout, "Look out," just before an accident. Although strictly speaking hearsay, that evidence would be admitted under the res gestae rule. The difficulty is in deciding how closely connected with the event the statement has to be.

Problems also arise with what are termed extra-judicial admissions. For example, an admission by one party is admissible as evidence against himself or herself but not as evidence against a co-defender. That is an example of a court having the difficult task of having to admit a statement for one purpose, but to ignore it for another.

The Scottish Law Commission concluded, therefore, that the existing law, with its general prohibition and detailed exceptions, was unduly complicated. Hon. Members will say that a lot of our law is unduly complex. More importantly, however, the commission took the view that exclusion of hearsay evidence operated unreasonably to exclude potentially valuable evidence. I fully accept that view. There are numerous instances where hearsay evidence is quite simply the best evidence available. To exclude it because of technicalities serves only, in my view, to deny the courts the opportunity to hear all the relevant evidence.

I am supported in that view by reference to the comments of Lord Wilberforce in Waugh v. British Railways Board, a case heard in the Appeal Court in 1980. Speaking of a report made shortly after a railway accident, Lord Wilberforce said:

> "It is clear that the due administration of justice strongly requires disclosure and production of this report. It was contemporary. It contained statements of witnesses on the spot. It would be not merely relevant evidence but almost certainly the best evidence as to the cause of the accident."

The present exceptions to the rule against hearsay do not provide a satisfactory solution. They have, as the commission states, been developed ad hoc to meet particular difficulties.

We have, of course, examples already of the relaxation of the rule against hearsay. In practice, it is quite common for hearsay evidence to be admitted by the courts in matters which are not of overwhelming importance. In addition, I have already cited the relaxation of corroboration requirements in proceedings before tribunals and inquiries. Those proceedings also allow hearsay evidence without any apparent diminution of the standard of justice.

It is fair to say that the consultation carried out on behalf of my noble and learned Friend, the Lord Advocate revealed a number of substantial comments and criticisms against the proposal to abolish the rule against hearsay. For example, the sheriffs association opposed the recommendation largely on the grounds that hearsay is not the best evidence. It was suggested also that the law should be reformed by extension and clarification of the existing exceptions to the general rule against hearsay.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): My hon. Friend has no doubt had an opportunity to consider the Civil Evidence Act 1968 for England and Wales. It is interesting to note that the Scottish Law Commission drew a parallel between the Bill and the 1968 Act, and recommended that the party against whom hearsay evidence is to be used should put the other party on notice. Has my hon. Friend now totally discounted that as a possibility? Such an action would be taking one by surprise and would be almost ambush evidence. Has my hon. Friend decided not to pursue that?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My hon. Friend has raised an important point to which I shall come in a moment. On consultation, the Association of Sheriffs Principal made it quite clear that it was not in favour of the notice procedure. The Association of Reporters of Children's Panels was against the notice procedure, as was the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, Lord Elliot of the Lands Court and the Faculty of Advocates. However, I shall come to that in a moment, together with the reasons why the Government rejected that view.

The Association of Sheriffs Principal was concerned that reform of the law might make the situation more complex. I think it fair to say, however, that its comments were directed more at what it saw as procedural difficulties.

On the other hand, the Faculty of Advocates expressed broad agreement with the proposed abolition. A working party of Court of Session judges also conceded that some judges of the Court of Session held the view that the hearsay rule might, with advantage, be abolished. The Bill has got it right in its abolition in clause 2 of the rule against hearsay. While I fully appreciate the views of those who were opposed to, or at least wary of, such a reform, I do not think that retention of a complex rule or its modification would meet the needs of a law of evidence whose rules must cope with the problem of ensuring that all relevant evidence is available to the court.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): My hon. Friend has referred to evidence being relevant. Can he confirm that the admissibility of hearsay evidence is changed under clause 2 and that hearsay evidence admitted will be subject to the same, and no less strong, tests of relevance as any other evidence?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It will be for the court to give appropriate and due weight to all the evidence before it. The more distant the evidence, the less weight it will carry, which stands to reason.

Mr. Hind: My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) has raised an important point. If one of the parties has no notice of the evidence and is not able to test it, it will be difficult to cross-examine on that evidence. The judge must consider that it is of less probative value than first-hand evidence that he hears.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government came down against that view because they felt that it would lead to the reintroduction of hearsay by another route, would be complicated and would make the reform not worth following through.

As hon. Members have pointed out, the Bill departs from the commission's recommendations about a notice procedure for the admission of hearsay evidence. The commission proposed that a party wishing to rely on hearsay evidence would have to convince the court that it was neither reasonable nor practicable to bring along the maker of the hearsay statement to give evidence. If the court came to the view that the maker of the statement could have been brought to court, it could refuse to admit the hearsay evidence.

As an adjunct to that proposal, the commission's Bill contained a notice procedure, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) has referred. That would have enabled a party to notify his opponent that he intended to rely on hearsay evidence. Unless his opponent served a counter-notice objecting to the hearsay evidence, he would lose his right to object at the proof itself.

A number of those who responded to the consultation on behalf of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate were of the view that, while reform was necessary, the commission's proposal to allow the courts to retain a power to refuse to admit hearsay evidence, together with an associated notice procedure, could have the effect simply of reintroducing the rule against hearsay.

The Government were persuaded by this argument, and the Bill simply abolishes the rule against hearsay by providing in clause 2(1)(a) that evidence cannot be excluded solely on the grounds that it is hearsay. I should emphasise to the House that that leaves untouched any other means whereby evidence might be considered inadmissible. For instance, the court might hold that evidence was irrelevant and could be excluded on that ground, whether or not it was hearsay.

As with corroboration, the court retains its power to attach due weight to the hearsay evidence. Therefore, the Bill seeks to ensure that potentially valuable evidence is not lost to the court, resulting in injustice to any of the parties. The court, however, is still able, and indeed obliged, to consider and evaluate the evidence put before it.

Those hon. Members who followed the debate on the Bill in the other place will have noticed the references made by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate to the position of civil juries in questions of hearsay evidence. The Lord President of the Court of Session said that civil juries in the Court of Session might have some difficulties in evaluating hearsay evidence. [Interruption.] Hon. Members are being extremely provocative. I have absorbed every word of the report, which makes it clear that these difficulties might arise.

While my noble and learned Friend appreciated the problem, the small number of civil jury trials in the court —there were only four in 1985, as hon. Members know —did not merit the rejection of what is seen as a valuable and important reform. Rather, my noble and learned Friend took the view that consideration might be given to abolishing civil jury trials in the Court of Session. That has already been done for the sheriff courts by the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1980. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate has not of course arrived at any conclusions yet, but he intends to consult interested parties on this important subject.

I should draw to the notice of the House the provisions of clause 2(3) and (4) which were inserted by the Government during consideration of the Bill in the other place. At first sight, these subsections seem merely technical, but they are important additions to the Bill. They refine the existing powers of the Court of Session to make procedural rules for actions in the Court of Session and the sheriff court for the admission of statements, including affidavits and reports instead of oral evidence.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, South): Is the Minister aware that the Second Reading debate in the other place, which involved three of the most prominent Scottish Ministers, took only 34 minutes? He has already managed to exceed that, and he has not yet reached clause 3.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Our Committee proceedings may be brief, and it is only fair that hon. Members should have a clear picture of an extremely important Scottish legal measure. It is appropriate that matters of supreme importance to the legal system of Scotland, which is one of the finest in the western world, should be debated fully on the Floor of the House.

The existing rules of court provide for the admissibility of statements in certain circumstances. For example, rule of court 152 provides:

> "In any Admiralty or commercial cause the Court may accept as evidence affidavits. Where in the opinion of the Court any affidavit produced is insufficient to enable the question at issue to be disposed of, the party lodging the same may be called on to lodge a supplementary affidavit, or, where the circumstances reasonably permit, to provide the relevant facts by the ordinary rules of evidence."

In rule of court 168, which deals with undefended actions of divorce and separation and aliment, subsection (4) provides:

> "Proof in all actions shall, unless in any particular action the Court otherwise directs, be by way of evidence submitted in the form of affidavits and such evidence shall not be treated as being insufficient for the purpose of proof by reason only that it is not supported by parole evidence".

To that extent, the rules are overtaken by clause 2(1)(b), which provides for the general admissibility of statements. Subsections (3) and (4) therefore amend the existing rule-making powers to remove the power to provide for the admissibility of statemens. Such a power is unnecessary and could also be said to be in conflict with the provisions of the Bill.

However, as well as providing for the admissibility of statements, the powers and rules also serve the secondary purpose of providing that those statements may be capable of being received in evidence without requiring further proof as to authenticity. It appears to be generally accepted in practice that that is the position, but it is not entirely clear whether all statements admitted in this way will be capable of being received without further authentication—in short, to be self-proving. There is some doubt whether the existing powers would be sufficiently wide to enable rules to specify that a document is self-proving in isolation from specifying its admissibility.

Therefore, these subsections restate the rule-making powers in a form designed to deal with the self-proving aspect. In this way, the Bill establishes the proper distinction between statements which are simply admissible under clause 2(1)(b) and those statements to which the court has decided to accord special status as being not only admissible under clause 2 but self-proving in the circumstances prescribed by rules of court.

I have dealt with the main proposals implemented by the Bill and I shall now deal with the third main aspect of the Bill, which is the type of proceedings in which the new evidential rules are to apply. That is governed by clause 9, but I think that it will be for the convenience of the House if I deal with it now.

I have mentioned that the Bill applies only to civil proceedings. It does not deal with the question whether certain types of proceedings can be classed as civil proceedings. For example, proceedings in respect of breach of interdict may be regarded as civil, criminal or quasi-criminal. This classification will continue to be a question for determination by the courts in each particular case.

Clause 9 defines the types of proceedings to which the Bill applies. These include, of course, proceedings in the ordinary civil courts. The Bill also makes it clear that hearings before the sheriff under section 42 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 are to be regarded as civil proceedings. That relates to the conduct of children's hearings and applications to the sheriff for findings.

Following the most useful discussions in the other place on the Bill's application to civil proceedings the Lord Advocate introduced amendments so that the Bill applies to proceedings before arbitrations, tribunals and inquiries, and to proceedings that are conducted in accordance with rules of procedure agreed between the parties themselves.

Hon. Members will appreciate that a feature of proceedings before tribunals, arbitrations and inquiries is that they are almost invariably regulated by rules that are contained either in statutory form or in an agreement between the parties. Those rules usually make some provision for the rules of evidence that are to apply. It is right that the Bill should make available to such proceedings the benefit of the more relaxed evidential regime that will be in use in the ordinary courts. It is also right that the ability to make special rules for those proceedings should remain.

For that reason, in the Bill's application to arbitrations, tribunals, inquiries and proceedings conducted in accordance with a procedure agreed between parties, an exeption is made for instances in which specific provision has been made for the evidential rules that are to apply. I think that that answers the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East. The Bill thus enables opting out of the new rules and accommodates alternative evidential regimes set down by, for example, tribunal rules or agreement between the parties where that is competent.

I have covered the main framework of the Bill and the background to the considerations applied to it. Much of the remainder of the Bill in clauses 3 to 8 deals with matters related to the main proposals on corroboration and hearsay.

Clause 3 deals with prior statements. Under the present law, the credibility of a witness can be attacked by reference to prior inconsistent statements made by him or her on another occasion. Curiously enough, however, the witness's credibility cannot be supported by reference to prior statements that are consistent with his evidence in the witness box. The Bill corrects that anomaly by allowing prior statements to be admissible for both attacking and supporting credibility. However, there is an exception to that broad rule. By virtue of the definition of "statement" in clause 9, a precognition cannot be used to support or attack credibility. A precognition is simply an account prepared by another person, such as a solicitor, of the evidence likely to be available from a witness. Thus, a statement in a precognition is different in nature from a statement made by the witness himself.

Clause 4 ensures that the fact that a person has been present in court during the proceedings does not prevent him from being called as a witness or recalled to give evidence to clarify hearsay evidence admitted under clause 2.

Clause 5 builds on the present law, which allows certain relaxations of the evidential rules on proof of documents. Normally a document requires to be spoken to by a witness before the document and any statement contained in it can be admitted as evidence. That rule is relaxed under both common law and statute in respect of certain business books and records—for example, bankers' books under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879.

As for other types of documents, I am sure that hon. Members who have been involved in court proceedings will be aware of the difficulties sometimes encountered when witnesses have to be brought to court simply to speak to the fact that they were involved in the preparation of documents that are productions in a case. That can at times lead to unnecessary delay and expense. Clause 5 will minimise the difficulty by enabling an appropriately certified document of any business or undertaking and any statement in that document to be proved in court without the need for a witness to speak to it.

Clause 6 provides further assistance for a party wishing to rely on documentary evidence. Under present evidential requirements, and subject to certain relaxations, original documents rather than copies must be produced unless the parties can agree otherwise. That can lead to difficulties in lengthy cases involving original documents that may be required for other purposes. The clause enables a properly authenticated copy document to be admitted and treated for evidential purposes as if it were the original.

The problem addressed by clause 7 has not yet arisen in Scotland, but it is right that the opportunity presented by the Bill should be taken to provide a solution. In civil proceedings, it may on occasion be necessary to prove that a particular record simply does not exist. Clause 7 therefore admits the evidence of an officer of a business or undertaking as to the absence of a record without the need to produce all the existing records, as would be required at present.

Clause 8 clarifies and restates the law on actions on family relationships, such as actions for divorce or parentage. In broad terms, the Bill retains the fundamental requirement that in such cases it is necessary for the pursuer to establish the grounds of action before he or she can be successful. That rule applies whether or not the action is defended. In addition, the evidence to establish the grounds of action must come, at least partly, from a source other than a party to the marriage.

In the context of family relationships, I am sure that hon. Members will agree that, as far as possible, the legislative rules should be capable of reflecting the social and legal requirements of the day. For that reason, the clause gives the Lord Advocate power to disapply the requirement that evidence should come from another source. But I should make it clear to hon. Members that Parliament will have an opportunity to discuss any changes of this nature, since the order is required to be made by affirmative resolution.

The remaining clauses are formal, but I have already mentioned the important definition of civil proceedings in clause 9. I should also draw hon. Members' attention to clause 10(2), which provides that changes in the evidential rules will not apply to proceedings in which proof has commenced before the date of operation of the Act—if the Bill is enacted. That avoids the undesirable situation of parties being subjected to a change in the rules of evidence part way through a proof.

I have dealt in some depth with the provisions of the Bill and the background to it. I did so because the Bill had a commendably rapid passage through the other place. In case the Bill has a similarly brief passage through this house, it is desirable that hon. Members should know in detail what is proposed.

This is an important and, some might say, a radical measure of law reform. Although the Bill contains substantial changes in the rules of evidence in civil proceedings, the Government do not envisage a marked change in the way in which cases will be presented. It is true that, if the Bill is enacted, parties will be able to rely on uncorroborated evidence and hearsay evidence. However, parties will, I am sure, continue to seek to put before the court the best evidence available to them. I expect, therefore, that they will continue to lead corroborative evidence where it is available and bring the makers of statements before the courts whenever possible.

In instances where that is not possible, the Bill will ensure that courts will still have before them as much relevant evidence as possible. As a result, neither party will be penalised simply because potentially valuable evidence is excluded on technical grounds. A party will thus be able to proceed with an otherwise good case which under the present evidential regime would be doomed to fail because of an inability to meet technical requirements of corroboration or to produce evidence that was hearsay.

I am glad that the Bill received a generous welcome in all parts of the other place, and I hope that it will find a similar welcome here. It is a thoroughly valuable law reform measure. I look forward to the speech by the hon. Member for Garscadden.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): The Scottish Conservative party conference has had a narrow escape. Obviously, the Minister was anxious to get something off his chest. I understand that he was inaugurating Falkirk sheriff court today. I do not know whether that meant that he was filling up the first legal aid application or locking the first cell door. I am certainly in favour of a total moratorium on public expenditure in that area if it has the effect upon the hon. Gentleman that we have just seen.

The Minister gave an extraordinary performance I recognise, of course, that this is a significant law reform measure, but I wonder whether it is a good use of Civil Service resources to type out, for the Minister to read, the entire report by the Scottish Law Commission and to interpolate into it a few broken fragments from the Lord Advocate's speeches in the House of Lords. That does not reflect a great deal of credit upon the Minister.

I should start by declaring an interest. I am still a partner in a Glasgow law firm and to that extent I have an interest in the law of evidence in Scotland and, perhaps in a more direct sense, in legal aid and litigation in Scotland. However, it is a very remote interest.

We support the Bill. It is well on its way through the legislative process, and has encountered surprisingly little controversy. It has gone through the House of Lords, where there were some brief exchanges, Lord Morton of Shuna exchanging some elegant courtesies with the Lord Advocate in very short order. Members of the other House have habits which could be learnt with some advantage by the Government.

There has been little sign of professional concern. I have not been involved in, or the object of, any lobbying, and there has been no real stir or controversy over the measure. Although the Minister talked about wide consultation, according to the appendix to the Law Commission report there have been only 17 submitted written comments on the consultative memorandum No. 46. I find that a little surprising. It does something fairly fundamental in removing the need for corroboration and admitting hearsay evidence, even if that is confined to the civil code and does not spill over into the criminal law.

I have a long memory. The Minister has referred to the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1968. I am glad to see my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) in his place, as he was the Minister who took that Bill through the Commons. He and I are among the few who can say that "we woz there", although the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) also played a part in the proceedings by voting against the removal of corroboration from actions for personal injury. As I said in a brief intervention, that is one of the slightly strange factors. Section 9 of that Act did exactly what this Bill is doing, but in a much more limited sense, because it related to only one or two specific types of categories of case, of which actions for personal injury were by far the most important.

We heard an extremely spirited attack from the Conservative Benches in 1968. Norman Wylie—a popular and respected Member at the time, now Lord Wylie and on the Court of Session Bench—led from the Front Bench. He said:

"These are provisions to which as a Scottish lawyer I take the strongest possible exception."

To be fair to him, he followed it through, and the Conservatives voted against clause stand part at the Committee stage. A certain Mr. Hector Monro was among those opposed to the reform. Who knows? We may even hear a small personal statement about why he has changed his mind. I presume that he is not leading a similar attack on the Government's policy this evening.

Norman Wylie went on to make it clear that in his view the whole proposition was unsound. The principle of corroboration, he said,

"provided a safeguard against the acceptance of untrue and unreliable testimony. This Bill proposes to abolish that requirement in a large tract of civil litigation . . . In my career of fifteen or sixteen years at the Bar I can only think of one case in which I had to advise that there was insufficient evidence to enable an action to be raised, and having regard to the later decisions of Cleisham v. the British Transport Commission I would certainly not have given that advice today."—[Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 19 March 1968; c. 24-5.]

On that basis he consigned, or tried to consign, the whole reform to the dustbin. It was not just a personal quirk; Wylie took the Conservative party with him. Perhaps I should say that I am pleased that Conservative Members have thought again about the matter in the considerable interval that has elapsed.

I notice from reading the reports that I supported the relaxation of the rule then, and I do so again tonight. It was quite an interesting debate. I was followed—this is a real piece of memorabilia—by Sir Hugh Lucas-Tooth. In those days, there was a different kind of hon. Gentleman on the Conservative Benches. In any event, I want to make it clear that we support the proposal on corroboration.

I have some reservations; in a strange way, I have more than I had in 1968. Then, a narrow exception was being introduced to right what was seen as a specific wrong. The House was unashamedly being a pursuer's man. We were saying that there were people who clearly deserved redress, and we strongly suspected that the court felt that they should receive it, but because of the technicalities of the need to find corroboration—even with all the ingenuity and the relaxation of the law—in some cases it was not possible to give that redress. It was very much in that spirit that we were moving to legislate. Now, of course, we are unashamedly removing altogether the rule about corroboration in civil cases. In a sense, that is a much more serious move, and although I give it my support, I think that it is worth stopping momentarily to consider the arguments.

The bare facts are stated, and the Minister quoted from the Scottish Law Commission report. However, let me quote briefly from paragraph 2.1:

"The requirement of corroboration has been regarded as a safeguard against the acceptance of unreliable evidence. Our consideration of current law and practice in civil proceedings, however, has now led us to the opinion that a formal requirement of corroboration in such proceedings is not in the overall interests of justice."

If that position is to be accepted, that is the end of the matter. I suppose that there is now a consensus which I have joined, but I think that the House should recognise that a considerable change is involved.

The argument on hearsay is similar. Perhaps I can do a bit of special pleading. I was never very comfortable with the rather artificial rules and definitions that surround the matter, and the niceties of simple and multiple hearsay as discussed in the report that we have, in effect, before us in legislative form.

I agree that there are arguments for retention. I am not particularly impressed with the jury's difficulty in evaluating hearsay evidence. The Minister mentioned that the Lord Advocate is considering the fate of civil juries. I should have thought that it was not a major issue, although I may be wrong. I see that the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) dissents, but I have considerable sympathy with the survival of a form of procedure that has almost fallen into desuetude. No doubt we can consider that on a future occasion.

I should be interested to hear something about the timetable. Perhaps the Minister will say a word about it when he sums up. He said, in his usual way, that there would be further consultation and that all interested parties would have a chance to have their say. But it is now six months since Lord Cameron of Lochbroom spoke on Second Reading in the House of Lords. I should have thought that, even if he had not reached a decison, he would have some idea of when one would be reached.

The main problem is that hearsay evidence admitted under the new relaxation would not be subject to cross-examination. That again was very fairly rehearsed in paragraph 3.21 of the report. The Commission made it clear that there were problems, as I think it was bound to do:

"in our view under our system of adversary procedure it can often be an essential tool for extracting the truth."

There has been some discussion of the departure from the draft Bill prepared by the Scottish Law Commission, under which notice had to be given if hearsay evidence was to be led. There were certain rights for the other side in the case. The Government have decided against that, probably rightly, although certainly the Lord Advocate did not try to argue the case; he merely stated flatly that it had been decided that it would not be right to go down that road. I noted that the Minister repeated that in exactly the same terms a few minutes ago. I hope that I will not depress him when I say that I do not see any possibility of a cursory Committee stage. He will probably be reassured, as he seemed worried about it. I look forward to a fairly full Committee hearing, and perhaps we can look at the matter with some care then.

A theme of some significance runs through the measures. They look at civil litigation in terms of common sense and the courts looking at the facts, trying to get at the truth and perhaps not standing too nicely upon the intricacies of procedure and the rules of court. The point was well made by our colleague who is now in another place, Lord Ross of Marnock, who said on 19 March 1968:

"If I may interpolate my own view, it is that, where there is a dispute about facts in a civil matter and the matter is brought before a court of law for an adjudication on the facts, justice can best be served and seen to be served if the court, however difficult this may be in certain cases, is allowed to determine what is the most probable reading of what occurred in the light of all the evidence and circumstances. A requirement of law such as the requirement of corroboration must be artificial and tend to come between the court and the most probable reading. Accordingly I am firmly in favour of the Commission's recommendation".—[Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 19 March 1968; c.10-11.]

That recommendation was ultimately section 9 of the 1968 Act.

One can take that argument too far, because if one applied it in the criminal area there would be considerable difficulties, but as a statement of general approach in the civil area it seems to underline what we are looking at now, and I should be prepared to support it.

We are relaxing the laws of evidence, but it seems that many of the court procedures are still narrow, formal and based on textual criticisms of pleadings, which the ordinary client often fails to understand. I remember being a young solicitor, even in the sheriff court, translating and transferring things from adjustment to procedural rolls, and not knowing what I was doing or why, but clutching a bit of paper for the occasion. I was conscious that it was causing a great deal of delay and no doubt frustration to my clients. We should consider that in the longer term to see whether there is a way of simplifying those procedures as well.

I was interested to note that paragraph 2.9 in the section on corroboration in the Scottish Law Commission's report stated:

> "A further criticism of the present law which has been made to us by some commentators and which we think of considerable practical importance is that the requirement can lead to unnecessary expense, delays and inconvenience."

I am not sure that the Law Society agrees with that, but I think that there is some force in it. If we are to take that seriously, we should look at some of our court procedures as well and we might get nearer to what was in the mind of Lord Ross of Marnock in 1968 when he suggested that a more common-sense approach was right.

According to the explanatory and financial memorandum, clause 1 will have no impact on public funds. I believe that there will probably be a small impact. If the reform means anything, presumably some cases will go to court which otherwise would not have done so, and some will proceed which otherwise might have been laid to rest. I should be interested if the Minister referred to the workings of the civil legal aid system now that the Scottish Legal Aid Board is in operation. I have looked at the latest accounts of the Scottish legal aid fund for the year to 31 March 1987, when it was under the control of the Law Society. The accounts are signed by Jock Smith and Ken Pritchard on behalf of the Law Society. The cost of solicitors' and counsels' fees and outlays in civil legal aid in 1986-87 was £14·5 million. I do not know whether there is any idea what the figure will be for 1987-88 or for the coming year—it is too early for that. I should be interested to know what trends are beginning to emerge now that the new scheme is in being.

I know that the Minister has been thinking about this and that there may be an opportunity to debate it later in the House, but I ask him to give an idea of the Government's thinking on the contentious issue of when legal aid comes into effect. As some people in the House will know, the old system was that one lodged the application and if the solicitor was reasonably confident that legal aid would be granted, he would continue to process the work. In due course the legal aid grant came through and the solicitor could charge properly for the work back to the date of lodgment. If the solicitor miscalculated, he would end up with unpaid work, but that was a gamble that most solicitors were prepared to take and it was in everyone's interest.

This is a point of real substance. Now, one applies for legal aid to the Scottish Legal Aid Board and is paid for the work that is done from the time when the intimation of grant is received. That may take three, six or perhaps more months and even when legal aid is granted, it is often six weeks before intimation is made. As a result, no solicitor of any prudence will do a hand's turn in the interests of his client until he has the intimation in his hand.

Effectively, the civil action will lie dormant perhaps for three to nine months, depending on the circumstances, with nothing happening at all, much to the frustration of those involved, because of the way in which the new system operates. I do not understand the rationale of that, because ultimately the work will have to be done and will be paid for by the legal aid fund. Under the old system it was done promptly, which was an advantage and in the public interest.

I hope that the Minister will reconsider, and reinstate the old system now. There is no doubt that delay brings the law into disrepute and it seems that he is now determined to build delay into the system. The matter arises, at least tangentially, under the Bill. Perhaps we shall be able to discuss it in Committee, but I invite the Minister to tell us his thinking, which must be in an advanced state by now.

I should like to conclude my speech because I do not want to rival the Minister in any way—thinking about it, I say that absolutely, but I say it particularly in regard to length of speech. I believe that we can have a useful, although not necessarily protracted Committee stage. There will be many points that are worth examining in Committee, one or two of which I have mentioned.

I am particularly interested in the reference to proofs before the sheriff under section 42 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) has had a great deal of experience in that. The distinction that is made between grounds of referral under section 32 of the Act—the majority of them—and section 32(2)(g), which depends upon an offence, is logical. However, it raises some interesting queries. I can envisage difficulties when there is a case under one of the grounds of referral which involves, for example, child abuse or sexual abuse, and where the relaxation of the laws of corroboration and hearsay will apply. Therefore, a finding might be made on the balance of probability rather than on proof beyond reasonable doubt, and the consequences could be fairly serious.

The very fact that we are relaxing hearsay opens up the argument, which I shall not rehearse now but which we might want to look at in Committee, on how one deals with the evidence of very young children and proofs within the children's hearing system. As the Minister knows, there has been a lengthy debate about video links, recorded statements and the circumstances in which they can be used. There has been interesting experimentation in the Glasgow sheriff courts and probably in other parts of Scotland. The provision, about section 42 of the 1968 Act, allows us to obtain a report of the Government's thinking, and I hope that we shall be able to do so in Committee.

It is good that it is now easier to prove that a record does not exist, or it will be once the measure is on the statute book. No one mourns the passing of corroboration by false denial. I promised the Minister that we shall not look too closely at the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879, which is mentioned fairly freely in the Bill. I am even prepared to accept that section 1 of the Evidence (Foreign, Dominion and Colonial Documents) Act 1933 is not affected, and to live with that disappointment. There are much more important matters than that.

[Mr. Donald Dewar]

I certainly welcome the Bill as it stands. It is the result of work by the Scottish Law Commission. The Minister paid his tribute and I am glad to echo it. I hope that I do not get into trouble for murmuring a judge, but the speech of Norman Wylie back in 1968 had a very funny passage, in which he invited us to look with great scepticism at the report of the Scottish Law Commission on the basis that there was no member of the Faculty of Advocates among its members. I am glad to say that that has been put right —not that that seems to be a particularly sound approach to legal judgment, but it was a long time ago.

I congratulate the Law Commission, particularly its chairman, Lord Maxwell, who will be retiring shortly. I do not know who his successor will be, but whoever it is I hope that he will carry on the good work in the years ahead. I see several other hon. Members wishing to rise so I conclude with a total irrelevancy—which I shall try to get in quickly before you interrupt me, Mr. Deputy Speaker —which is that, on a cut of the cards in Cumbernauld tonight, Labour took power.

Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith (Kincardine and Deeside): I shall leave the last remark of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), which will be welcomed on the Opposition Benches, although it may not be to one hon. Member there. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the modesty of his speech, at least in relation to its length, but modesty is purely a relative quality for this debate. I am delighted to see support on these Benches from hon. Friends with legal knowledge from south of the Border. No doubt they will contribute to our debate and enliven the Committee proceedings, ensuring that we have some good speeches.

As a complete layman on legal matters, I am going where I fear to tread, but at least I am prepared to try a little. I hope that that will be commended in the appropriate quarters and that there are rewards for trying as well as for other things. Obviously, I bow to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State who has experience of Law Commission reports and who has even been so brave as to take them to the length of private Member's Bills.

I have respect for the work of the Scottish Law Commission. What it advocates in its reports and what we seek to embody in legislation is well considered. But, like the hon. Member for Garscadden, I believe that it is important that we laymen should not take what it says for granted. Its views should be tested. The legislation removes the need for corroboration in ci il cases, so by implication it facilitates the procedures of the pursuer.

But we must also ask: what of the defendant? I hope that the House is a defender of those who may be affected badly by the legislation and I trust that a proper balance is struck and the defendant is not put in a weaker position as a result. I support a move towards simplification, but we have a right and duty to ensure that that is not at the expense of justice. That is fundamental, and I hope that my hon. Friend will address that point.

As the hon. Member for Garscadden said, trenchant comments were made when these matters were considered earlier in relation to personal industrial injury cases. If my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) were present, we might indeed have had some trenchant comments and it might have made for a livelier, better informed evening. As a poor substitute for him, I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to put any doubts at rest about the rights of defendants.

The Bill puts a particular onus on the judge or sheriff to maintain justice. He must ensure that any claims are properly substantiated. It is important to ensure that proceedings are not based on scraps of uncorroborated evidence or hearsay.

Does my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State anticipate that the legislation will give rise to many claims? The courts are already overburdened and I am sure that when he was in Falkirk today, despite the new facilities there, those responsible for the workings of the courts would have used the opportunity to tell him how overburdened the courts are. While our main objective must be to see that justice is done, equally we do not want the courts to be cluttered with spurious claims that have little chance of success.

It would help us to reach a decision—certainly it would guide me how to vote—if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State could tell us whether the 1968 legislation has been successful in terms of damages for personal injuries. Has it increased the claims, has it given a proper opportunity to genuine claims or has it been merely a stimulant of spurious claims? What are the views of the Law Society and the Faculty of Advocates? Apparently the position of the Faculty of Advocates is rectified in relation to the Law Commission, but it would be helpful for laymen like me to know what the learned view is of those whose job it is to administer the law.

The hon. Member for Garscadden raised the subject of legal aid. If the legislation is to simplify legal procedures, I would expect it to give better access to the law for those whose rights need to be upheld. I am slightly surprised that there are no implications for costs and public expenditure as a result of the Bill. Surely we are trying to facilitate procedures through the courts, so that is likely to lead to more cases and applications having to be assessed. How many new cases does my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State expect to arise as a result of the legislation, and will that increase the need for legal aid?

To follow the example set so far in this debate, I shall refer to some specific points on which I seek clarification. Clauses 5 and 6 deal with documents. Since these clauses apparently automatically allow true copies or proofs of statement, what procedures are there to ensure that the original can be challenged, thus ensuring that the copies are properly substantiated and followed through?

Clause 9 is the definitions clause. It states that "hearsay" includes hearsay of whatever degree. What are those degrees of hearsay? It would be helpful to a layman like me to have some explanation of that.

The hon. Member for Garscadden passed quickly over clause 10(3), but I should like to know why we have an Evidence (Colonial Statutes) Act 1907, an Evidence (Foreign, Dominion and Colonial Documents) Act 1933 and an Oaths and Evidence (Overseas Authorities and Countries) Act 1963. These are important matters about which the House should know. I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies to the debate—even if his speech is short in relation to the one that he made earlier —he will find time to deal with clause 10(3). That will also guide me in how I vote at the end of the debate.

There is great strength on the Government Front Bench tonight, with a former Deputy Chief Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Sir J. Stradling Thomas), having been wheeled in to ensure that the legislation goes through properly. There is obviously great anxiety about the Bill.

Corroboration has been removed from personal injury law and civil evidence law. That leaves only the law of criminal evidence. My hon. Friend the Minister made it clear that the Government do not intend to introduce a similar measure for that area, but there has been a gradual progression from 1968 to 1988, and simple people like me may wonder whether in 2008 there will be a move to apply similar measures to criminal proceedings. It would do a service to the House, and it would give us some insight into my hon. Friend's mind, if he would say how he views an extension in 2008 of the principle that started in 1968.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I, too, declare an interest as a member of the Faculty of Advocates. I share the sense of regret expressed by the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) at the absence from this Scottish occasion of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). I have it by way of uncorroborated hearsay that had he been present he would not have allowed the Minister quite the favourable hearing that he enjoyed from the House.

The debate turns on corroboration and hearsay. It is interesting that the Bill and the Minister defend a set of circumstances in relation to tribunals which the Bill, if properly directed, should have tried to change. Although corroboration and hearsay will be swept away in a civil action—I shall return to the absence of definition of that in due course—if legislation which provides for arrangements in tribunals contradicts the proposal to abolish corroboration and hearsay, that existing legislation will continue to prevail.

In an intervention I mentioned to the Minister a case that has recently come to my attention in which someone trying to prosecute a complaint of poor dental treatment has discovered that the inquiry set up by the local health board requires corroboration to establish the validity of the complaint.

Mr. Home Robertson: The tooth, the whole tooth and nothing but the tooth?

Mr. Campbell: If it is possible in a civil action to sue for £10 million and to be successful on uncorroborated evidence, it is curious that a similar relaxation of the rules of evidence is not available in cases where someone tries to establish poor or improper treatment.

The starting point for the relaxation of corroboration was section 9 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1968. But following its enactment, the decisions of the Court of Session have been by no means consistent. I cite for the information of the House, but not for that of the Minister, who will be more than familiar with them, the cases of Maclaren v. Caldwells Paper Mill Company and Morrison v. Kelly. Although the Court of Session did not blunt the effect of the legislation in those cases, it interpreted the law in such a way that it did not fulfil the considerable expectations that many people in the House had for it.

For example, it appears to be accepted that the existence of the exception—currently the law under section 9—is no excuse if corroborative evidence is available and has not been led. What evidence do the Government have that section 9 has fulfilled the function for which it was passed into law? What evidence do they have that that section has alleviated many of the hardships that were in the minds of those who promoted that provision vigorously?

Although I cannot speak on behalf of the Faculty of Advocates and give the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside the informed collective view that he sought, as someone who has practised in the Court of Session for the 20 years since section 9 became law, I can say that it has had little effect on the conduct of cases and, perhaps more significantly, has had little or no effect on the settlement of cases. That may be due more to the interpretation placed on section 9 by the court than to the terms of the legislation. My researches have revealed that no case that has come from Scotland to the Judicial Committee in another place would remove some of the apparent inconsistencies that those two decisions have thrown up.

If corroboration is no longer required, the evaluation and assessment of the evidence of a single witness will require special care and attention. That is no more than one would expect when a judge is sitting alone. But when a judge sits with a jury in civil cases, which is still common in the Court of Session and which is still a pursuer's right, unless special cause can be shown to the contrary, the requirement for careful and analytical direction of the jury will be paramount.

I was taken aback by the Minister's somewhat light-hearted suggestion that the civil jury trial in Scotland may not last much longer. In my professional experience, as someone who has appeared on behalf of pursuers and of defendants, in some cases juries are especially appropriate in determining the issues that are in dispute. I am thinking particularly of what, south of the Tweed, is called the running-down case, but which in Scotland is more frequently referred to as the case arising out of a road traffic accident.

I hope that the Government will not embark lightly on proposals to remove civil jury trials from the procedure available to the Court of Session. The mere fact that the opportunity to have a civil jury trial is infrequently invoked does not mean that it should necessarily be removed from a litigant's advisers if, in their judgment, that is the best way for the case to proceed.

A number of difficult matters arise with regard to corroboration. I should be grateful if the Minister could deal with one matter. I have observed that much is being heaped on his head for the closing speech. No doubt, if there are matters with which he cannot deal, he will, with his usual courtesy, write to those whom he has been unable to satisfy. What concerns me is that, if in an action of reduction of a document, such as a will or a disposition of heritable property, the evidence of a single witness will be sufficient, if believed, to bring that action to a successful conclusion, how does the Minister square that with the fact that the execution of a document—the coming into effect of the document—by law in Scotland requires that the signature of the person executing it be witnessed by two witnesses? One would have the paradoxical circumstance in which it would take two people to vouch that I have signed a disposition of heritable property, but only I myself, if believed—I hope that that would be the case—would be sufficient to cause that document to be regarded as no longer being of any legal effect.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I follow the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument, but we are dealing with two different circumstances. When a will is being made, the parties and witnesses can be present. When proving it on a later occasion, perhaps only one person may be present, or perhaps none, except for hearsay evidence of some sort. It may not be possible to have the same requirement at the later stage of the execution of a will.

Mr. Campbell: I hesitate to embark on a detailed discussion with the hon. Gentleman about the requirements of the execution of wills and dispositions, but it is worthy of note that the requirement for two witnesses is to establish the bona fide of the signature of the person executing the document. That is corroboration because two witnesses, not one, are required. It is noticeable that, when documents are issued by English finance houses or their equivalent, only one witness is sought. In Scotland, the rule remains that two witnesses are required. That is a question to which the Minister might address his mind, and in so doing he may be able to satisfy not only me but the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan).

I wish to take more serious issue with the Minister about the absence of a definition of civil proceedings in the Bill. He said that interdict was a civil or, perhaps more correctly, a quasi-criminal process. It is more correctly defined as being a civil process that may have quasi-criminal consequences. An action for interdict, which is the Scottish equivalent of an injunction, is commenced in a civil court. The point at which the consequences become quasi-criminal is if a person is guilty of a breach of an order of the court, which is treated as contempt of court and can be visited with punishments such as a fine or, if thought appropriate, imprisonment.

The difficulty that the Bill necessarily creates for practitioners is that, if there is no definition of "any civil proceedings", and if the Minister accepts that interdict may be civil or criminal on his own analysis, a practitioner who is asked to raise an initial writ in the sheriff court, or a summons in the Court of Session, will not be aware of what volume of evidence he is required to have before embarking on proceedings. If corroboration is required, it would be improper for a solicitor to raise an initial writ in the sheriff court or for an advocate to draft a summons for the Court of Session without corroborated evidence—evidence from two sources.

I suspect that the absence of a definition may give rise to considerable difficulty in circumstances in which urgency is often a paramount consideration. I hope, therefore, that the Government will give further consideration to whether it would not be appropriate, for the purposes of the Bill, to give a definition of what they regard as "any civil proceedings."

Like the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), I welcome unequivocally the ending of the rule that evidence might be corroborated by false denial. That rule applied only in actions of affiliation and aliment, in which, to echo the archaic language used in these matters sometimes, there was a peniuria testium—a shortage of evidence arising out of the circumstances in which affiliation and the concomitant aliment might become necessary. It was a curious anomaly that something could be established because someone was found to be telling lies about it. The relaxation of the rule of corroboration, which the Bill necessarily embraces, removes something from our law that sat very uneasily in it.

I am much less sanguine about the value of allowing hearsay evidence to be admissible than about the relaxation of the rule of corroboration. I can do no better than quote from the late Lord Normand in the case Teper v. King, where he said:

> "The rule against the admission of hearsay evidence is fundamental. It is not the best evidence and it is not delivered on oath. The truthfulness and accuracy of the person whose words are spoken to by another witness cannot be tested by cross-examination, and the light which his demeanour would throw on his testimony would be lost."

One is entitled to ask what experience the Government have and what representations have been made to them that the proposition to which I have referred from the observations of Lord Normand is one that should necessarily be departed from and is justified by the terms of the Bill.

As to clause 3, I welcome the fact that statements made previously may be available to support or attack credibility. Up until now, by virtue of the terms of section 3 of the Evidence (Scotland) Act 1852, such statements were available only as a means of attacking credibility, not supporting it. I wonder whether the Minister will say something about the fact that a precognition is excluded, by clause 9, as being a means by which credibility might be supported or attacked. Is the Minister satisfied that the exclusion of a precognition is justified for that purpose?

I am surprised by clause 8(3), which talks about evidence consisting of the evidence of a person other than the person seeking the remedy. If I read that correctly, it means that a person might be in a position to obtain one of the remedies referred to in clause 8(2) without giving evidence himself. That seems a rather curious feature of the language of that part of the Bill. I should have thought that there was a strong argument, having regard to the remedies and types of action referred to in clause 8(2), that there should be evidence from a source other than the person seeking the remedy. I find it difficult to understand how the alternative evidence might be treated as the only evidence available in the case.

The Minister has said that there is no intention, especially with regard to hearsay and corroboration, that these principles should be extended from the civil law to the criminal law. Even from this short debate he must by now appreciate that the Government will find no welcome for any attempt to do that. I am by no means entirely cynical, but one can imagine reverberations at some future Conservative party conference when the law and order lobby is in full cry and the Lord Advocate has his not inconsiderable back to the wall. It is not difficult to imagine it being suggested that one reason why too many people escape justice is the somewhat archaic rules about corroboration and hearsay, with the argument that, as it has already been abolished in civil cases, it should be abolished in criminal cases, too. The Minister should mark the considerable opposition to any such suggestion, which he will find to be as vehement among Conservative Back Benchers as it is in the Opposition.

In this context, I can do no better than remind the Minister of the Thomson committee's third report on criminal procedure. Paragraph 1.09 puts the matter succinctly but in a form that every lawyer practising in the criminal court should know as well as any other piece of information available. It states:

"The greatest safeguard against a miscarriage of justice is —and should continue to be—the rule of law that the Crown must prove its case beyond reasonable doubt on corroborated evidence."

I for one will allow no departure from that fundamental part of our criminal law. My justification for that statement is drawn from the fact that I once led the Minister in a murder trial and since then have appeared in the High Court of Justiciary both as Crown counsel and as defence counsel. That experience leaves me in no doubt, whatever may be the case in civil matters, of the fundamental importance in criminal matters of corroboration and the exclusion of hearsay. Any diminution of that is a price that cannot be paid. It is a part of our procedure which cannot be given up.

In that spirit, subject to the comments and observations that I have made, I welcome the Bill and trust that it will have the same speedy and effective progress through this House as it apparently enjoyed in another place.

8.42 pm

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): The skill and success of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) as an international athlete is surpassed only by his knowledge of the law. I am therefore reluctant to follow him, as I certainly could not on the track, down the route that he has taken today.

The hon. and learned Gentleman raised a number of interesting points and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will refer to them when he winds up the debate. It would save a great deal of trouble if he would elucidate the point whether there should be one or two witnesses for such legal documents as transfers of stocks and shares in the future. As a trustee of various trusts, I find it a frightful nuisance when solicitors send transfer documents to be signed and one has to find two witnesses, neither of whom may be one's wife. That is often quite difficult at short notice. If that is to go by the board, let the Minister say so today and, if not, why not. I take the point that if two witnesses are required in drawing up a will and all that that means in terms of the law, it should not be too easily altered or cancelled with just one witness to the signature. My hon. Friend the Minister may not have considered that detail in drafting the Bill, but the repercussions are important and it would be interesting to hear his views.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East dealt similarly with clause 9, which contains four subsections defining civil proceedings. I hazard a guess that those provisions will occupy the Standing Committee for a good deal longer than many other provisions in the Bill. The clause deals with important items such as arbitration. We know of the importance of agricultural arbitration. It also deals with tribunals. Most of us have experience of constituents appearing before tribunals and there is often some conflict of evidence. If, as my hon. Friend the Minister seemed to indicate, each tribunal is to draw up its own system of evidence, it will certainly take the Committee some time to reach a decision on that.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will also deal with the subject of legal aid. In the past year, many of us will have had experiences with legal aid which have been unfortunate, to say the least. Not only are there delays in decisions, but there is the important question of the stage at which the solicitor taking on a case can be assured that legal aid will be awarded for the work undertaken. At present, a substantial period may elapse while a solicitor is working on the case when it is far from clear whether legal aid will ultimately be available. I know that there is a running inquiry. I know that inquiries are currently taking place and that my hon. Friend the Minister is deeply involved in these issues, but I hope that he will be able to say something on the subject today.

I am tempted to point out with regard to the cutting of cards in Cumbernauld that, although things have worked out well for the Opposition there—the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) may have invoked the assistance of Paul Daniels—things may not work out so well later in the week when an equally important cut has to take place. I am also sad that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) cannot be with us today as I am sure that he would have had some interesting and perhaps hilarious comments to make on the Bill, given his lukewarm approach to corroboration and hearsay evidence as altered by the Bill.

I note with interest that the Scottish Law Commission report is number 100. The commission has been a tremendous boon to Scotland. It has been looked after by many distinguished lawyers and we should express our gratitude to them, not just for the present report but for the 99 that presumably went before it, assuming that they are indeed numbered in sequence. We should thus give praise to Lord Maxwell and his team for their recommendations. The present report may be shorter than most but, as my hon. Friend the Minister has said, it was produced after the most detailed consultation.

The hon. Member for Garscadden was ragging me for having supported the then Opposition view of the legislation before the House in 1968. As a dutiful Whip, it was my duty to ensure that everyone supported the then Opposition. Twenty years later, after much consultation and further experience, if my hon. Friend the Minister now takes a different view I am sure that it is the result of experience in the courts and I am thus quite happy that there should be a change of attitude.

The Government have brought the Law Commission's reports into use year by year. I am glad that the Bill, which was based on the report dated February 1986, had its Second Reading in another place as soon as November 1987. That shows commendable speed on the part of the Scottish Office in getting on with legislation and implementing the recommendations in the Law Commission's reports.

Like the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East, as soon as I read that the Bill dealt with the corroboration of evidence, I sat up and thought, "Heavens! This is a major change in Scots law. Will civil or criminal evidence be affected? Have the Government taken leave of their senses if it is criminal evidence?" I am glad that it subsequently emerged that the Bill dealt only with civil cases. I would have the gravest reservations if the Bill affected criminal cases too. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will confirm that there is nothing in the pipeline that might change that aspect of Scots law, which has been extremely important for centuries. Scots law has frequently been copied in England and Wales to the benefit of those countries. However, I would certainly not want any part of our system of evidence in criminal cases changed in Scotland.

I also raised an eyebrow when I heard that we were to change the rules of hearsay evidence. My experience of the law is very limited, and I think back with horror to the time when, as a young officer, I was sent to deal with a summary of evidence for a court martial, never quite understanding what hearsay evidence was. I am only glad to think that no one was successfully convicted as a result of any of my recommendations. The matter was incomprehensible to me then, as it is now. I hope that we shall not make major changes in the rules of hearsay evidence, other than what is proposed in the Bill.

I listened carefully to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary—[Interruption.] It was worth listening to. I am sure that he will clear up some points of information when he winds up. Perhaps he will tell us whether the present rules, while desirable, are not likely to be sensible in every case. I suppose that a layman might say that, under the Bill, rules for the corroboration of evidence will be more flexible than the present rigid rules. Sometimes that inflexibility prevents cases from coming to court, but I hope that the Bill will not have the reverse effect. I hope that we shall not have many more cases coming to court in which there is a competition between witnesses to tell the most outrageous story because they do not need to have corroboration. My one fear is that there may be too much of a swing from difficulty in obtaining correct evidence to ease of providing evidence in civil cases. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will allay our fears on that.

Judging by the Law Commission's report, the key issue seems to be the credibility of witnesses and how they stand up to cross-examination rather than having two or three witnesses trying to tell the same story. The Minister gave a number of helpful examples to illustrate the point about the credibility of witnesses. Presumably, most of the proceedings will be heading towards major damages cases.

I return to the more serious question of the criminal law and reiterate that I strongly agree that we must not change that in Scotland. One paragraph of the Second Reading debate, which took place on 12 November 1987 caught my eye. The Lord Advocate said:

"The commission concluded that the existing law offended against its main principles by being unduly complex and excluding potentially valuable evidence. The current rule is that hearsay evidence is generally inadmissible but is subject to certain exceptions. I agree entirely with the commission's broad conclusion."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1987; Vol. 489, c. 1541.]

The commission was right to bring forward the report on corroboration and hearsay and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State were right to introduce the Bill with the support of the Lord Advocate.

One also reads in the Second Reading debate in the other place that in 1985 there were only four jury trials of civil cases. That may not be of major importance. I hope that we shall address the issue of tribunals, of which we have all had experience. It is important that we get the provisions right—including clause 9, with respect to the definition.

We return to the most important point, which is that the reliability of evidence is all-important. That sways me to support the Bill, and I commend it to the House.

8.56 pm

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I am pleased to have the chance of listening to the rustle of dead leaves, because I bear some responsibility for the Bill. I do not recall that it was simple to get my proposal past my Secretary of State at the time. I was a very junior and fresh Minister and those who knew Willie Ross will know some of the difficulties that we had. However, I am sure that I was right and I am sure that the Law Commission was right. I cannot remember which came first—its evidence or my cases.

It is important to know what gave rise to the report. For me, it was two cases. In those days, my constituency covered Port Glasgow. A man who was removing the scaffolding from a ship in the shipyard was found dead, with the scaffolding broken. There was no corroboration of the incident. I fought as hard as I could and went to various lawyers and various places, but I could not win the case because it required corroboration so that everyone knew what had happened. The second case, which was cited by the Scottish Law Commission, involved a woman cleaner on a train. Shunting occurred and she was killed. Everyone knew the cause.

We recognised that the point went wider. Indeed, I was reproved for saying so. It is important that we should welcome the developments, as we have covered much ground. In the debate on the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill 1968, I said:

"I wonder whether we should not go even further than we have considered and whether there is a case for exploring the whole case for corroboration in order to ensure that no purely technical requirements prevent justice from being done. This is probably a point at issue. It is not a point we shall explore here because we have taken our respective lines in terms of this Bill".

I was interrupted later by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar)—then the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South—who said:

"Is the hon. Gentleman not being a trifle unfair here? There is the factor of the review being carried out by the Law Commission, and we do not want to prejudice that."—[Official Report, Scottish Standing Committee, 9 April 1968; c. 112.]

I said, no, indeed. I stress that point because it is well to remember that the opposition came from not only our side—the Government—in a minor way, but from the Conservatives and, I regret, the Liberals, in the shape of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel).

The legislation was also opposed by the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) speaking for the Scottish National party, not because it was in line with English law—she said that she could accept that—but because the Bar Association of Glasgow, of which I think she was the secretary at one time, regarded it as unnecessary. I am sorry that the Scottish courts have not applied this practice. We were never under the illusion that it was done to subvert the role of the jury. On the contrary, it provided that no more than the evidence that could be prevented by a technicality should be able to be brought forward and its reliability tested.

A number of other strange things happened. My hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden said that English Tories were present. I regret that the 1968 legislation was miscellaneous. I congratulate the Government—it is infinitely better to get a law passed in totality than as part of a miscellaneous Bill. The English Tory was Sir Hugh Lucas-Tooth, who dealt with the illegitimacy aspect. He said:

"I would remind hon. Members that that Committee"—the committee on the law of succession in relation to illegitimate persons—

"always referred to illegitimate persons by the good old-fashioned English word 'bastards'. I do not know if there is any special Scottish equivalent. I propose to use that word."

I said:

"In Scotland we used to call it a love child. I think that rather better."

Sir Hugh Lucas-Tooth gave the astonishing reply:

"There are certain implications in the Scottish form which I would not always accept."—[Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 19 March 1968; c. 35.]

That must have been the first time in history that a Tory found that an illegitimate child could not have been born out of love. We have seen it borne out by the Government's actions over the last nine years. We must rejoice that there has been movement in the legislation under this Government.

There was a fear that the practice of accepting uncorroborated evidence could become a habit. Surely, if anything, it has gone the other way. The procedure has not been used sufficiently and judges have directed against it where it has been used. The emphasis given by the bench has been to remind the jury that it is uncorroborated evidence. I am afraid that, to a jury, that is not always taken as being uncorroborated in a technical sense; it has suggested a whiff of non-existent support. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) that this system could start to replace the normal judicial process.

It is with great pleasure, as well as the rustle of dead leaves, that I welcome the Bill. There is another point which is worth making because so many lawyers are present. I said:

"it has been said that it is a folk tradition that reasonable men would demand corroboration. I may not be an authority on the law, but I think that I can claim to be an authority on folk tradition, one essential of which is that natural justice has supremacy over the rules of law. The law is there to serve justice and not to be the master of justice."—[Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 30 January 1968, c. 55.]

If technicalities prevent injustices, they must be removed. If they must be removed, they must rest on the kernel of good justice—the decision of the bench and the jury. The Bill does no more than say that, and I welcome it.

9.4 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I do not claim to have any special knowledge of legal matters. I am sorry that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) is not here. He and I have discussed the Bill. He has expressed grave concern about some aspects of it. I shall not attempt to emulate what he would say. First, I do not have his flowery flow of language, and, secondly, I do not have his experience of Scottish courts. If, in future, corroboration is not required, before we make what must be a major change in Scots law, we must be satisfied that the measure will be an improvement on existing practice.

I recognise that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland has examined the matter in detail and at length. He will understand that, like my right hon. and hon. Friends who have already spoken, I want an assurance that this measure will not be the thin end of the wedge and that, at some future date, we shall not see changes in the criminal law in Scotland. As we know, corroboration is an important part of criminal proceedings. The measure is designed to make sure that innocent people cannot be convicted without corroboration.

I remind my hon. Friend that it was judged to be useful and helpful in Scottish criminal cases to introduce a system whereby, when an individual is charged with an offence, the procurator fiscal may send him a warning letter.

My hon. Friend will be aware of my concern about a case that arose in Perth. The person was not charged in Perth—in fact, he was charged in Dundee—but the matter affected some individuals in Perth. In particular, my hon. Friend will be aware that I was concerned that certain Conservative councillors were interviewed by the Tayside police on the basis of some confidential information—that is, the name of the individual who had received the warning letter from the procurator fiscal which, by arrangement, had been sent to his lawyer. That individual complained, and the Tayside police interviewed Conservative councillors and other prominent people in Perth. It is an on-going matter.

It is not my intention this evening to go into the details, but, at some future date, I may be forced to do so if events proceed much further. My colleagues in Perth—city, regional and district councillors—again find themselves being subjected to questioning by Tayside police. For the benefit of the House, I add that all such individuals are innocent, in that they were just interviewed by the police to try to find out where the leak had occurred. As hon. Members know a great deal about leaks, they will understand that there was concern about the leak of that confidential letter that had been dispatched to a prominent individual in Perth. That individual denies being the individual concerned. There is much at issue.

I raise the matter because I hope that, with a lack of corroboration in civil proceedings, we shall not again run into difficulties or produce more problems than we set out to solve. As I mentioned in regard to sending out letters from the procurator fiscal, it was intended to simplify the legal procedure and reduce the number of individuals being taken to court—at least, that is what I understand was the thinking behind it.

My hon. Friend will be aware also of my concern about how we appoint individuals to crime prevention panels and how the chief constable sets about his task. Perhaps a new code of conduct——

Mr. Doran: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman has spent the past five minutes or so discussing what strikes me as criminal proceedings. This is a civil evidence Bill. The hon. Gentleman's contribution has nothing whatever to do with this measure.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): A Second Reading debate is quite wide. The hon. Gentleman is reasonably within order. He is an experienced parliamentarian, and he knows what he is doing.

Mr. Walker: I am astonished at that intervention, especially coming from a lawyer. He more than anyone should know that one must deal with corroboration carefully. I deliberately did not go into all the details of the matter because I did not wish to use my parliamentary privilege to resolve a matter that may be resolved more amicably elsewhere. I am treading carefuly, but it is a case where the issue of corroboration is important. On Second Reading of an important piece of fundamental Scottish legislation I believe that we should examine carefully evidence that shows that corroboration or lack of it could present us with problems.

The House will appreciate that I require some reassurances. I am unhappy about the aspect of civil proceedings that would change the corroboration of evidence. I am a layman, however, and I am prepared to be convinced by more experienced lawyers—there is an abundance of them around us this evening. I would be happy to take their advice. I merely put on record my concern so that the Minister is aware of it.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, South): I give a cautious welcome to the Bill and I wish to concentrate on the issues that add a wee bit more than caution to my welcome.

First, I am concerned about civil juries. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) was emphatic about that. When the Lord Advocate introduced the Bill on Second Reading in another place he made it clear that he was reviewing the role of the civil jury in Court of Session cases. I should be interested to know whether any progress has been made in that consideration.

My main interest is the Bill's impact on the children's hearing system, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) alluded. I believe that we are making some significant progress. The Minister knows that, at present, the procedure used for most aspects of the children's hearing system in the courts is civil procedure. There has been some abuse in certain sections of that procedure. The removal of the corroboration rule will give tremendous assistance in establishing child abuse and child sexual abuse cases.

I believe that such abuse has existed for a long time at the high levels that are presently being discovered. We now have a more effective way in which to uncover the problem, and more cases are coming to light. The removal of the corroboration rule will certainly assist the reporters to the children's panel and the Scottish courts in discovering more cases and determining them. That will help children in need. I welcome that, and that welcome is shared by the Reporters Association and the various child care associations that are involved in such cases.

I can think of a number of occasions when, as a solicitor in private practice, I have had to discuss with families the sheer frustration that they have felt at the fact that cases have not been dealt with before the courts because the reporter has been unable to prove his case.

Many cases of child abuse and sexual abuse are discovered outside the home, at school or nursery school. Presently, evidence from a teacher, a nursery nurse or a social worker would be inadmissible. The Bill will provide a considerable improvement and the work of the social work departments and children's hearing system will be much more effective because courts will be able to deal with such cases.

There are three questions which I wish to leave with the Minister. I have already mentioned juries, and I am anxious to hear from him about that. In relation to the children's hearing system, some doubt has been expressed in the Court of Session about the use of civil procedure in connection with child abuse and sexual abuse cases.

At the moment, the Court of Session is reluctant to use a civil basis when it has to determine whether sexual abuse has occurred. Of course, by making that determination, it is saying that a crime has occurred, and the court would be more comfortable using a criminal standard of proof. Section 9 removes the court's option in that respect and in all cases, except the allegation of an offence having been committed by the child, the standard of proof should be a civil standard of proof. I am anxious to receive the Minister's confirmation of that point.

Another point that has already been made, but which I have no difficulty in reinforcing, involves legal aid. As the Minister knows, two tests must be satisfied before legal aid is granted: the means test and the test of probarilis causa, which is that there is a good case to be fought. If we dilute the standard of proof necessary in a court, that must have an effect on the consideration of legal aid applications. It may be that until a case is before the court and the sheriff or the judge sees the evidence and assesses it, it will be difficult to assess exactly what the probarilis causa is.

I am interested to know what instructions, if any, the Minister will give the Scottish Legal Aid Board to guide the board on how to consider those cases. If we have a lower standard of proof, which effectively we shall have if we remove the corroboration and hearsay rules, I hope that there will be a slackening of the restrictions on legal aid applications.

While on legal aid—I declare a vested interest as a solicitor—the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden on the considerable inefficiencies and delays that the introduction of the Scottish Legal Aid Board brought to the legal system in Scotland need to be addressed. Like my hon. Friend, I am anxious to hear what the Minister has to say on those matters.

9.17 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I will be brief on a civil law Bill which so far has received a broad welcome. I certainly support the two guiding principles singled out by the Scottish Law Commission, first that "the law should be simplified to the greatest degree consistent with the proper functioning of the law of evidence" and secondly that,

"as a general rule all evidence should be admissible unless there is good reason for it to be treated as inadmissible."

Those twin principles of simplification and wider access to evidence in civil law cases are welcomed.

I note also that the Law Commission wishes to proceed with a measure of caution in dealing with the problems built into the present position, while bringing about necessary changes. The solution that the Law Commission has adopted seems to learn from existing answers in the United States, Australia, England and Wales, and should bring sensible improvements into Scottish civil law. However, criminal law is a different matter. I support the opposition expressed by other hon. Members to any extension of those measures into the criminal law. Such a move would be opposed tooth and nail and I hope that the Minister will state that he has no wish to extend these changes into criminal law.

It is interesting to note that the flexibility, informality and ability to introduce change of tribunals is now in some way influencing the more formalised court structure. That might be the start of a useful trend of modernising and reforming courts in a way which would make them much more accessible to the people.

I hope that the Government will take on board the points raised by various hon. Members about legal aid. Difficulties in gaining access to legal aid and delays in processing applications are causing problems. I hope that the Minister will address himself to these problems.

I pay tribute to the work of the Scottish Law Commission and its consultative document. Perhaps the degree of cross-party unanimity is a reflection of its detailed work. I hope that the proposed changes will avoid the present pitfalls of unnecessary expense, delays and inconvenience, while introducing a relaxation of the present rules in the interests of justice. While sharing some of the reservations that have already been expressed, I should like to endorse the favourable comments that have been made so far, which allow the Bill all-party support.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): It is a pleasure for me to be able to renew my interest in Scottish affairs. I only hope that it will not be necessary in this debate for me to examine my Scottish family tree and to compare it with those of Opposition Members, as happened in the Committee debate on the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

I should like to compare Scottish law with the law in England and Wales, because, as so often happens, Scotland is leading the way. When are the changes that are introduced by this Bill likely to be considered for England? That is a heartfelt plea from a mere English barrister, albeit with Scottish blood, who came into contact with the law of hearsay evidence in quite a large way at the beginning of this decade.

I was involved for several years in a case in the chancery division of the High Court in England, called Baden Delvaux v. Société Generale. It lasted 108 days in the court of first instance and a mere three weeks in the Court of Appeal, and it founded my pension fund. The main question in the case was whether a bank which had trust funds in its accounts should be held responsible for a fraudulent misappropriation of those funds by a signatory to the account. It depended on the extent of the bank's knowledge of the fraud and on whether there had actually been a fraud in the first place. It was my job in that case to prove that there had been a fraud.

The fraud had arisen in the Investors Overseas Services empire because of the involvement of a gang of fraudsters led by Mr. Robert Vesco. Mr. Vesco was, and probably still is, a brilliant man who, sadly, turned his brilliance to crime and as a result is now living in terror of being found in the jurisdiction of the United States of America. I understand that his current occupation is drug-running in the Caribbean. In the 1970s, he was involved in defrauding the investors in the IOS empire of their money. He did it by moving money around between companies, setting up a company here, changing a share structure there, and moving bearer shares between Switzerland and Costa Rica, Panama and the Bahamas, and between countries that I had hardly heard of, such as the Netherlands Antilles and Curacao, which I had thought was a drink.

The essence of the fraud was that the more complicated it was, the more likely it was to succeed. And complicated it was, and succeed it did, at least in part. Mr. Vesco ended up extremely rich—with his own private plane, with a jacuzzi on board—with the then Government of the Bahamas close to, if not actually in, his pocket, and with extra perks that not many of us would even dream about.

It was my job to prove the movements of the money, in circumstances where the movements had been deliberately concealed. The job involved searching for depositions and statements—all hearsay statements—made in different jurisdictions all over the world. When I say that the IOS fraud has spawned well over 200 cases in different jurisdictions, it will be appreciated that the job was huge.

Under the Civil Evidence Act 1968, it was necessary to prove it all by serving notices. I drafted four such notices, which took several months. I was not working unduly slowly. It must be remembered that there were several hundred documents in each notice. The documents that we were relying on were documents of the highest repute, such as depositions taken on oath by the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States of America and judgments of courts in the United States of America and Canada. However, for each, the requirements of the Civil Evidence Act 1968 had to be followed.

The notices were extremely complicated, as must be expected, because so were the documents to which they referred. The documents in court, which were a tiny fraction of the documents that had to be considered in the case, were well over 15,000 pages long and it took many weeks simply to read them to the court. In the event, although we had been through this hugely laborious process, the existence of the fraud and the truth of the documents were not even seriously challenged. The process cost one of the litigants hundreds of thousands of pounds. I have to doubt whether it was worth while. It would have been far better if in the English courts there had been a simple rule such as that which will be introduced by the Bill.

I welcome the Bill not only for what it does but for what it does not do. It represents a real step forward in the development of the law of evidence, because the unnecessary retention of complex rules can lead to the law being seen as existing only for its own purposes rather than serving the best interests of those who have a genuine grievance to bring before the courts.

As a lawyer, I believe that it is my job to discourage people from going to law, and it is our job as Members of Parliament to make sure that, if people have to go to law, that law is as simple as possible. The main beneficiary of the law should be not the lawyer but the litigant. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) said that simplification should not be at the expense of justice. In a sense, he is right, but justice is a relative term. If, in order to achieve justice, litigants are forced to go through a hugely expensive and cumbersome process which causes delay and frightens them off, one should question whether they are in pursuit of genuine justice, because absolute perfection in a legal system can, paradoxically, be most unjust.

I agree entirely with the Scottish Law Commission's adherence to the guiding principle of a law of evidence which is as simple as possible but which renders a maximum amount of evidence admissible. The Bill moves the existing law towards that aim, which is most desirable, but at the same time it recognises the good sense of legal advisers and judges preventing the courts from becoming a free-for-all, with cases proceeding on uncorroborated and hearsay evidence.

[Mr. James Arbuthnot]

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) said that, if there were no opportunity to test evidence because there had been no notice, for example under the Civil Evidence Act, then surely that evidence would be of little probative value. Yes, he is right, but that is something which the judge ought to be able to take into account. Like the absence of corroboration, it should simply be a factor, not something that leads to total exclusion of the evidence.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) rightly said that hearsay evidence is not the best evidence, but are we to say that not only is it not the best, but neither is it ever good enough? That should be up to the judge. As my noble and learned friend the Lord Advocate said:

"Although parties will be able to rely upon uncorroborated evidence and also hearsay evidence, it seems to me that prudent legal advisers will continue to seek to establish their cases beyond peradventure. On that basis I would expect that they will continue to lead corroborative evidence, where it is available, and to bring the makers of statements before the courts whenever possible in order that the weightiest evidence can be adduced for proof of their case."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1987; Vol. 489, c. 1544.]

I said that I welcome the Bill for what it does not do as well as for what it does, and what I have just said is a good reason for not extending the Bill to criminal cases, because a jury might have a lot more difficulty over the distinction of the weight to be attributed to evidence rather than to its admissibility—much more difficulty than a judge would have.

I welcome the Bill as a move in the right direction. It is the right direction for evidence in civil cases but above all, it is the right direction for the law as a whole. Our laws should be simple and easy to understand, not only by a lawyer but by the litigant. In that respect the Bill is a model for other legislation.

9.30 pm

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): As my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, the Scottish Law Commission's report was its 100th report. It received 17 representations and made 32 recommendations. I welcome the Bill. It is a worthwhile reform of an important area of the law that can touch the lives of everyone in Scotland.

Clause 8 deals with family representation and relationships. These matters are clearly of substantial importance to those involved. The clause covers divorce, legitimacy and declarator or nullity of marriage. The Bill's removal of the requirement for corroboration and the rule against hearsay will apply to these actions. I am sure that that is right.

The Scottish Law Commission said that at one time the standard of proof in certain divorce actions was proof beyond reasonable doubt. That has now been changed to the normal civil standard of proof on a balance of probability. Actions of this type are therefore on the same basis as other civil proceedings, and there is no reason to distinguish these cases from other civil cases in terms of corroboration and hearsay. However, the Bill quite properly retains the rule that a decree cannot be granted until the grounds of action have been established by evidence.

Hon. Members who have studied the Scottish Law Commission's report will know that this rule stems from the fact that questions about the status of the parties concerned are involved and that this has effect beyond the parties to the litigation. The rule means that, even if a case is undefended, the pursuer has to establish his case to the satisfaction of the court. Because of the importance of these cases and their wide effect, I am sure that hon. Members will agree that the Bill takes the correct line by restating in modern form the rule that is contained in an Act of 1830.

This also has the benefit of putting it beyond doubt that the rule also applies to actions in the sheriff court. This is important since hon. Members will know that the sheriff courts are able to hear divorce actions. This is a good example of justice being made available at least cost to those concerned. People can now have a divorce action heard in a local court rather than having to go to Edinburgh.

There is another important part of this Bill. Those who have taken the trouble to read the Scottish Law Commission's report will be surprised to see in paragraph 3.67 that business books are presumed at common law to be accurate if they have been regularly checked. They will frequently contain a large element of hearsay.

The Bill is a welcome development of the law of evidence. It is clearly important that the law of evidence should keep pace with the needs of the day. This is especially apparent in the way that the Bill deals with computer evidence. We are all aware of the extremely fast pace of computer technology. Therefore, it seems odd that parties who wish to rely on that sort of evidence must at present go through a complex set of rules formulated in 1968. Perhaps that was not quite in the infancy of computer technology, but it was certainly in its early days.

Hon. Members who have looked at the lengthy sections 13 to 15 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1968 will see the Bill as a necessary improvement. This is a welcome measure that removes rigid evidential rules that are considered to be against the interests of justice. If a more satisfactory method of resolving disputes results, that must be of benefit to those who under the present arrangements can see no way of bringing a genuine grievance before the courts.

I can do no better than refer the House to column 1544 of their noble Lordships' deliberations, in which the Lord Advocate concluded:

"I do not see this Bill as being a charter for lazy lawyers, if any such being exists. What this Bill will do is ensure that the courts will have before them as much relevant evidence as possible. As a result neither party to an action will suffer injustice simply because potentially valuable evidence is excluded thus rendering an otherwise good case either incapable of prosecution or doomed to failure."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 12 November 1987; Vol. 489, c. 1544.]

For those reasons, I have no hesitation in recommending the Bill to the House. It is a satisfactory development of the law of evidence to met the needs of a modern society, and I welcome it.

9.35 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I have no doubt that the good people of the Isle of Wight can rest easy in their beds tonight, in the knowledge that their Member of Parliament has given such detailed consideration to a specifically Scottish piece of legislation. I am sure that it will come as quite a surprise to a number of people in the towns of Cowes, Ryde and Shanklin to know that this is a matter of such deep interest to him.

Mr. Barry Field: Surely the hon. Gentleman has it in his heart to acknowledge the charity, excellence and diversity of the interests of hon. Members who represent island constituencies, whether it be in the north of Scotland or the south of England.

Mr. Home Robertson: The great difference is that we do not find many Conservatives representing islands or anywhere else in Scotland. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman was put up by the Government Whips to make his contribution. It may come as an alarming surprise to him to learn that, having taken part in a debate on the Floor of the House, he is likely to be appointed to the Standing Committee.

I join other hon. Members—including the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field)—in supporting the objectives of the Bill. In the Minister's opening remarks I was distressed to hear him make the vulgar suggestion that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) might build a yellow brick wall in what we all know is a red sandstone area, but I was particularly relieved to hear him say that the Government are always ready to learn from experience.

Having followed the proceedings of the Conservative party conference in Perth last weekend, I must say that I saw precious little evidence that the Government were learning anything from experience, but of course we welcome any signs of interest in evidence nowadays on the part of Scottish Ministers. I am afraid that what we heard from the Conservative party conference seemed to be a minority party denying any evidence that had come to it through the electoral process, or indeed from anything else in Scotland.

I was particularly intrigued to read clause 3 of the Bill, which states:

"a statement . . . shall be admissible as evidence in so far as it tends to reflect favourably or unfavourably on that person's credibility."

In Scotland, we pay particular attention to the credibility of one particular citizen of Edinburgh, namely the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind). If we compare the statements that he made in 1978 with those that he makes in 1988 on questions such as the devolution of power and the decentralisation of government in the United Kingdom and in Scotland, we can only conclude that he is not a reliable or credible witness in any circumstances.

I am grateful to all the lawyers on both sides of the House who have taken part in the debate for the clarity of their contributions. I hope that they are not charging their efforts to the legal aid fund or to anyone else. It seems, however, that there is clear general support for the changes proposed in the Bill on the part of both the advocates and the solicitors represented in the House. Indeed, the only comment by the Law Society of Scotland that has been drawn to my attention has been a caution against any extension of the principles of the Bill into criminal proceedings in Scotland. That point has been made by a number of hon. Members, particularly the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). It would be a very alarming development if the Bill were seen in any way as a precedent to be pursued into criminal law.

My qualification to take part in the debate is limited, to say the least, except that the farming industry has at least its fair share of hearsay, which one gets from time to time following harvest, and there is a great deal of uncorroborated evidence when accounts come to be submitted to the Inland Revenue.

The nearest that I ever got to civil proceedings was after an interesting event that you may have noticed, Mr. Speaker, which was reported in certain newspapers on 9 March this year. Some newspapers, including one that only passes for a newspaper in Scotland, printed clearly maliciously defamatory statements about myself, concerning my conduct in the House. It was entirely on the uncorroborated hearsay evidence provided by no less a person than the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker). Evidently hearsay is admissible in some areas. I suspect that there might be more interest in civil proceedings in Scotland when we deal with all the litigation that is likely to flow from the poll tax legislation, which will be coming shortly.

Comments have been made about the apparent breach in the Bill of two long-standing principles of Scots law, which bar hearsay and uncorroborated evidence. We all recognise the frustration that the parties in civil cases are likely to feel, when they may be thwarted on pure technicalities in a court of law. I am sure that we are all familiar with the—I hope—apocryphal story about an exasperated sheriff who was supposed to reject a defence of alibi with the memorable comment, "If ye hadna' been there ye widna' be here." That point has been made from time to time.

However, I accept that it should be possible for a court to reach a conclusion on the basis of an overwhelming case that includes elements of hearsay or uncorroborated evidence. I trust—I hope that the Minister will confirm that it is the Government's intention at any rate—that that should be the exception rather than the rule. I presume that a court may be obliged only to admit hearsay or uncorroborated evidence, but not necessarily to accept such evidence. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will want to keep an eye on that. We want the Minister to make it clear that it is not the Government's intention to apply similar principles to criminal law.

My hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden and the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) referred to the operation of the legal aid scheme at present and the fact that retrospective claims are being disallowed when it should be possible to allow them. There is no question but that the new rules are delaying justice and in some cases interfering with the course of justice. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity to say that there is a prospect of a review of that part of the legal aid regulations.

Judging by the debate, we shall have an interesting Committee stage. We look forward to hearing from the hon. Members for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) and for Isle of Wight. We have heard from the hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford before and we know that he takes a deep interest in Scottish affairs. Whether he takes as much interest in the affairs of Wanstead and Woodford is not so clear. The one absentee from the debate has been, sadly, the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). If only it were in order or possible for the Committee proceedings to be adjourned from this building to Fordell castle, we might have even more enlightened debates in those surroundings.

[Mr. Home Robertson]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: By leave of the House, I am glad to respond to the debate. It was extremely good and there was a high standard of speeches. It was nice to hear the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) confirm the merits of the path that we are treading because he piloted through the Bill with a similar provision 20 years ago. He mentioned the human cases involving his constituents. The evidence that he gave the House was very much that that provision has been in the interests of justice. I believe that to be the case.

I should like to answer as many questions as I can, but first I shall deal quickly with legal aid. We had a debate on a statutory instrument in Committee and further improvements are being prepared. A further statutory instrument will be introduced and it will be thoroughly debated in due course. We have kept in touch with the Law Society on that.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), who spoke well, asked about dental tribunals. He was correct that certain tribunals are allowed to regulate their procedures. That would include the retention of corroboration or hearsay as appropriate. Whether they retain their strict rules would be a matter for those responsible for those proceedings.

I shall go through the hon. and learned Gentleman's questions with great care before the Committee, but perhaps I should deal now with one that relates to the retention of documents relating to a will. The Scottish Law Commission is considering that matter. Whether sole evidence on the retention of documents is sufficient is a matter for the court to decide on the basis of whether it is satisfied by the evidence. The cases mentioned in relation to section 9 were from its early days and since then its application has relaxed. The cases of Weir v. UCS Ltd. and Thomson v. Tough Ropes Ltd. are interesting in that area.

I was asked about precognitions which would attack credibility. The reason why a precognition is excluded is because it is a summary of evidence likely to be available from a witness. It is different in nature from a statement uttered by a witness. On family relationships and actions and whether evidence is needed from someone other than a party to the marriage, the present system exists to guard against the risk of collusion between the two parties. The evidence can be wholly or partially from a third party. [Interruption.] The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East has missed some of the compliments that I paid him. I vividly remember the case when I was his junior counsel and, despite our immense dedication and thoroughness, our united efforts were to no avail.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) also asked about section 9. There has been a change in judicial attitudes which is wholly to the good. Page 3 of the Law Commission report gives a lengthy explanation by Lord Stott of his attitude in declaring against Maclaren v. Caldwells Paper Mill Company. He explains that there should be a general remedy, and states that there is an injustice arising from a rule whereby a court convinced that an injured man has given a truthful account of his accident, is nevertheless bound to reject it from the lack of corroboration.

The hon. Members for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) and for Garscadden asked about civil juries. Civil jury trials were abolished in sheriff courts in 1980. The Government want to have the view of interested parties, and the Lord Advocate will carry out a consultation. I cannot be more specific about the time scale. It has been said that there was only a small number of responses to the Scottish Law Commission. That may be so, but one must also take into account that others who were consulted were content with the broad proposals. Corroboration as a safeguard will remain and it is for the courts to rely on the best evidence.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) raised several relevant points. The Bill applies equally to pursuer and defendant. It is up to the pursuer to prove his case, as it is at present.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro)——

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Everyone in the Chamber is anxious to hear the Minister's response to the many relevant points made by the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith).

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and I shall endeavour to answer all the important questions that my right hon. Friend asked. One related to the rectification of the Faculty of Advocates and the Scottish Law Commission. My right hon. Friend will be pleased to read in the report that there is no need for rectification. The faculty was in favour of the commission's broad proposals, with the exception of the hearsay notice procedure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, in a very good speech, commended the Bill. The best evidence available should always be given due weight by the court. My hon. Friend asked about witness to documents. Clause 5 would enable a business document to be relied upon without further authentication, but if the document was challenged the court could direct that its origin and authenticity be established by evidence. Therefore, someone might have to provide that he had signed a document.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) asked whether the provision in respect of civil juries was the thin end of the wedge in relation to criminal proceedings. I repeat that the Scottish Law Commission will be considering the matter, but on a completely separate basis.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South made an interesting comment on child abuse cases. I believe that the Bill meets his point.

The hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) welcomed the Bill, and I noted especially what he said about legal aid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) mentioned the need for simplicity and said that the maximum amount of evidence should be admissible. He asked about the different procedures on evidence in England and Scotland. That is a matter for the Lord Chancellor. Reform of the procedures has been mentioned in the current civil justice review which has been published. I am sure that the Lord Chancellor will be interested in what my hon. Friend said.

I agreed entirely with the theme taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field): what really matter are the interests of justice.

Many points have been made in this extremely useful debate. They will be studied closely before the Committee stage of the Bill. The Bill must achieve an evidential regime which, as far as possible, does not contain technical barriers to the placing before the courts of evidence that will serve the best interests of justice. The Bill meets the principles of simplicity and general admissibility. It has been welcomed because it tries to remove artificial barriers to an otherwise honest and credible case that should at least have the wisdom of the judiciary applied to it.

Several hon. Members asked about our experience. In tribunals, actions for damages for personal injuries and undefended divorce actions, the relaxation of evidential rules has benefited all concerned.

The hon. Member for Garscadden extolled the merits of the abolition of corroboration. In the past, the main difference of opinion arose because of the attitudes that the respective parties adopted 20 years ago. I am glad that we have come some way since then and that the Scottish Law Commission's qualities in assessing the evidence have been well recognised.

Sheriff Macphail and his research party said of the absence of rules against hearsay in tribunals:

> "The divergence in this respect between the courts on the one hand and arbitration, tribunals and inquiries on the other has come to appear more and more noticeable and difficult to justify."

We can take comfort from past examples in that regard.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside asked about the Law Society of Scotland and the Faculty of Advocates. Those bodies submitted substantial comments. The Law Society of Scotland raised a number of issues with my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate following the introduction of the Bill in another place. I am pleased to say that the Law Society of Scotland has written a letter that states:

> "The Committee asked me to thank you for explaining the position and to let you know that as far as the Committee was concerned the matter would not be taken any further."

That shows that it was satisfied with this measure.

I was asked about the effect of the Bill on legal aid. I said earlier that the existing strict rules of corroboration and hearsay can have unacceptable consequences for the preparation of cases and time being taken up in court. The hon. Member for Angus, East mentioned the inconvenience and expense of the rules. Parties will not have to corroborate every point of their case. Nor will they have to bring witnesses—sometimes at disproportionate cost—to speak to facts that are not in dispute.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside asked whether there would be a flood of cases, thus creating difficulties for legal aid. I am able to dispel that fear, as the Scottish Legal Aid Board has been consulted and does not think that the Bill will create any difficulties. My right hon. Friend will not expect me to say whether a particular case will qualify for legal aid, because that will be a matter for the Scottish Legal Aid Board.

We want to ensure that in all cases the best evidence available is brought forward. In most cases, corroboration will be relied on so that the courts have the best evidence. So far as possible, the courts will seek to call the witnesses who have made statements. That does not seem to represent a major change to what happens at present. It is unlikely to create difficulties with legal aid.

As to the proposed notice procedure regarding hearsay evidence, the Association of Sheriffs Principal suggested that the procedure was unduly complicated. The Scottish Law Commission's main recommendation removed hearsay restrictions and allied the notice procedure to the powers of the court to exclude hearsay evidence. That had the effect of bringing back the rule against hearsay evidence.

The Scottish Law Commission accepted that the content of a Bill is a matter for the Government. There have been thorough discussions with the Scottish Law Commission, and it appreciated the reason for the departure, in some respects, from its original proposals. I am glad to be able to reassure my right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside that for documents to be admitted as proof of statements contained in them, copy documents will have to be submitted in place of them.

My right hon. Friend asked about multiple hearsay. The witness giving hearsay evidence in court may recount a statement that is itself hearsay, but what will always weigh most heavily with the court is the best evidence. I fully appreciate the concern expressed by hon. Members of the extension of the Bill into criminal legal aid matters.

I believe that the Bill will enhance the ability of the Scottish legal system to provide an efficient and speedy service meeting the ends of justice.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Housing Benefit (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Budgen.]

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) is not present, I call the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) to move the second Adjournment.

10 pm

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): This will be yet another lesson for the Scottish Tories—that deviousness gets them nowhere. Despite their filibuster, in which the Minister spoke for 47 minutes to kick off and poor benighted souls from the Isle of Wight and from Wanstead and Woodford were trotted in to prolong the debate, at the end of the day they will have to face the music, because someone has failed to turn up from Northern Ireland, despite their best efforts.

It is timely and valuable that the House should have a further opportunity to debate housing benefit, especially in the Scottish context, and for the Government to have to answer for the burden that they have imposed on local authorities doing their best to maintain decent housing conditions, despite cuts on every front in the past 10 years. Local authorities now have to cope with the fantastic bureaucratic mess of the Government's new housing benefit system. As Members of all parties know, at our surgeries every week and in our postbags every day there come tales of the human misery inflicted on decent people trying to make ends meet as a result of the changes in housing benefit. To call them changes is a euphemism. We are talking about savage cuts. The people at the sharp end, who have had to send out the calculations, have been the local authorities. As usual, the Government have treated them with the utmost contempt.

It is worse than that. After a few weeks of panic in the Tory ranks, the Government come along again claiming to recognise the political disaster that they have visited upon themselves and announcing cosmetic changes. We are told that great magnanimity is to be shown in the clawback, as it were, of the cuts in housing benefit. And who has to recalculate the benefit and deal with the confused folk trying to find out what is happening? Yet again, the local authorities are at the sharp end. And who is to pay for the recalculation, for the manpower and computer effort, not to mention the cost of all this in human misery? I hope that the Minister will tell us today that the Government intend to foot every penny of the bill which has resulted from the confusion that the Government have visited on local authorities.

In towns such as Kilbirnie, Saltcoats and Ardrossan in my constituency, where unemployment is running at rates up to 30 per cent., I know the suffering and heartbreak that has been caused when folk have been told that they face rent and rate increases of £10 or even £20 per week. What kind of Government impose that kind of shock on people already struggling to make ends meet? Many are elderly or disabled, but that is the way in which they have been treated by the Government. I shall not go into specific examples as every Member knows the truth of what I am saying and I wish to allow time for my hon. Friends to participate in the debate.

We then come to the deception that the Government visited on the House when the Secretary of State for Social Services came back to announce the package dreamed up in an attempt to head off the worst of the political consequences for the Conservative party. They came back to talk about the £6,000 savings rule, principally because it affected the client group in which they were most interested for electoral purposes. Many elderly people in my constituency would have been affected by that rule, but relatively few will have been assisted by the changes that the Government announced. Those affected by the £6,000 rule, however, will not be the ones to suffer most. The real suffering will be experienced by those who would regard it as a joke in poor taste to suggest that they had £600 or £60 of savings, never mind £6,000. There was nothing in the Government's package to protect them.

A clear attempt was made to imply that no one would be paying more than £2·50 a week more in rent and rates than before April. That is simply an untruth. To the £2·50 in housing benefit cut have to be added the rent increases that the Government have forced upon local authorities. To the £2·50 and the rent increases has to be added the 20 per cent. rates rule introduced by the Government by sleight of hand. There are other elements, too. Many people will still be paying £7, £8 or £9 per week more in rent and rates than they were before 1 April. These are the very poorest people in our communities and that is the scandal of the Government's actions.

I want to make it clear that it is not the local authorities that are imposing the increases. The local authorities will seek to protect people from the worst impact of the Government's actions. Ministers plead concern and say that something has been done to help people out. Yet at the same time they cannot deny that many of those in my constituency and throughout the country—those with the least means in our society—will be hit by rent and rate increases accounting for upwards of 10 per cent. of their total income.

The Prime Minister made a grotesque public relations trip to Glasgow on Saturday to try to capture a minute amount of good publicity. She intruded shamelessly upon a great Scottish occasion. She was treated with contempt, and the ultimate contempt was simply to ignore her unwanted presence. If the Prime Minister is to make excursions to Glasgow to exude human concern, let her start by addressing the 140,000 people in that city—the poorest people in that city—affected by the cuts in housing benefit. Let her announce that the poll tax is to be done away with instead of persecuting those same people. Let us not have the window dressing of human concern, but the substance of human concern. That does not involve going to football matches; it involves showing compassion and decency towards those who stood on the Hampden terraces on Saturday.

10.3 pm

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I am grateful for the opportunity of participating in the debate, and to all those who contributed towards our obtaining it.

I have been a Member of Parliament for more than 20 years. Without question the past five weeks has been the worst period that I have known in terms of human fear, suffering and tears. The letters have been heart-rending. The way in which the Government have acted in introducing the changes is deplorable. The ineffectiveness of the Government's attempt to remedy matters has been even more deplorable. The reason for that was underlined by the astonishing answer that the Prime Minister gave when she was challenged on the effect of the housing benefit decisions. She said that this was a matter for local authorities. That is quite extraordinary. The measure was introduced by the Government. The speed with which they acted suggests that they may have been stupid, and if they did not know the consequences of their actions a year ago, they are worse than stupid—they are wicked.

I wish to draw three cases to the attention of the Under-Secretary. The first concerns a widow of 57. She has no £3,000 and no £6,000. She receives £41·50 a week. Her rent and rates have increased by a further £10 a week. That is an increase demanding 25 per cent. of her income.

There is another woman, who is doing exactly what the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) says should be done. That single woman goes out to work in difficult circumstances, She has a job, through the Manpower Services Commission scheme, doing 30 hours a week for less than £60. She has to take two buses to get to her work. She, too, has lost almost £10. After paying for her bus fares and rates and having her telephone taken out—her only link with her family—she is left with £17 a week for heating, lighting and food. She asks: "How can I do this?" I have sent her letter to the Prime Minister, because I cannot answer it.

These measures have been brought in within weeks of a Budget that gave nearly £2 billion away to the richest 5 per cent. of the community. This caused anger. The Opposition were accused of chanting, "Shame." I confess that I chanted, "Shame," and I meant it. I did it not as part of an organised team but because I knew the Budget's effect. I knew what could have been done with £2 billion. Five weeks later, the so-called poor man's Budget has been slashed, in one case to 25 per cent. That is appalling. We are told that the problems will be solved because the Government have responded to the pleas, but their response is inadequate. It does not deal with 90 per cent. of the cases.

The Government have been obsessed with people's capital. The adjustment from £6,000 to £8,000 is small enough but there are worse cases—people on low wages and people on small pensions. There is the woman of 67 with arthritis and her husband of 72 with angina, whose weekly income of just over £60 has been cut by about £10. They are the worst cases, and the £2·50 provision will not solve their problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) said that it does not deal with the problem. At best, these people will have to pay £2·50, plus rent increases, plus 20 per cent. of their rates. I hope that the Minister will come up with some rapid answers because there is deep human misery in every poor area of Britain.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) for giving me a few minutes to intervene in his Adjournment debate. I do not want to go over the ground that has been eloquently sketched by my hon. Friends the Members for Cunninghame, North and for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan). I endorse their feelings.

This has been a bad time for many people of modest means living in difficult circumstances. In a strange way, it has been a bad time for elected representatives. Like my colleagues, I cannot remember ever being so stuck for consolation or advice as in the past week or two. It is now commonplace to be approached by people who have been given the prospect of having to pay an increase in their housing costs in one month that exceeds their weekly income. With simple, stark finality we are told, "We cannot find the money, we cannot pay it. With the best will in the world, it cannot be done." We know that that is true and we cannot wish that fact away.

In fairness, it should be said that there have been some signs of repentance. The Secretary of State for Social Services said that the loss would be restricted to £2·50. The comment has been well made that that is only a partial account of what is happening and that the reservations, caveats and small print mean that almost everyone will still be a substantial loser. I still have in my constituency people who are not of pensionable age, who do not have children living with them in the family and who are not in receipt of any of the special disability benefits that bring them within the cover of the so-called protection. They are the low paid. Because they are low paid and not covered, they are still left in the original, frightening quandary that my hon. Friends have described in the past few minutes.

I want the Minister to give us some reassurance and some evidence that the Scottish Office, which, after all, is responsible for housing and for the operation of housing departments, has thought the matter through and that in the rather inadequate arrangements that have already been announced, a workable system is beginning to take shape. I am sure that the Minister has been giving a great deal of thought to the matter. I should like him to share with us his ideas of how the new system will work.

As I understand it, a DHSS unit is to be set up in Glasgow to deal with the United Kingdom. The onus will be on an individual applicant to look to that unit for the protection that may be available, that may lead to a lessening of the financial blow that he or she faces. I want the Minister to explain exactly how that system will work and how it relates to housing departments in Scotland. For example, will they have to continue for several months to take the new housing costs, rent and rate calculations, according to the new scales? There has been talk about the unit coming into operation only in July. The unit will then be inundated with work. Will people have to pay the new higher scales for a considerable period, without the benefit of any of the protection that has been announced? What are the duties of local authorities? How do they mesh into the system? Can they supply to the DHSS lists of those who are to get some help? Can we speed up the process?

It is important to make the point about the cruelty—I use that word with considerable seriousness—that has been built into the operation and the way in which it has been mishandled. Given that disaster, I should like the Minister to explain exactly what will happen. If he does that and if, on Saturday—as inevitably will occur—someone comes to me, facing an increase in their housing costs of about £60, £70, £80 or—as happened last Saturday—£90 a month, although they live on benefit, instead of saying something vague and indefinite, such as "There will be some measure of help. I do not know when or how it will operate, because it is not clear," I shall be able to say, "I have talked and listened to the Scottish Office Minister. He has been able to explain to me exactly what will happen, how you apply, what the local housing department has to supply the DHSS with in the way of records and information, when you can expect to get help and how it will be calculated."

[Mr. Donald Dewar]

The Minister has 13 minutes. He can give us a great deal of information, which must be available. It would be a genuine service to me as a constituency hon. Member if he could do something to put into order the chaos, dismay and the damage that his colleagues' policies have brought to my constituency.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I am glad to respond to the debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) on his ingenuity in getting the debate.

These are serious and important measures. The subject of the debate is the impact of housing benefit changes on housing departments of Scottish local authorities. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate where my responsibilities and those of the DHSS begin and end. I assure him that, in so far as he has raised matters that relate more to the DHSS than to the Scottish Office, such matters will be drawn to its attention. Full information will be provided to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) on the points that he mentioned. I shall deal as fully as I can with what I see the position to be.

Not a few hon. Members will be impressed by the procedural canniness with which the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North obtained the debate at such short notice. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is responsible for housing benefit, but it might assist the hon. Gentleman if I comment briefly on the features of the reformed housing benefit system that was introduced. I shall then examine the effect that the system may have on housing departments in Scottish local authorities.

I emphasise that the first purpose is to make the new scheme simpler, because it will be aligned with the rules for income support and family credit. That means that people will not be so confused about what they are entitled to. The second purpose is to make the system fairer. People will be treated alike, whether or not they are in work, and the worst features of the poverty trap under the old scheme will be eliminated. It is worth noting that the Secretary of State for Social Services gave the undertaking that his Department would monitor the general effects of the reforms to housing benefits and the effects of the wider package of reforms that he introduced.

One feature of the new scheme that will be of interest to pensioners is the pension premium, which will benefit pensioners—the rates will be higher for those over the age of 80. It is true that pensioners will be the biggest group to be affected by the benefit changes and that is inevitable. It is widely appreciated that, at present, pensioners are by far the largest group of housing benefit recipients. They account for about 60 per cent. of recipients.

Much has been said about the new capital rules and I do not intend to rehearse the arguments about them tonight. It should not be forgotten that under the former system any income generated by savings was taken into account. At present, capital of less than £3,000 and any income generated from it will be disregarded in the benefit calculation. That will be of benefit to pensioners, especially those with small amounts of savings.

The disabled are another group who have done relatively well in the changeover from the old to the new system. The premiums for the sick and the disabled, for example, are much higher than the former enhancements for the disabled. One important point that I wish to emphasis is that the new housing benefit arrangements will insulate tenants from rent increases if they are receiving housing benefit. That means that even those tenants who have a small portion of their rent paid by housing benefit will receive a pound for pound increase in their benefit to match any subsequent increases in their rent.

I have outlined some particular features of the new scheme that I feel are particularly worthy of the House's attention. I believe that the former system placed an unacceptable burden upon the taxpayer.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I will not give way, as I have a lot to say in response. The fact that the former system covered approximately one household in three was not justified by any evidence of need. The changes are designed to protect the poorest and to direct resources more effectively to where they are needed most.

Mr. Home Robertson rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No, I will not give way.

I believe that the changes to housing benefit cannot be seen in isolation from other aspects of Government policy. The need to control inflation and public expenditure is without doubt just as important now as when we first came to office. There is no denying the fact that everyone benefits from lower inflation, especially pensioners and others on fixed income.

Any fundamental change in any scheme of support will obviously produce gainers and losers. There is no way of avoiding that. The Government believe that approximately one half of pensioners on income-related benefits will gain under the new scheme and that, consequently, approximately one half will lose. Generally those who lose will be relatively better off.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No, I must press on.

I believe that to direct help first and foremost to the poorest and most vulnerable of our society is a sound and entirely defensible principle of social policy.

Mr. Wilson: Can the Minister tell us where the poorest begin and the less poor end? The people who come to my surgeries and who write to me are, by any humane definition of the poorest, within that category. In the Minister's world, does somebody need to be living in a cardboard box before he is regarded as one of the poorest?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Secretary of State for Social Services listened carefully to the representations that were made by hon. Members; that was why he came forward with changes that took into account the varying circumstances.

I have described the basis of the thinking that lay behind the reforms to housing benefit. I shall now consider the effect that those reforms may have on the housing departments of Scottish local authorities. As I have already said, I believe that the new scheme is simpler. Consequently, the task of administering it by local authorities will be that much easier. There will be fewer exceptions, rules will be aligned across a wide range of benefits, there will be one taper instead of six so there should be fewer mistakes in assessing individual benefit levels than in the past. It is true that the Government are changing the subsidy arrangements by which we pay back local authorities for their benefit and administration costs. We are doing this to encourage efficient administration.

Mr. Dewar: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No, I shall not.

Councils will still receive a fair level of support for costs reasonably incurred, but we are giving them firm incentives to control costs and improve efficiency.

Mr. Dewar: Before the Minister concludes, will he tell us what advice he would give to someone who is faced with a substantial increase in their housing costs? How will he explain what will happen in the next month or two? How will the Minister tell them to get the protection that he has been talking about, and relate that to the restriction of £2·50? How is it going to work, and what kind of information will they have to supply, to whom and when?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Member for Garscadden asked a lot questions all rolled into one. He is asking what one would say to one's constituents. I will tell him exactly. The first point is to ascertain whether the constituent is claiming all the allowances to which he or she is entitled. Frankly, in some cases they are not doing that. It is important to go thoroughly into the facts. The specific DHSS levels are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Social Services.

In conclusion, I affirm that the Government have struck a careful balance in their reform of housing benefit between the need to reflect the ever-increasing cost and scope of the scheme, the need to simplify and the need to protect the poorest. I believe also that the considerable simplifications introduced by the new scheme will benefit local authorities, contrary to the assertions that have been made.

Mr. Home Robertson: It would be helpful if the Minister could reply to some of the points put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). However, perhaps the most interesting question that our constituents would like the Minister to answer is how he could manage to live, after paying for his housing costs, on as little as £14 a week. Would he be prepared to do that? If not, why should his or my constituents be expected to do that?

Mr. Wilson: This is an astonishing occasion. Hundreds of thousands of people in Scotland are living in the direst poverty and fear because of this issue. Conservative Members failed to head off a half-hour debate on this subject. The Minister is left with 13 minutes to explain the details of how this wickedness is to operate. He cannot even do that. He sits down in deadly silence. It is the biggest indictment of ignorance, alongside incompetence, that we have seen in the House this Session.

Mr. Henry McLeish (Fife, Central): I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made the point that this is an extraordinary response to what is a crisis in Scotland for our tenants. I am sure that the Minister will face numerous problems in relation to housing benefit, especially as it will have an impact on the housing departments throughout Scotland. One of the crucial issues that we face is that, because of changes in social security and reductions in housing benefit, many of my constituents will be unable to pay their rent.

What guidance will the Minister give to local authorities which may have hundreds of tenants unable to pay their rent? Will the Minister consider a non-eviction policy emanating from St. Andrew's house? Clearly, many people are on the breadline.They will not be able to pay rent or rates to the local authority. I am sure that the Minister is aware that I have had pensioners and people on low incomes, in tears at my surgeries. It is a horrific experience to see people, who have paid their taxes, rents and rates all their lives now in the invidious position of being worse than beggars with a bowl. They come to surgeries and they say, "What can we do? What can you do to help?"

Mr. Dewar: The Government are ignorant.

Mr. McLeish: We are left in the amazing position where we can only say that we will write to the Prime Minister and bring it to her attention. There are few constituents who can appreciate that a Government can be so mean, so vicious, so malicious and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said from a sedentary position, so ignorant of the plight of hundreds of thousands of Scottish people. These people are on the breadline and they feel that this kick in the teeth over housing benefit is something that they cannot cope with.

Why has the Minister not answered some of these questions? Housing departments are looking for guidance and leadership. After what this Government have done to my constituents and many of my hon. Friends' constituents, we deserve answers. Sadly, they have not been forthcoming.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Decisions on the rents to be levied are wholly for the local authorities to take into account.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Motion having been made at Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. SPEAKER adjourned the House, without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

SOUTHERN WATER AUTHORITY [Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Southern Water Authority Bill, it is expedient to authorise any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money provided by Parliament under section 90 of the Land Drainage Act 1976.—[Mr. Durant.]

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Primary Teachers

1. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from local education authorities concerning difficulties in recruiting primary school teachers.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): None recently. There are sufficient primary teachers nationally. However, the high cost of housing in particular has led to recruitment difficulties in some parts of London and the south-east.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. I am sure that most LEAs welcome the Government's initiative in teacher recruitment. However, in Erith and Crayford there is a considerable shortage of primary teachers and housing is, of course, a major consideration. Will my hon. Friend consider further initiatives to encourage married women to come back into primary school teaching, perhaps on a part-time basis?

Mrs. Rumbold: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. I recognise that there are some difficulties in his constituency. I understand that all but three of the teaching vacancies in the borough of Bexley have been filled this term and, indeed, all but one in the school in which I believe he is particularly interested, Southlake primary school.

We are doing everything in our power to recruit teachers and to encourage part-time teachers; and the borough of Bexley is taking an initiative in encouraging married women to come back into the teaching profession part-time.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is it not a fact that the Government have no published targets for overall teacher numbers? The Secretary of State's recent report of 31 March, which criticised the lack of objective data available, makes it impossible to state whether recruitment, retention, motivation and quality are satisfactory. How can the Minister expect us to take anything that she says on this matter as being definitive?

Mrs. Rumbold: The hon. Lady will no doubt therefore be glad to hear that the demand for teachers rises as primary school pupil numbers rise and, to cope with the future demand, target entry into initial teacher training for primary pupils has increased from almost 7,000 in 1983 to 11,000 in 1989. To date, we have more than 17,600 applications for almost 10,000 places. That is 77 per cent. over target, and I am sure that the hon. Lady will welcome that.

Mr. Pawsey: To bring those figures into perspective, will my hon. Friend give the House details about the number of teachers employed in the profession and about the recruitment of teachers? Is she satisfied with both the quantity and quality of recruits coming forward for the profession?

Mrs. Rumbold: Yes, Sir. We have almost 500,000 teachers in primary and secondary schools at present. We are very happy about our programmes for recruitment of teachers through our task force, particularly in London through the Islington recruitment fair, which has been extremely successful in attracting 3,400 people who showed an interest in primary school teaching.

Free Milk

2. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement concerning the removal of the discretionary power of local authorities to provide free milk for children in special schools.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): Children whose families are in receipt of income support continue to receive free milk. Nothing in the Social Security Act 1986 prevents a local education authority from providing subsidised milk at lunch time to other children attending special schools, provided that milk offered to children attending mainstream schools receives the same level of subsidy.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that, as a result of the Government's recent mean and miserly measures, free school meals have been removed from a majority of children in special schools, and, with them, the right to free school milk? Is not taking the milk from the mouths of children with special needs a thoroughly nasty and disgraceful act which has caused enormous harm and ill-will among thousands of children and to those who teach them, not least in Greenacres school for special needs children in my constituency?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. and learned Gentleman uses intemperate language. I must remind him and the House that the latest survey showed that before the implementation of the Social Security Act 1986, 39 of the 97 authorities in England did not exercise their discretion to provide free milk to children attending special schools. Of those authorities, 13 were Conservative-controlled, one was Liberal—heaven forbid—16 were hung councils and nine were controlled by the Labour party.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Will my hon. Friend confirm that not only do 100,000 more children in special and ordinary schools receive an allowance through their parents for free school meals than formerly, but that the allowance covers free school meals throughout the year, not simply during term time, as under the previous Labour Government?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend the is absolutely right in his interpretation. I remind the House that it was always our intention that financial benefits should be concentrated on those in financial need. That is right and proper.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Minister aware that he can play around with statistics, but he will never convince the people who live in Kent who are very angry about the fact that in excess of 4,000 children will lose free school meals? Does his conscience not prick him——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a question about meals later. This is about milk.

Mr. Dunn: I should like to know by what authority the hon. Gentleman seeks to speak for the county of Kent.

Mr. Tony Banks: He speaks for England.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not responsible for what the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) says.

Mr. Dunn: If the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) speaks for England, heaven help the country.

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

3. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the report of the interim advisory committee on teachers' pay and conditions; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I have received written and oral representations from the teacher unions and the local authority associations.

Mr. Buckley: Does the Secretary of State accept that morale in the teaching profession is pretty low because of pay? Does he also accept that the interim advisory committee report recommends that teachers should have an equal salary increase across the board and also considers the £300 million allocated to be a restraint on the wage increase for the teaching profession, which is well below the average increase in earnings of 8 per cent. recently awarded to other workers, such as nurses and doctors, and others in industry? Will the Secretary of State comment on that?

Mr. Baker: Teachers will receive 4·25 per cent. from 1 April on top of the 8·2 per cent. last October. Teachers on the main scale will, on average, receive a further 4 per cent. in September as a result of increments. Increases for individual teachers during this year will range from 4·25 to 14·5 per cent., when allowance is made for the increased value and number of allowances.

Mr. Madel: As the administration and teaching of GCSE has a lot to do with teachers' conditions of service, will the advisory committee on pay and conditions publish some of its conclusions and opinions on how this first year of GCSE has worked out?

Mr. Baker: That goes rather beyond the remit of the interim advisory committee, but I pay tribute to the work of teachers across the country to make the introduction of GCSE so successful, which I am sure it is and will be.

Ms. Armstrong: Does the Secretary of State recognise that many teachers are looking to the Government for some response to the work that they have been putting in to improve GCSE and to cope with the many changes that he is suggesting? Is it not disgraceful that the Government are suggesting offering them just over 4 per cent., when other average earnings are increasing by more than 8 per cent., and when the Government gave in to pressure from the nurses to improve their pay and conditions? Why will the Secretary of State not respond to the teachers?

Mr. Baker: There was a major restructuring for the teachers last year, just as there is a major restructuring for the nurses this year. I do not know whether the hon. Lady heard my reply earlier, but I said that teachers would receive 4·25 per cent. in April and the great majority of teachers on the main scale will receive another 4 per cent. in September. If they qualify for incentive allowances, some teachers will get infinitely more than that.

Mr. Paice: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the extra increase in incentive payments in the latest award —well above the basic 4·5 per cent.—means that there is ample opportunity for the better teachers to improve themselves and be better rewarded?

Mr. Baker: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is one of the features of the IAC report and the structure of teachers' salaries introduced last year. There are now five different grades of allowances which permit good teachers, teachers with more responsibility and teachers in shortage subjects to be rewarded. That structure was given tremendous impetus by the IAC report.

Mr. Fatchett: As the Press Association tapes report that the Secretary of State is having to cancel meetings because of the
we are delighted to see him here this afternoon. Will he note that the interim report paints a worrying picture of low morale among teachers, of key shortages of teachers of important subjects, and states that there is real doubt about the ability of teachers to deliver the national curriculum? What action will he take on the interim advisory committee's suggestion that none of those problems can be satisfactorily resolved if the £300 million ceiling is maintained?

Mr. Baker: To answer the hon. Gentleman's last point, although there was a cost envelope of £300 million, the cost of the report's full recommendations came to £332 million, and I have accepted the extra allowances. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has already emphasised the impetus that we are putting into increased teacher training. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we shall need more teachers, particularly in certain shortage subjects, to implement the national curriculum. We have several schemes in hand, and there was a good increase in recruitment last year. I hope that there will be an increase this year as well.

4. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next proposes to discuss the restoration of negotiating rights with the teachers' unions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I expect to discuss the Green Paper on future pay determination machinery with representatives of teacher unions over the next few months.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that the Minister has now got himself into such a mess about the Education Reform Bill and the education system that he does not know where he is and is having to cancel all his speeches in order to be here? Does he realise that free negotiation is fundamental to the democratic rights of any group of working people, not only teachers? For the right hon. Gentleman to take that right away from teachers and then start boasting of how much he is giving them is no way of doing what the International Labour Organisation has asked him to do, which is to restore teachers' negotiating rights. It is not enough for the right hon. Gentleman to say that teachers are getting this, that and the other. That is insufficient, and he should restore teachers' negotiating rights in a democratic manner, straight away.

Mr. Baker: The ILO committee on freedom of association will be meeting later this month to report to the committee of experts, but it has no formal standing in itself. If in due course, the ILO makes representations to the Government, we will carefully consider them. However, I have already met the six teaching unions during the course of the past few days. We have discussed only briefly the future machinery for the determination of teachers' pay and conditions, but I will meet all the unions again later this year. The Government have put forward certain proposals in the Green Paper, as the hon. Gentleman knows. There is still a wide difference of opinion between the unions about the machinery that they would like.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend reflect upon the appalling fact that, of the five teacher associations, the NAS/UWT has already decided that it will take industrial action, which is against the interests of the children in the classrooms? Does he agree that it is not just a coincidence that the fastest-growing teachers' association is constitutionally committed against any kind of industrial action?

Mr. Baker: I agree with my hon. Friend that the Professional Association of Teachers is totally committed against taking any kind of industrial action, and its membership is growing. I saw representatives of the NAS/UWT last Friday morning and made it clear to them that I was shocked and appalled that, of all the unions, it advocated a half-day teachers' strike. Such action will be highly damaging to the children affected—and only the children will suffer. It is a completely unnecessary and purely token strike. I hope very much that that union will think again.

Mr. Straw: Is the Secretary of State committed to the restoration of negotiating rights for teaching unions?

Mr. Baker: I clearly stated that we have put forward our proposals for a teachers' negotiating group, and I shall be discussing that with the teaching unions in the coming months. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not taken this opportunity to condemn utterly the proposed half-day strike by the NAS/UWT.

Village Primary Schools

5. Mr. Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to ensure the future of village primary schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: It is the responsibility of local education authorities to provide a proper service to villages and rural areas as well as to other areas that they serve. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is currently supporting a number of projects, including one in Cornwall, designed to identify ways of enriching the curriculum of rural primary schools. Any proposal for the closure of a village school which comes before us is considered very carefully in the light of the criteria set out in the Department's circular 3/87, which makes it clear that size is not a criterion for closure.

Mr. Hicks: Does my hon. Friend agree that, to ensure the future of our village primary schools, it is esential that adequate resources are made available for vital improvements and extensions? Is he aware that in Cornwall alone over 50 major and minor primary school projects are awaiting attention, which is particularly worrying as by 1993 Cornwall will have 40,000 children of primary school age, the highest ever?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend is right, but I must point out that allocations for capital works are made annually. Cornwall's allocation for schools and for further and higher education in 1988-89 was £6·4 million, which represented an increase of 14 per cent. over the figure for 1987-88. Of course, it is the duty of local authorities to look at their demographic situation and to decide whether to build new schools.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: Hon. Members will be aware that I represent and take particular interest in what the Minister has had to say about Cornwall's education system. The Minister will be aware of the particular difficulties that the county faces. I welcome the county's increase in its capital spending programme this year, but, with the new assessment arrangements, particular costs, in terms of teaching time, will hit primary schools. Has the Minister made any assessment of that impact, and has he any plans to help local authorities to overcome it?

Mr. Dunn: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on being appointed to his new post.

I must remind him that in allocating resources for capital expenditure the Department of Education and Science will continue to give priority to projects which provide places in areas of population growth. That answers the hon. Gentleman's point and refers to the earlier point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks).

Mr. Key: Will my hon. Friend give special consideration to education support grants for rural primary schools' curriculum enrichment projects, such as that in Wiltshire, whose term is coming to a natural end?

It would be disastrous if such projects were cut off at this stage. Will he do his best to ensure that those projects continue?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend will be aware that the projects are in their mid-term phase and are being evaluated at local level. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is considering the possibility of a research project to evaluate the projects on a national basis, with the intention of disseminating to local education authorities examples of successful practice. I undertake to bring my hon. Friend's remarks to my right hon. Friend's attention.

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the Minister admit that there are serious anxieties that open admissions could lead to some schools bursting at the seams and accelerated closures of other schools, with a reduction of parental choice, especially in rural areas? How will he protect such schools?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Lady falls into the trap that Opposition spokesmen fall into every time they appear at the Dispatch Box. They seek, as ever, to deny choice to parents whenever and in whatever situation they can possibly contrive to do so. We stand for sensible choice for parents wherever and whenever possible.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: My constituents are more than grateful for the unwavering support that my hon. Friend has always given to village schools and their excellent varied curriculum. They are glad to hear him reiterate that size alone will not be the criterion for closure, but they are worried about what will happen when the new building regulations come into effect in 1991. Will he ensure that there is sufficient money to enable our village schools to continue to serve the rural areas?

Mr. Dunn: We have always made it clear that many other factors bear upon the life and long-term survival of village schools. I have always recognised that many small village schools have to be retained because of the geographical isolation of the communities that they serve, so my hon. Friend's remarks are well received by me.

Mr. Paul Gray (Letters)

6. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any further information about the inquiry into the leak of the letter of 21 January from Paul Gray, in the Prime Minister's Office, to Tom Jeffrey in his private office; and if he will make a statement.

8. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of the leak investigation into the improper disclosure of correspondence between Mr. Paul Gray of 10 Downing street, and Mr. Tom Jeffrey, relating to educational testing.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No, Sir. It is not the usual practice to give information on such matters.

Mrs. Fyfe: I do not know whether to thank the Minister for that abbreviated answer. Which does he think is the worse crime—that a mole should leak a letter, or that a Prime Minister should oppose the diagnostic testing of children on the ground that the remedial action that would necessarily follow would cost too much?

Mr. Baker: The Prime Minister does not oppose the diagnostic testing of children. If the hon. Lady reads the task group on assessment and testing report carefully she will find considerable criticism of diagnostic testing and its misuse. I remind the hon. Lady that not only has TGAT been published, but that on the substantive issue I have received three supplementary reports. We shall be publishing those, together with our responses, in the near future. We shall also be publishing our views on the system of assessment and testing.

Mr. Dalyell: What does the Secretary of State think would occur if he confronted the Prime Minister with the truth, namely, that the leak was authorised on the Prime Minister's behalf from Downing street?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman's paranoid preoccupation with plots is one of his most enduring and, indeed, endearing characteristics. I am afraid that yet again he has let his imagination run wild, and his imagination is one of the most unpredictable elements of British politics.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not a fact that over the years the Opposition have had so little to contribute to debates that they are pleased to find leaks of letters to act as a diversion to cover up their inadequacies and failure to contribute to debates on education and on every other subject?

Mr. Baker: I could not have put it better myself. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We are still waiting to hear from the Opposition—[Interruption.] I know that my hon. Friend is very popular, so I must mind my Ps and Qs. We are still waiting to hear from the Opposition their ideas and policies on a whole range of education matters, particularly assessment and testing.

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Skinner: Is the Secretary of State on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's side?

Mr. Straw: I was just about to ask that.

We have read not only the TGAT report but the letter that passed between the Prime Minister's private secretary and the right hon. Gentleman's private secretary. The Secretary of State must know that there is a major difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and himself. Now that the Chancellor has beaten the Prime Minister so roundly over the issue of sterling, will the Secretary of State follow his example, find his courage, and beat the Prime Minister, who wishes to introduce a system of competitive testing that will damage the education of the nation's children?

Mr. Baker: The Prime Minister and I were at one in welcoming the report. The questions raised by the Prime Minister were precisely the same as those raised in Committee, namely, that any system must avoid being too elaborate to be understood, too difficult to implement and too expensive to be practicable. The hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that the TGAT report came out in favour of age-related testing at seven, 11, 14 and 16 and the publication of results and records of pupil achievements —all opposed by the Labour party in the past. Are Labour Members going to agree with those recommendations now, or not?

Mr. Dalyell: In view of that unsatisfactory reply, I give notice that I shall seek to raise once again on the Adjournment the conduct of the Prime Minister's Office.

Rating Reform

7. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to meet the National Union of Students to discuss the arrangements for the introduction of the community charge; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Jackson): No. My right hon. Friend is aware of the views of the National Union of Students on the community charge. Arrangements for the introduction of the community charge are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mrs. Mahon: Does the Minister accept that there are often good security reasons why women and overseas students do not want their addresses made public? What guarantee will he give as to their safety when the new system is introduced?

Mr. Jackson: This matter will, of course, have to be considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I believe that he has made it clear that it will not be necessary to publish the names of certain categories of people, including those to which the hon. Lady referred, in the published list of those who are to pay the community charge.

Mr. Cormack: How does my hon. Friend defend the imposition of the community charge for students? How will he ensure that they all pay?

Mr. Jackson: All students have a vote. They have a vote in local elections. They benefit from the services provided by local authorities. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Government are introducing their proposals. More than 60 per cent. of students already contribute to the domestic rates. We discovered from our recent survey that they contribute some £70 to £80 per head.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister understand the position of students from Northern Ireland, whose parents will pay the full rate, while those studying in Great Britain will be liable for the community charge?

Mr. Jackson: Whether and to what extent students will be further compensated for their obligation to pay the community charge are matters being considered in the Department's review of student support. No decisions have yet been made.

Mr. Rhodes James: Will my hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State consider discussing with the Royal College of Nursing the particular position of student nurses under the new provisions?

Mr. Jackson: I repeat that the eligibility of all students, including nurses, will be considered in the context of the review.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I am sure the House understands why the Minister wants to put the blame and responsibility on the Department of the Environment for the implementation of the poll tax for students. The reason is that it will cause many problems. Will the student have a vote at home and pay the poll tax where his college is situated, so that there is not a link for students between the vote and the poll tax?

Mr. Jackson: It is a matter of electoral law as to where students cast their vote. This is a matter for the Home Office. Students have a choice as to where they register to vote and where they vote. I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Reverting to the original question, is my hon. Friend aware of the number of students registered with phoney colleges who are illegally in this country? If this system identifies those people, that will be right and proper.

Mr. Jackson: The Department has recently tabled amendments against bogus degrees in the House of Lords. We hope that this will be a way of tackling this problem.

Inner London

9. Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the future of education in inner London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since my announcement on 4 February my Department has received many comments from many sources.

Mr. Sedgemore: Can the Secretary of State give the House an assurance that, if the House of Lords stiffens its spine and decides that there should be a review of ILEA before any decision on abolition, he will recommend that the House accepts that decision? Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm the message on the tapes today that he is running so scared, and so frit, and is sweating so profusely with fear, that he has cancelled all his engagements and left them to the office boy?

Mr. Baker: I do not appear at the Dispatch Box as a trembling, blushing violet. I understand that the House of Lords has just started, or will shortly start, a debate on ILEA. We shall all watch the outcome with great interest.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that there are 20 times as many residents in inner London as those who took part in the so-called phoney parents' ballot? Will he also disregard the jaundiced remarks of ex-Prime Ministers, however eminent they may think they are?

Mr. Baker: Yes, as to the last, most certainly I will. As regards the parental ballot, decisions to transfer education responsibility from one sphere of government to another have always been taken by Parliament. That is the constitutional position. It is for Parliament to weigh up all the arguments, taking account of the views, not only of parents, but, as my hon. Friend says, of all those ratepayers who have to bear any consequences. As regards the ILEA ballot, the method chosen for the organisation of the ballot makes it next to impossible to determine how many parents actually voted.

Mr. Tony Banks: Does the Secretary of State remember those days when he was the PPS to the then Prime Minister? Does he not pay any attention whatsoever to his right hon. Friend's wise words these days over the future of the Inner London education authority?

With regard to that parents' ballot, does the Secretary of State say that that ballot is completely invalid and was fixed? Is that what he is telling the House?

Mr. Baker: All I am saying is that it was impossible to determine how many parents voted in that ballot. As regards the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), I think that he was wrong about ILEA while he was in office, and he is wrong now.

Mr. Bowis: My right hon. Friend will have seen the Gallup poll, which shows that the majority of parents in inner London have no worries about the transfer of education to the local boroughs. However, will he confirm that those who do have anxieties will not have their interests served by a delay in the implementation of the Education Reform Bill?

Mr. Baker: As I have said, this is being debated by the House of Lords. I have considerable sympathy with what my hon. Friend has said. I confirm that I saw a poll yesterday which declared that 62 per cent. of London parents said that they were not at all concerned about the abolition of ILEA. When it came to the inner London parents, 49 per cent. said that they were not concerned.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To help the debate, what can the Secretary of State tell us to allay the fears of all those who enjoy adult education within ILEA and take part in access courses? Will they be able to continue? Can he assure us that there will not be major problems with cross-borough transfers?

Mr. Baker: I have made it clear that we want to ensure that the good things being done by ILEA are retained. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State in the other House will be referring to this is a speech which she will be making shortly.

Mr. Ashby: As someone who has been a governor of ILEA schools, who has served on the Inner London education authority for four years and seen at first hand the high cost of ILEA as against the poor responses and the bad education that children receive, may I ask my right hon. Friend to ensure that ILEA is abolished? The children of London will then have the opportunity to have a decent education.

Mr. Baker: I can assure my hon. Friend that his facts are right. ILEA accounts for some 4 per cent. of the school population of the country and 8 per cent. of the national school budget. It is a very extravagant spender. The new arrangements will ensure that money is better spent, to the benefit of the children of London.

English Teaching

11. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further proposals he has to improve the teaching of English in schools, in the light of the responses received to the Kingman report.

12. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further action he proposes to take in the light of the responses received to the Kingman report, on the teaching of English in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has asked the new English working group to take account of relevant Kingman report recommendations in its work on attainment targets and programmes of study for English as a whole. He will consider the other Kingman recommendations in due course in the light of public reaction and the English working group's advice.

Mr. Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that the traditional method of teaching English in schools, with its emphasis on grammar, on construction and on spelling, has many virtues? Will she ensure that, as far as possible, these basic elements are retained as part of the national curriculum?

Mrs. Rumbold: I can assure my hon. Friend that we are asking the English working group to recommend attainment targets covering the grammatical structure of the English language, building on the Kingman targets.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that children develop their imagination and skill in writing from having freedom to write without too much grammatical constraint, but will she bear in mind that the English language has its cement in its grammar and that that is English language at its greatest and its best? Will she ensure that grammar teaching is preserved?

Mrs. Rumbold: We are most anxious that the English working group should build on the recommendations of the Kingman report and look at the structure of grammar. We certainly expect our children to be able to read, write and speak English, and to enjoy literature.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister not accept that the curbing of expenditure on books for schools and public libraries over recent years has scarcely assisted attainments in both the teaching of English and reading? Does he not accept that during the previous period substantial attainments were made?

Mrs. Rumbold: I always accept that there has been progress in teaching in our schools, because, of course, there has. However, there have been considerable advances during the past two years in the amounts of money that have been allocated for schools, especially for books. Indeed, there has been an 8 per cent. increase in the allocation for books and equipment in the current year.

Mr. Sackville: Does my hon. Friend agree that parents expect—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Private conversations should cease while we are on questions.

Mr. Sackville: Does my hon. Friend agree that parents expect their children to acquire at least the basic skills at school, of which the use of English must be one of the most important? Does she agree that an alarming difference has grown up between the teaching profession on the one hand, and parents and employers on the other as to what exactly constitutes education?

Mrs. Rumbold: My hon. Friend will be reassured by the fact that for our core subjects in the national curriculum we have chosen English, mathematics and science. It is perfectly true that many employers have complained that some of the children leaving school do not have the adequate literacy and numeracy that they believe necessary. That is the reason for the introduction of the national curriculum.

Provision Quality

13. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the annual report of Her Majesty's inspectors on the quality of provision in schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend hopes to publish the report for the 1987-88 academic year next January.

Mr. McKay: As previous reports from Her Majesty's inspectors have spelt out the truth about the Government's neglect of our education system, will the Minister ask her right hon. Friend to ensure that the report receives maximum promotion and publicity, as do his reports and statements from the Department of Education and Science?

Mrs. Rumbold: As I have just said, my right hon. Friend will publish the report. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the last expenditure report from Her Majesty's inspectors showed that in just over half the schools visited there was a need for improved teaching styles, better perception of pupils' needs and higher expectations of pupils. The report stated:

"unsatisfactory standards of provision are more often related to ineffective deployment of people and resources than to shortages of the resources".

Mr. Ian Bruce: When the report is published, will my hon. Friend comment that it is clear that the amount of money that is spent per pupil varies widely throughout local authority areas and that, unfortunately, we do not get quality for pounds spent in many of those areas, especially in ILEA? Will she highlight the fact that areas such as Dorset, which spend far less per pupil, get a better quality of education for the money spent?

Mrs. Rumbold: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. Reports by Her Majesty's inspectors take an overall look at what happens in all our schools. While they take into account expenditure, they also take into account the quality of the education that is delivered. That is easily identifiable and will be recognised in the report.

Mr. Cryer: Following the disgraceful attack by the Secretary of State on the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that the inspectors will be concerned about the standard of buildings in constituencies such as mine of Bradford, South, where the Government are neglecting the construction of the schools. Many schools in my constituency exist almost entirely in temporary classrooms. When will the Government make adequate provision in cities such as Bradford, with expanding school rolls, for which they are not now providing sufficient money?

Mrs. Rumbold: In the local government elections in the hon. Gentleman's constituency the Labour party lost control, so clearly there cannot necessarily have been such wonderful expenditure on buildings there. The public expenditure plans for this year contain considerable increases, as I have said earlier, for additional building work.

Education Authorities

14. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many education authorities have a primary, and middle and high school system.

Mr. Dunn: In January 1987 there were 44 local education authorities in England operating a three-tier primary, middle and secondary school system.

Mr. Field: Can my hon. Friend confirm that the three-tier system is every bit as good as the two-tier system?

Mr. Dunn: I have no evidence to the contrary.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Mr. Arnold: Has my right hon. Friend noted the widespread public support for our education reforms? Has she further noted the Gallup poll results in yesterday's Daily Telegraph, which noted that two out of three Londoners would not be worried by the loss of ILEA and that three out of four of them support the national curriculum, testing and parent power to opt out of local authority control?

The Prime Minister: Yes. My hon. Friend makes his point very effectively. I believe that most parents want the chance to opt out, to get their children out of the grip of some of the fanatical Left-wing authorities. I believe that the reforms to which my hon. Friend refers will lead to much better education. That is why the Labour party is fighting them, but parents will be very pleased with them.

Mr. Kinnock: May I warmly welcome today's cut in interest rates and the Chancellor's victory over the Prime Minister? Does this cut mean that the Prime Minister has changed her position and now wholeheartedly agrees with the Chancellor that further rises in the pound would be unsustainable and would damage British business and industry?

The Prime Minister: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman welcomes the cut in interest rates. He will note that we have taken interest rates down three times in the last two months. I am sure that he would like a detailed reply.

My right hon. Friend and I entirely agree—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."]

Mr. Kinnock: We want to listen.

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman very much. I hope that he will listen to the next reply too. My right hon. Friend and I entirely agree that we must maintain a firm monetary policy and a downward pull on inflation. I agree completely with all my right hon. Friend's Budget speech, every bit of it, which is more than the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition does.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about exchange rate policy. It is a part of overall economic policy. As I indicated a moment ago, he will note that we have taken interest rates down three times in the last two months. That was clearly intended to affect the exchange rate. We use the available levers, both interest rates and intervention, as seems right in the circumstances and—[Interruption.]—I hope that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen will listen very carefully to the last sentence—it would be a great mistake for any speculator to think at any time that sterling was a one-way bet.

Mr. Kinnock: I am, and I am sure everybody else is, interested to hear the Prime Minister draw attention to the three cuts in interest rates in the past two months. Two months ago I asked her whether she would intervene or use interest rates to bring down the pound and she said that intervention "would lead to inflation" and interest rate action could not deal with the matter because it would not be in the "interests of inflation" to do so. Is she now saying—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are important matters.

Mr. Kinnock rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The whole House wants to hear the question.

Mr. Kinnock: This is of general interest. Is the Prime Minister now saying that she was wrong about the inflationary implications of interest rate reductions?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman is entirely the master of his subject. [Interruption.] I gave the right hon. Gentleman the same reply when I was asked the same question on either the last or the previous occasion when the interest rate was taken down $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The reply was this: As the value of sterling has risen, that is the exchange rate has risen, that has tightened money supply, which enables us to reduce the interest rate without having any adverse effect on inflation.

Mr. Kinnock: Between the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer we at least know who the master is at present. Did the Prime Minister's last answer imply that if the pound rises above DM 3·18, which is where it is now, the Government will use interest rates again?

The Prime Minister: Anyone who is asking to know precisely what will happen is the friend of the speculator and aiding and abetting him.

Sir William Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that today's reduction in the base rate, and the two previous ones, give the lie to media and Opposition Members' accusations and hysteria to the effect that there is a rift between herself and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the management of the economy? Does she agree that managing a successful economy, which is the envy of the whole world, means the control not only of inflation and public expenditure and a sound fiscal policy, but of the exchange rate? Does not today's reduction prove beyond peradventure that there is complete and utter unanimity in the management of our economy under the capable management of the Chancellor?

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Mr. Steel: Will the Prime Minister clarify the Government's policy towards the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system? Is it still that we will join when the conditions are right? As that has been the position for the last eight years and the pound has varied against the deutschmark from DM 4·79 to DM 2·86, how have the conditions never been right?

The Prime Minister: It has been a very consistent position. We shall join when the conditions are right. It remains a consistent position.

Q2. Sir Hugh Rossi: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir Hugh Rossi: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the decision to withdraw from Afghanistan may well represent the high-tide mark in Russian expansionism and that it augurs well for glasnost and future peace between East and West? Does she further agree that the world is indebted to the Afghan people for their courage, tenacity and suffering, which has brought this about?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. We welcome the Russian withdrawal from Afghanistan, which has now begun to take place. We also believe that it was due to the tenacious fighting by the Afghan people against the occupation, with the support of many people throughout the world. We believe that it will improve East-West relations and hope that it will be followed by other withdrawals, for example, by Cuban troops from Angola and by Vietnamese troops from Cambodia.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Is it not clear that the difference between the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer is simply that the Chancellor of the Exchequer learnt about the problems of the DM 2·40 pound and the way in which it damaged so much of our manufacturing and other industries, and the Prime Minister did not? Will she learn that it is unwise to quarrel with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it is extremely foolish to do so in public?

The Prime Minister: I wish that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches could go further and say that they totally endorse the Chancellor's policy, they totally endorse his Budget and they agree with the reductions in tax, instead of trying to take away in increased taxation from the nurses and the doctors some of their increases in wages. That is what the Labour party wants.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: Does my right hon. Friend recall that 10 years ago, in the last year of the Labour Government, we had a combination of a weak pound, rampant inflation and goods pouring in from countries with strong currencies, such as Germany and Japan? Does she agree that, in industry's interests, as one of the component factors that it has to take into account is raw material prices, a buoyant currency is an essential concomitant of a successful economy?

The Prime Minister: I hear what my hon. Friend says, and I well remember the way in which the economy was handled by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Labour Benches. The reserves of this country dropped to only $4 billion and no one in the world would lend us a dollar or a penny piece. The reserves now are $48 billion because of the way in which the economy is run by the Chancellor.

Q3. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bidwell: In view of the right hon. Lady's recently published list of achievements, would it be her intention to add to it the widening gap between the rich and the poor, which is occurring throughout the nation?

The Prime Minister: Everyone in the nation has benefited from the increased prosperity—everyone. The amount spent on social security is well up. The fact is that Labour Members would rather have the poor worse off, provided that those who create the wealth did not earn so much. It is because we have encouraged those who are enterprising that we now have increased wealth to give in greater amounts to the Health Service and social security.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will my right hon. Friend accept that her total endorsement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's policy is a great comfort to her friends, as it is an annoyance to her enemies?

The Prime Minister: I endorse once again my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's most excellent policy. I hope that my hon. Friend who has asked the question will never cease to extol the virtues of a successful economy, which has been built up over the past nine years.

Mr. Healey: Was there not a contradiction in the remarks that the right hon. Lady made earlier in Question Time? As I understood it, she said she had agreed that the Chancellor should cut interest rates to bring down the value of the pound, and that that was the appropriate level for bucking the market at this time. But a moment later she said she had agreed earlier to cut interest rates because the high pound made it safe to do so without damaging the control of the money supply.

The cut in interest rates this morning has already led to a big fall in the pound. Does that mean that the right hon. Lady will now insist on an increase in interest rates in order to tighten the money supply, or is she not entirely the mistress of her subject or of the Chancellor?

The Prime Minister: If we were going to take lessons we would take them from someone who was the master of his subject and not from the right hon. Gentleman, who reduced this country's reserves to their lowest level ever. No one would lend him a penny piece. I do not wonder why.

Q4. Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cartwright: As the right hon. Lady reminded her supporters yesterday of her manifesto's commitments, will she assure the House that she will honour the manifesto commitment that child benefit would continue to be paid as now, and that there is no truth in press suggestions that child benefit is to be cut, taxed, frozen or abolished?

The Prime Minister: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the manifesto clearly stated:

"Child benefit will continue to be paid as now, and direct to the mother."

That commitment will be honoured.

Embankment Station (Fire)

3.30 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware that there was a fire this morning at Embankment Underground station. Given the sensitivity of the matter and the proximity to the King's Cross inquiry, would it be in order for the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement in the House today on this important matter?

Mr. Speaker: I have had no request for that.

Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill

3.31 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that last week the House attempted to give a Second Reading to a private Member's Bill—the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill. During that debate I asked the Minister for Public Transport whether the rumour that there had been a meeting between a member of his ministerial office and the promoter of the Bill was true. He said, as reported at column 397 of the Official Report, that, to his knowledge, there had been no such meeting.

It has come to light from a written parliamentary answer that I received last night that the Secretary of State for Transport had met the promoter of the Bill, the chairman of Associated British Ports, in February this year, at a time when many hon. Members had put a blocking motion on the Bill and were waiting to debate it. As the Minister for Public Transport promoted the Bill and asked us to support it last Wednesday, would it be in order for you to clarify the position about the meeting of the chairman of Associated British Ports and the Secretary of State? Is it right that such a meeting should take place when the House has yet to consider a private Bill? Is that private business, or is it another way of getting Government business through the back door?

Mr. Speaker: I have no knowledge of meetings outside the House. I have seen the answer to that question and I think the whole House will agree that it is highly commendable for any Minister or Back Bencher who inadvertently says something to the House that turns out subsequently to be untrue to put it right, and the Minister for Public Transport has done that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), Mr. Speaker, in which he pointed out to the House that the Minister had stated in his reply that he had met someone connected with the promoters of the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill, would it be in order, as it used to be, for the Minister concerned to make a personal statement, instead of dealing with the matter by a written answer?

Mr. Speaker: I think the whole House will agree that sometimes inadvertently things are stated in the House that turn out to be incorrect. I think that the Minister of State has taken the honourable and correct course in answering a question that was put down by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron). I do not think that any point of order arises for me. I am not responsible for meetings that take place outside the House.

Oral Questions

3.33 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In no sense do I question your selection of the hon. Members whom you call to ask questions, but would it be possible to explain the criteria on which you base that selection? I have tried kicking up a row to get called and I have tried behaving myself to get called. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) stormed out on Thursday last week in a temper and returned today only to be called immediately. Perhaps I should storm out now and come back to be called.

Mr. Speaker: Let me clarify the position. Bad behaviour certainly does not earn any good marks from the Chair. Today, we only—just—reached Question No. 4, and I seek to call hon. Members to put a question to the Prime Minister if they have not asked a question before.

BILL PRESENTED

ELECTRICITY (FINANCIAL PROVISIONS) (SCOTLAND)

Mr. Secretary Rifkind, supported by Mr. Ian Lang and Mr. Norman Lamont, presented (under Standing Order No. 48 (Procedure upon Bills whose main object is to create a charge upon the public reserve)) a Bill to raise the financial limit imposed by, and by virtue of, section 29(1) of the Electricity (Scotland) Act 1979: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. [Bill 169.]

Working Life (Reduction in Hours)

3.35 pm

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for a shorter working week, a shorter working year, earlier retirement and for connected purposes.

I introduce the Bill against an economic climate that shows a stark contrast. On the one hand, even on the Government's figures, over 2·5 million people are out of work, although we all know that the real figure is much higher. On the other hand, many people have to work excessively long hours, with shorter holiday entitlements than most of their European contemporaries and, in the case of men, having to work to age 65, whether or not they want to. That is why the main provisions of my Bill, which are in line with a long-standing TUC campaign and with European trade union objectives, are, first, to provide for a 35-hour week, secondly, to provide for six weeks' annual holiday, and, thirdly, to give men the choice to retire at age 60. All this would give enormous benefit both to those at work, by improving substantially their quality of life, and to those out of work, by providing the opportunity for the creation of new jobs to fill the vacancies that would result from my proposals.

Dealing first with the 35-hour basic week, at present the average for people in manual occupations is 39 hours a week before overtime, and the average for people in non-manual occupations is 37 hours a week. I can see no reason for a difference between manual and non-manual occupations. A year ago last January legislation was introduced in Norway to reduce the working week of people in manual occupations by two and a half hours to bring their hours into line with those of non-manual workers.

If we add overtime to the basic working week, the figures are worse. It might surprise the House to know that the average working week has increased since 1983 because of the greater tendency of employers, instead of taking on additional workers, to require more and more overtime. There are also great pressures for overtime from people on low wages. I look for a substantial reduction in overtime. I tell my friends in the trade union movement that where they find large amounts of overtime being worked they should start negotiating a reduction in working hours and the employment of more people.

I have chosen a 35-hour week because it opens the exciting prospect of trade unionists being able to negotiate a four-day week for their members. This is happening in limited cases at present. Many people, given the choice of a five-day week of seven hours a day or a four-day week of nine hours or thereabouts a day, would opt for a four-day week. It would make great sense in terms of travel expenses and the wear and tear of commuting. It would lead to a substantial improvement in quality of life for many of our fellow citizens.

The second provision in the Bill is for six weeks' annual holiday. Most German workers get six weeks' annual leave, but in this country the norm is 22 days for people in manual occupations, which is just over four weeks. In recent years there have been moves in the annual pay round to improve holiday entitlements, but the very minimum that we should require is six weeks' holiday entitlement. This is strongly in line with what happens in many European countries and with the TUC campaign.

No doubt we will be told by employers that they cannot afford to grant such leave but, of course, they have said that in response to every improvement in people's working conditions, ever since we stopped sending children up chimneys. They said exactly the same thing when it was suggested that there should be equal pay for men and women. It is a simple statistical fact that an additional week's annual holiday would add no more than 2 per cent. to the annual wages bill of a company, and it is well within the capacity of most companies to meet that. Six weeks' holiday is a perfectly reasonable request.

Finally, I should like to deal with the matter of earlier retirement. My proposal is that men who want to do so should be allowed to retire at 60. We know that 676,000 men between the ages of 60 and 65 are at work. We also know, from repeated Treasury estimates, that it would cost £3 billion to achieve this reduction in the retirement age. I do not know how that calculation can be substantiated, when we realise that many of the vacancies created by those who would be offered a pension would be filled by people in the dole queue, with dependent relatives. Many people have written to me to say that they are 60 years of age and have already worked for 45 years in a heavy manual occupation. They say, "I think that that is long enough for anyone." I think so too. We should adopt the common sense approach and give early retirement to men who want it, because the vacancies thus created could be filled by people in the dole queue.

My Bill contains the enigmatic phrase, "and for connected purposes." I see this merely as a start. There are many other things in the best practice of good employers that we should seek to introduce. Increasingly, sabbatical years are being offered to workers in mid life, but that is much more in evidence abroad than it is here. I commend that practice. There is also increasing evidence that employers are having the sense to prepare people for retirement by putting them on a four-day week during the six months prior to retirement. That is another example of best practice which I strongly commend.

There is much humbug about the dignity of work and about the desirability of more people working longer hours. I have long been of the opinion that if work were such a splendid thing the rich would have kept more of it for themselves. The Bill offers the prospect of substantial improvement in the quality of life of many of our fellow citizens and the substantial possibility of creating jobs for those in the dole queues who are currently searching for work. It is an enlightened Bill and I hope that it is far-sighted. I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bruce Grocott, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Ron Davies, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. John Garrett, Mr. Sean Hughes, Mr. James Lamond, Miss Joan Lestor, Mr. George Robertson, Mr. Jeff Rooker, Mr. Ernie Ross and Mr. Dennis Skinner.

Working Life (Reduction in Hours) Bill

Mr. Bruce Grocott accordingly presented a Bill to provide for a shorter working week, a shorter working year, earlier retirement and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 July and to be printed. [Bill 167].

Orders of the Day

British Steel Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New clause 1

SINGLE ENTITY

'Before the appointed day the Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament a report giving quantitative estimates of the advantages and disadvantages to the Exchequer, to the Corporation, to the customers and the employees of the whole and of the several parts of the Corporation, of the disposal of the successor company and its subsidiaries as a single entity or as more than one entity.'.—[Dr. Bray.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.45 pm

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 31, in clause 1, page 1, line 10, after 'section', insert '1(5A) and section'.

No. 32, in clause 1, page 2, line 11, at end insert—

'(5A) On the appointed day the stake held by the Corporation in Allied Steel and Wire shall not be vested in the successor company but shall be vested in an employees' trust fund to be held for the benefit of the employees of Allied Steel and Wire.'.

Dr. Bray: The Bill comes back from Committee very much as it went in, with the Committee able to inform the House of little more about the plans of either the Government or of the British Steel Corporation for privatising the industry. However, if the industry is to be privatised, its future shape, size, efficiency and behaviour will be very much influenced by the form in which it is privatised.

The Government have gone to great lengths in other privatisations, notably of the electricity supply industry, which is the most obvious of natural monopolies, to break up an industry so that it embodies in its future structure a degree of competition. However, when the steel industry was last in private hands and consisted of 14 separate companies, it needed an act of nationalisation to create a rational structure of a single entity.

The behaviour of a private enterprise is, of course, guided principally by the purpose of maximising its worth to shareholders. The company is able to exploit every bit of market power that it can, within the law of the land. Indeed, it is expected to do so. It is by the Government ensuring that the rules of competition are made and observed that the profit-seeking behaviour of the company in the market place becomes such that the health of the whole community is maximised. The Government argue that with the wealth go employment and people's incomes, and I do not disagree with them on that. Those are the Government's principles and their rules.

The Government are now proposing to privatise the British Steel Corporation as a monopoly within the meaning of the Act. The Fair Trading Act 1973, in section 6(1) states:

"For the purposes of this Act a monopoly situation shall be taken to exist in relation to the supply of goods of any description in the following cases, that is to say, if . . .

(b) at least one-quarter of all the goods of that description which are supplied in the United Kingdom are supplied by members of one and the same group of interconnected bodies corporate".

Furthermore, the chairman of the British Steel Corporation is on record as favouring "peak lopping", that is, restricting capacity so that, at the peaks in the cycle, customers are forced to go abroad and the amplitude of the cycle is made yet greater for other suppliers, with the expectation that, when demand falls, the customers will come back. It is nice if one can do it, but it is a recipe for losing market share and for ensuring the continuing decline of capacity and output, because other suppliers will become established in the market and the customers who have deliberately been turned away will not come back. The British Steel Corporation should have learnt that lesson in 1980-81, but it does not appear to have done so.

Likewise, the chairman of the British Steel Corporation advocates spheres of influence within Europe to reduce the amount of steel crossing borders. Those monopolistic tendencies are inherent in the nature of the industry. There is already a case before the European Commission about the alleged restrictive practices of the steel industry in special steels. While steel is in the public sector, the industry is constrained in many ways. For example, there has been formidable competition between works simply to survive because the Government have prevented BSC from closing any major works so long as they have remained competitive. That was the clear policy of the Conservative Government in 1982 and 1985.

The chairman and customers may speak to Ministers and officials about competition from Europe, which is very important on the demand side. However, it is a fact of life in the works that it is not just the demand side that matters. That may affect the price, but the level of resources required to produce a tonne of steel are conditioned by the absolutely formidable competition between works in recent years simply to survive and to maintain that viability and profitability which, within the understanding and terms of reference given by the Government, it has been necessary to maintain to continue the Government's commitment. That balance between ensuring competition within the industry and maintaining its basic capacity intact and developing it has been highly successful and has produced what is now the most profitable industry in Europe. However, it is threatened by the complete change of regime that the Government are deliberately bringing about.

An example of competition between works working with formidable and, to many of my colleagues questionable, efficiency was shown during the miners' strike. With the support of the unions locally, inside and outside the steel industry, and with the collaboration of local leaders of the National Union of Mineworkers, it was understood that it was essential to keep ore and coal supplies going to the steel works. If supplies had been interrupted the steel works would have closed, perhaps for ever, because of the loss of the blast furnaces. Neither Ministers nor the top management of the British Steel Corporation had any part in the negotiations. Often they simply did not know what was going on. Indeed, the top management of BSC at Ravenscraig did its best to sabotage the agreement between the unions that kept the works going.

Another example of the way in which the monopolistic tendencies operate can be found in BSC's attitude towards technological innovation. The BSC has made good use of short-term process improvements of a kind which during my days at ICI we used to call "process investigation work". However, the corporation is cool to the point of hostility to major technological advance. It is a rough, tough industry and the Government are handing over to it a degree of monopoly power which in the past steel tycoons would have found quite unimaginable. The whole commodity steel capacity of this country is to be handed over to a single private company.

On 4 May in Committee I moved a new clause allowing the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to privatise a part of BSC separately from the rest. The proposal came from people with a great deal of experience of the steel industry. A former works director at Ravenscraig put the suggestion to me in its most logically developed form. Motherwell district council had the proposal examined by the largest consulting firm in Scotland, and the accountants who worked on it were former BSC accountants.

In reply to the examination made in the report initiated by Motherwell district council, the Government have offered only debating points. They have offered no detailed examination of or justification for alternative structures for the industry, including the single entity. The Government have not even been able to produce evidence that they ever seriously considered any alternative structure for the industry. Instead, they have been hiding in the most extraordinary way behind the skirts of Welsh trade unionists. That is not an entirely honourable course for Ministers to take. There is an understandable sentiment in Shotton and in south Wales about the future structure of the industry, but we are concerned with the survival of jobs in Scotland, not about the sentiment and trading relationships between particular works. Any Government worth their salt and taking a decent, economic and, in the last resort, human view of the position would not be swayed by inevitably short-term sentiments in an untried situation.

The Ravenscraig, Shotton and Dalzell proposal, by which Ravenscraig would be associated with the plants that it principally supplies as a separate trading entity, is not a solution that the Opposition would prefer. We would prefer the industry to remain in public hands. We would prefer the industry to continue operating and developing as efficiently as it has done up to the present. However, if the Government are to privatise the industry, to do so in the manner that they propose would subject neither the public interest nor the interest of Ravenscraig itself to a fair test of the market, which is a concept that Ministers espouse.

The decision to privatise it is also an extraordinary demonstration of Ministers' political and economic short-sightedness. The birds will come home to roost on this issue well within the lifetime of this Parliament. Indeed, it is likely that in the course of the next year the British Steel Corporation will announce the intended closure of the hot mill at Ravenscraig. At present, BSC needs all its liquid steel capacity. In my last discussion with the chairman of the British Steel Corporation, in the company of my hon. Friend, I heard him say so himself. However, he made it clear that his comments related to liquid steel capacity. It was clear also that he understood that we understood that the need for capacity did not relate to the mill. Indeed, the announcement by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster refers specifically to the fact that there is no expectation or likelihood of the hot mill at Ravenscraig remaining open beyond 1989.

The closure of the hot mill at Ravenscraig would seal the long-term future of the works, as it would reduce it to the position of being just a slab supplier. Also, any steel works has a limited life without the replacement and modernisation of coke ovens and the relining of blast furnaces, which wear out rapidly with time. Also needed is the modernisation of the mill control systems, finishing processes, and so on, which are necessary to maintain the competitiveness of the product compared with that available from other mills which have been modernised.

The most important current development in the area in which Ravenscraig is engaged is probably thin slab casting, but BSC is not proposing to install that process anywhere in the corporation. The new plant for continuous thin slab casting being installed in the United States has no parallel in this country. The reason is that BSC has cut back its own research and development by 40 per cent. in real terms since 1979. Although it is investigating new processes in a small way with heavy percentage grants from the European Steel Community, simply to keep employed the experts it has to maintain in different sections of steel processing, it has no serious expectation that its modest investment in research into new processes will lead to fresh investment.

The much-quoted remark made by Sir Robert Scholey,

"I don't need an"

effing—

"physicist to tell me how to run a steel mill"—

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Call for Sir William Rees-Mogg.

Dr. Bray: I am sure that I was not as explicit as my hon. Friend would be. However, that remark, much quoted within the British Steel Corporation, set the attitude for too much of BSC's management. It was echoed to me by Shotton shop stewards when I was discussing the possible developments there. Indeed, I hope that Sir Robert does not need a physicist to run any of his existing steel mills, but one certainly needs a physicist to design a sensible plant to replace one's present mills. That kind of person is not being recruited today. Of the 40 new graduates that BSC recruited into its research department last year, only two had first-class honours degrees of any kind—only two out of 40, for the whole of the commodity steel industry in this country. In those circumstances, there is no way in which an industry cultivating the kind of technological image which the British steel industry needs can remain technologically competitive.

Looking at the kind of competition that the Ravenscraig, Shotton and Dalzell group constitutes, there would be a strong incentive to develop the new materials and processes which would keep it technologically competitive. A competitive situation would be created which would not exist in the steel industry in the form proposed by the Government.

The Arthur Young report shows that, for a wide range of demand variations in the future, it would pay BSC progressively to close Ravenscraig; not to close it next year or the year after, but progressively to close it as new plant is rounded off elsewhere in the corporation and old plant fails to be modernised at Ravenscraig.

[Dr. Bray]

The Arthur Young report also shows that, even with the continued competitive pressures created by the formation of the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group, its setting up would reduce BSC's profits, income and output, at least for a few years. That is why BSC is flatly opposed to the hiving off of the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group.

The arguments are spelt out in detail in the Arthur Young report. They show that it is necessary to maintain the present pressures for competitive improvement for the extra capacity that would be achieved by keeping Ravenscraig operating, to build up the total profits, income and output from present BSC plants to as high a level, with Ravenscraig continuing to operate, as BSC would be able to achieve by the lazy man's way of simply closing Ravenscraig.

The short-term results of closing Ravenscraig would be a short-term improvement in BSC's profits, but with an immediate reduction of national income and national output and, within a short time, a reduction of total national profits from the present assets. It is a classic demonstration of the abuse of monopoly power.

If Ministers are not prepared to look more seriously at the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell proposals, it must be because they have been advised that BSC is only marginally viable and believe that it would be gravely threatened by the loss of profits from the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group. The Arthur Young report looked at that, and my best advice is that that is not the case. The rest of BSC, just as the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group, would be fully commercially viable. In all likelihood both parts of the corporation would develop further links.

BSC has already made it clear that it would look to European links, and no doubt Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell would do likewise. It must be clear to Ministers that it simply is not possible to explore such a link without at least the Government's assent. It must also be clear to Ministers that their opposition effectively blocks any serious consideration of any international linkage for the parts of BSC that they are separating.

In response to the new clause that I moved in Committee, Ministers said that the Bill already allows them to sell the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group separately, and I accept that that is so. There is nothing in the Bill, and there is nothing in the powers that the Secretary of State will have over the successor company, to prevent the Government's implementing the course proposed in the Arthur Young report—the setting up of a separate Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group. In new clause 1 we are asking Ministers properly to quantify the alternative option for the structure of the industry. They have not done that. I doubt whether they have done it for themselves. They have certainly not done it for the market place or for the House. It simply is not true that the new clause prejudices the commercial interests of BSC. It does in the narrow sense that BSC's profits would be less if Ravenscraig, Shotton and Dalzell were separately privatised. The Chancellor does not need his advisers to tell him that. He can work that out for himself. But that is not the commercial interest about which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster should be concerned. The commercial interest about which he should be concerned is the overall profits, output and income generated for Britain. It is those factors that he has in no way put before the House.

The viability of alternative options is not just a matter for study. Without financial backers prepared to go through with the deal, all the studies in the world would mean nothing. No financial backers can emerge if they are faced with Ministers' political hostility and statements in the House that the Government's intention is to privatise BSC as a single entity, with Ministers concealing the evidence on which any serious alternative proposal, which goes beyond the scope of the Arthur Young report, could be put forward.

I and my hon. Friends are not in the political point-scoring game. We recognise that the proposal that we put forward here is not an easy one for the Opposition. It is a marvellous opportunity to give Scotland a chance to help itself, to demonstrate its enterprise culture, but instead of that the Government are just giving Scotland a slap in the face.

If Ministers do not follow their own principles and give Ravenscraig a chance, I warn them, and the Prime Minister, in the words of Adam Smith—whom the right hon. Lady quoted in Perth last weekend—in his book "The Theory of Moral Sentiments", which preceded and laid the foundations of "The Wealth of Nations", where he said:

> "We do not originally approve or condemn particular actions, because they appear to be agreeable or inconsistent with a general rule. The general rule on the contrary is formed by finding from experience, that all actions of a certain kind are approved or disapproved of . . . it is chiefly from this regard to the sentiments of mankind that we pursue riches and avoid poverty. For to what purpose is all the toil and bustle of this world? What is the end of avarice and ambition, of the pursuit of wealth, of power and pre-eminence? In the race for wealth, and honours and preferments . . . [a man] may run as hard as he can, and strain every nerve and every muscle, in order to outstrip all his competitors. But if he should jostle or throw down any of them, the indulgence of the spectators is entirely at an end. It is a violation of fair play, which they cannot admit of."

It is that violation that the Government are committing today in relation to Scotland's steel industry. It is not BSC or Bob Scholey who will face the reaction when Ravenscraig is closed. They will merely be playing to the rules set by the Government. It is Ministers and the Tory party who will be seen to have cheated by their own lights and to have closed down Scotland's largest and fully competitive industrial unit.

My Scottish colleagues and I are simply concerned with some 10,000 jobs in our constituencies. We shall fight all the way to preserve them. But we are also concerned with the survival of a substantial piece of viable industrial capital which, with a deteriorating balance of payments, Britain will continue to need.

We ask the Minister to think again, or at least to keep an open mind.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Opposition Members welcome the terms in which my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) has moved his new clause. All those who heard him speak during the Second Reading debate and, more particularly, in Committee will understand the depth of his expertise on and commitment to the future of the Scottish steel industry. We share his concern about the future of that industry, and in particular that of the Ravenscraig plant. We take on board the conclusions of the study that was commissioned by Motherwell district council, to which my hon. Friend referred. That study was carried out by Arthur Young, accountants. It concluded that 11,000 jobs would be at stake if Ravenscraig were to close, and that, of course, the immense contribution that Ravenscraig makes to the Scottish economy would also be lost. We are entitled to be concerned because of the political history of the issue.

We know that the Government have made earlier unavailing efforts to close Ravenscraig. We know that, on those occasions, their political nerve failed them, that leading members of the Cabinet threatened resignation if that step were taken, and that, faced with that pressure, the Government backed down. We conclude also that the Government remain, if not committed to, at least persuaded of, that course and that there is still in the Government's mind the possibility—indeed, the likelihood—that, in the interests of a privatised British steel industry, Ravenscraig might be closed.

Of course, in the present situation, our concern is greatly intensified. Throughout the debates on the privatisation of this great industry, it has been perfectly clear that one of the Government's overriding considerations has been to get the best possible price for the industry. It has been quite clear that the industry should be made to look as attractive as possible to potential private investors. For that reason, great emphasis has been placed on British Steel's admittedly short track record of profitability.

Most commentators agree that the price that will be obtained will largely be a function of the level of profitability, either current or expected. Most people believe that profits will have to be about 20 per cent. of the capital price paid. Any factor that either pushes up or pushes down the likely level of profitability becomes of intense interest to the Government, as it is quite clear that it will strongly influence market sentiment in terms of what the market is prepared to offer to British Steel.

The interesting aspect of the Arthur Young report is its conclusion that a privatised British Steel that decides to close Ravenscraig—although doing great damage to the overall viability of the British steel industry and to the national economic interest—and getting rid of a substantial body of costs could nevertheless increase profits by up to £100 million a year. Interestingly, to my knowledge, whenever that point is raised—it was frequently raised in Committee—no Conservative Member contested it.

If the closure of Ravenscraig will produce an improvement of £100 million—at least in the short and accounting term in which the markets are likely to judge these matters—it becomes a matter of great interest to the Government. It might lead them to the conclusion that it will mean a £500 million increase in the price for which they might sell British Steel.

Those are the reasons that we fear that the Government have it in mind to sell British Steel, not only in its present monopoly form but with the right to close Ravenscraig. In other words, they cannot afford to sell British Steel if Ravenscraig and perhaps other parts of the corporation have already been divested and already exist and are able to trade independently. Quite clearly, that would substantially reduce the market value of British Steel. They are selling the right to close Ravenscraig.

That suits the Government from two viewpoints. First, as I have suggested, it might lead them to hope for a much better price on strictly commercial grounds. Secondly, it enables them also to argue that the political objective of which they have long been advocates—that is, the political objective of closing Ravenscraig, without the political odium that would normally go with that—could be achieved by shuffling off the responsibility and placing it in the hands of private owners.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): It seems that the hon. Gentleman is walking around the periphery of the amendment and touching on various aspects of the Arthur Young report without coming to the point. I am interested to see where he is going. The point of the amendment is to press the case for British Steel being privatised as a single entity or remaining in state hands as a single entity. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) disagrees with me on the main point and would like to see the company remain state owned. Will he say whether the Opposition say that BSC should remain a single entity? Does he support the arguments of his hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray)? [Interruption.] Of course I say "single entity". Do Opposition Members support the hon. Member for Motherwell, South, who thinks that it should not be a monopoly, as he put it, but should be fragmented?

4.15 pm

Mr. Gould: I am flattered that the Chancellor could not contain his impatience and was unwilling to wait for my speech to unfold. I am somewhat disturbed—it may have been a slip of the tongue or an oversight—that he managed comprehensively to express the thrust, sense and meaning of my hon. Friend's new clause in exactly the wrong direction. My hon. Friend's new clause is designed to open the possibility of the corporation being sold other than as a single entity.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): That is what he said.

Mr. Gould: That is not what the Chancellor of the Duchy said. He may have intended to say that.

Of course we are extremely concerned about the Government's intentions, but having made the point in support of the real concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South and other hon. Friends, particularly those representing Scottish interests, I invite the Chancellor's attention to the terms of my hon. Friend's new clause. It does not press the Government to do anything but lay before Parliament, before the relevant date, a report setting out the arguments for one course as opposed to another. That proposal is extremely moderate and restrained. Therefore, it is extremely difficult to see why, for any reason, the Government could oppose it. We shall listen with great interest. After all, the Government have the power of disposal in these matters. I hope that they will enlighten us about their attitude to the new clause. It is their view that matters.

I am sorry to say that I have just heard a sotto voce comment from Conservative Benches to the effect that the Government are opposed to it. That increases my puzzlement. On what grounds could they be opposed to it? It is a permissive measure. It commits the Government to nothing except a procedural step. It is a time-limited provision. In other words, once the relevant date has passed, the provision loses its force and cannot be revived by a successor Government.

[Mr. Gould]

It is hard to see why the Government should be so nervous about such a provision. It is almost as though they are startled, frightened and shying away from ghosts and shadows. I fully appreciate that the history of the Committee proceedings shows how frightened they are of ghosts.

Mr. Atkins: Shadows.

Mr. Gould: Exactly—shadow spokesmen, among others. It is extraordinary that the Government are not prepared simply to fulfil the limited obligation that would be imposed upon them by the new clause.

The Government are not prepared to accept the new clause, not because they are unwilling to go through this procedural step—they may be prepared to do so, although I am confident that so far they have not informed themselves on these matters—but because they are determined, according to their lights, not to give the wrong signals to the market. They are afraid that, if they accept the new clause and raise even the remotest glimmer of a possibility that the corporation will be divided into separate entities, it will affect its marketability. The Government are concerned, as they approach the market, to preserve the corporation's monopoly position. They do not want the slightest cloud of suspicion to sully that pristine position.

That is an extremely objectionable attitude for the Government to take. As the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the Under-Secretary of State will confirm, we have written several times to ask for the evidence to which they have referred which has persuaded them that the corporation should be sold off as a single entity. We have been told that these are matters of commercial confidentiality. My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South dealt more than adequately with that objection.

If the Government are not prepared—we think that they act on specious grounds—to tell us what advice they have received and from whom, and even if they say that they have little possibility of influencing these matters, they should give us some guidance as to their preferences on the shape that the industry should take under private ownership.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): I hope that, at some stage, the hon. Gentleman will say what shape he would like the industry to be in. Given his distrust of monopoly —which we accept—and the strong possibility that the legislation will be passed, does he favour a Scottish steel company competing against an English steel company?

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman must accept that his right hon. Friends are responsible for the legislation. This is not our Bill. As we have said, if this monopoly is to be maintained, it is clear that, on this and other grounds, the right answer for the British steel industry is for it to remain in public ownership. Let us be clear about that. Any other question is hypothetical. [Interruption.] That may not suit the Government.

Dr. Bray: Perhaps we would come up with a firm answer if Ministers assured us that, if the Opposition voted in favour of the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell solution, they would accept it. If Ministers merely say that they will pursue this for political purposes, to muddy the waters, they will be treated in Scotland with the scorn that they deserve.

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend points out that, having revealed informally that they are opposed to the new clause, Ministers are left with the difficulty of explaining how what is to all intents and purposes a monopoly should be handed over to private owners without any adequate protection against abuse of that monopoly power. Whenever we have raised this objection, in Committee and elsewhere, we have been left with the fatuous argument that British Steel is hardly to be regarded as a monopoly, since 40 per cent. of the domestic market is taken by imports. That certainly casts a novel light on the immense increase in import penetration under this Government across the board in manufactured goods.

We have always assumed that this might be something that the Government regretted and something that they recognised had a connection with the slumps in manufacturing output, manufacturing investment, manufacturing employment, our manufacturing trade deficit and the trade position generally. But not a bit of it; we now hear that the surging imports in steel and other industries are all part of a carefully structured strategy and that this is that very illusory creature—the Government's competition policy. We should be delighted to hear from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, if he intervenes further in the debate, or from one of his ministerial colleagues, whether that is so.

Is 40 per cent. import penetration to be held up as an objective to be desired, supported and argued for on the ground that it imposes welcome competition on domestic suppliers? It is a fatuous argument because, even on British Steel's own terms, it is content to accept a monopoly in the parts of the market with which it is principally concerned and to leave it to the value of imports to make up supplies when and where there is a surge of demand which it is unwilling to meet.

We are left with a familiar situation. The language is that of liberalisation and competition and of subjecting, through the pressure of market forces, operations like this to all sorts of commercial pressures so that efficiency is improved. All that is a complete charade. It falls down because there is no liberalisation or competition and market forces are not suddenly being introduced. Indeed, the reverse applies. The purpose of this "privatisation", to give it its proper name, is carefully to preserve the monopoly in order to maximise the price which can be obtained for the industry.

We have seen this happen with British Telecom and many other privatisations. We are familiar with the gaping hole in the arguments. That does not stop us—perhaps optimism never quite dies—from looking in vain through the Bill for a sign that the Government are prepared to match, even with the smallest step, the rhetoric of their apparent commitment to liberalisation and competition.

Where is there in the Bill any measure to prevent a privatised steel company from abusing the monopoly power that it will be handed on a plate? What do the Government propose to do to prevent abuse of that power? Where is the "Ofsteel", an organisation like the one that the Government felt it necessary to introduce for British Telecom, in the form of Oftel? Where is the ombudsman, or some means by which steel consumers and customers can be protected? Where are the mechanisms to inhibit the abuse and exploitation of the monopoly position?

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Is it not right that the mechanism to control the industry will exist in the form of foreign competition? Already parts of the project at Canary Wharf will be built and bought overseas. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent someone from buying steel from an outside producer.

Mr. Gould: I was under the illusion that the hon. Gentleman was present when I spoke on precisely that topic. Although he may have been here physically, I suspect that his mind had wandered elsewhere. I dealt at length—I felt extremely convincingly—with exactly that point. If the hon. Gentleman is advancing, yet again, the theory that a high level of foreign imports is the Government's competition policy and therefore to be much applauded, a great deal of what has happened to British industry and to our trade balance can be explained in those extraordinary and unsatisfactory terms.

I reiterate Labour's concern for the future of Ravenscraig. I make it clear, as I did on Second Reading and in Committee, that, if the Government intend to slide out from under any responsibility for Ravenscraig's future and respond to its closure by private owners—for the reasons outlined by Arthur Young—by saying, "It is now a commercial matter for the private owners and nothing to do with us," we shall not let them off the hook.

We put the Government on notice that they will be held politically responsible for the future of Ravenscraig. We are completely committed to that future. As my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South has said, we intend to fight tooth and nail for as long as it takes to ensure that future. My hon. Friend's new clause gives the Chancellor of the Duchy, or his ministerial colleagues, a renewed opportunity to tell us that our fears are groundless. We shall be listening carefully, not for weasel words like "market forces" and "commercial considerations", but for a commitment to the future of Ravenscraig. It is an integral part of the sort of steel industry which the British economy desperately needs.

4.30 pm

Mr. Fallon: We have listened many times to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), but I wonder whether we have ever before heard him give such unconvincing and uncertain support as he has for the new clause moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray).

On the one hand, the hon. Member for Dagenham asked my right hon. and hon. Freinds to reiterate, to replicate or to demonstrate their anxiety for Ravenscraig. On the other hand, of course, he advocates all the usual arguments against monopoly. It is no wonder that the English Labour Front Bench is so uncertain about the policies for devolution advocated by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and his hon. Friends. It is no wonder that the red rose of England is such an unsuitable symbol for the Labour party in Scotland, when we have that ambivalent approach advocated by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton).

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Perhaps the hon. Member could explain why the so-called red rose, as he calls it, managed to sweep Scotland in the general election.

Mr. Fallon: I was just arguing the point that the red rose is not the most suitable symbol for a party that distrusts monopoly, but is unprepared to advocate devolution in Scottish industrial policy. Had the hon. Member for Cathcart believed that the red rose was a Scottish red rose, he would argue—as his colleagues have done on the privatisation of electricity—for a Scottish steel company that was prepared to take on an English steel company, a Welsh steel company or other regional divisions of British Steel. That was the lacuna in the speech of the hon. Member for Dagenham. There was a total absence of faith in the ability of the Scottish division of British Steel and of Ravenscraig to stand up to the forces of competition and the commercial play inside the domestic United Kingdom economy—let alone within the European Community.

This new clause is a Ravenscraig protection clause, but it is none the worse for that. If it is a clause simply to protect Ravenscraig, it might have been more honest if those hon. Members advocating it from the Opposition Benches had said, "We want to protect Ravenscraig for ever," or, "We want to protect it for 20 years, 40 years or 60 years." To dress it up in this special report, in terms of their distrust of monopoly and uncertainty whether the privatisation should be entire or partial, is completely bogus.

Of all the things that the Opposition could have argued this afternoon, they cannot argue that the Ministers have not taken seriously the arguments for preserving Ravenscraig. I am delighted to see the Minister of State, Scottish Office here. Since 1979, Ministers have done little else in the Scottish Office but take the arguments for Ravenscraig seriously. Had they not done so, had they absolved themselves of any social responsibility in that area of Scotland, Ravenscraig would have been closed some years ago.

The Scottish Office and Industry Ministers have bent over backwards seriously to consider the problems of Ravenscraig. This does not come easily from my lips, but they have taken a balanced approach to these matters. They have looked at all the social and economic consequences of closing such a large plant. They have looked at the dependence of the local economy upon it and they have drawn quite the opposite conclusion from that inferred by the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray). The Scottish Office and the Department of Industry have protected Ravenscraig for nine years. Further, they laid out clearly before the House on Second Reading and in Committee the prospect of Ravenscraig surviving for some years ahead. The argument that the Scottish Office or the Industry Department have not taken Ravenscraig seriously does not stand up to serious examination.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Will the hon. Member accept that I largely agree with what he is saying about political decisions having kept Ravenscraig open? However, what he has not mentioned is that, for the past five years, Robert Scholey has been wanting to close it. Does the hon. Member expect Sir Robert to keep it open when he will no longer be subject to the scrutiny of a Minister in the Scottish Office and he can make up his own mind? What does the hon. Member expect the future of Ravenscraig to be with Sir Robert in charge?

[Mr. Stan Crowther]

Mr. Fallon: That is an interesting intervention, which I shall answer. I have slightly more faith in the observation of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South in moving this new clause than in that of his hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther). The hon. Member for Motherwell, South has assured us that Ravenscraig is "fully competitive". If Ravenscraig is fully competitive, I have no doubt that the markets, the future shareholders of the British Steel Corporation and the board of the British Steel Company plc will fully endorse the view of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South. There will probably be no question of Ravenscraig being closed.

Dr. Bray: It was as a north-east Member of Parliament that I first visited Ravenscraig and involved myself in these arguments. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) has not understood the argument. While Ravenscraig is viable and is justified as contributing a net addition to the income of the country, BSC—when constituted as a private monopoly—would still find it in its interest to close Ravenscraig. That is a typical monopolistic action. If the hon. Member would like to see the figures spelt out in detail, I shall be happy to give him the Arthur Young report.

Mr. Fallon: The market, the research analysts and those who follow steel pricing will be disappointed with that intervention, because they already see the faith of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South slipping a little. In his first speech, he said that Ravenscraig was "fully competitive". Now he says that Ravenscraig is viable—[Interruption.] He said "viable". He said that its retention is fully justified if one takes the longer-term view. The markets have heard that one before, and they will hear it again. However, "viable" and "fully justified" are not of course the same as "fully competitive".

Dr. Bray: The Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell group would be fully profitable.

Mr. Fallon: I am reassured. If the group were to be fully profitable, I see no reason for the markets that follow those matters, the investors in British Steel or the board to go to an annual general meeting or to the City proposing the closure of those plants. I am sure that the new reassurance from the hon. Member for Motherwell, South will be regarded as strongly as his original offering that Ravenscraig is "fully competitive".

Having dealt with the point about full competition, with the assistance of the hon. Member for Rotherham, I turn now to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Dagenham that the report might assist in some way and that the function that he suggested in new clause 3, which was not selected, might be attributed to the ombudsman. I refer to his complaint that no regulatory agency is to be set up. Of course I am concerned, as he is, that the British Steel Corporation should not exercise a monopoly. That is important for my constituency also. The British Steel Corporation has a half share in one of the major employers in Darlington. Therefore, I do not want it to abuse its monopoly position in the United Kingdom domestic market, any more than the hon. Gentleman does. However, I am not clear—I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's other new clause has been selected, so we will not be able to explore this point fully—exactly how the ombudsman or "Ofsteel" agency would cut across the normal rules of competition policy or the remit that the European Community has in that regard.

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, especially as I pay him the credit of knowing that he is one of the prime exponents and supporters of free markets and therefore, one assumes, of competition also. I take seriously his statement that he too is concerned about the abuse or potential abuse of monopoly by a privatised steel company, but what does he propose to do about that?

Mr. Fallon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman; I share that concern. We have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) about the Canary Wharf development. One of the major fabricators in this country, Cleveland Bridge, in my constituency, has the contract for that development, but it must purchase the steel. Therefore, I am concerned that, when privatised, the British Steel Corporation may be able to abuse or to exploit its position in the United Kingdom market.

The point that I was putting to the hon. Member for Dagenham and that he was putting back to me was that I do not see how an ombudsman or an "Ofsteel" regulatory agency could necessarily have a stronger regulatory framework than the normal rules of competition policy or the supervision that the Commission exercises in that regard.

Mr. Gould: Again, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman because he was honest enough to say that he had not answered my question. Between the question that he is putting to me and the question that I wish to put to him, it is fair to say that we are scrabbling around the margins of a situation that we do not wish to see arise. However, he and the Government, who are the supporters and sponsors of this Bill, are committed to the outcome, so he has to answer the question rather more pointedly than I do. I return to the question: what would he do to allay the fears that he has conceded he feels?

Mr. Fallon: That is a fair question. All that I am saying is that new clause 3, which has been tabled by the hon. Gentleman, does not go anywhere near as far as we need to go. His regulatory body, which is not called "Ofsteel", but the Office of Fair Trade in Steel, would have, I understand, only a monitoring and reporting role. He does not envisage that office going any further than the present competition policy scrutiny arrangements allow. Therefore, we are entitled to ask how much further new clause 1 takes us. If it is his view that the monopoly aspect of a privatised British Steel Corporation should be of paramount concern to consumers and to industrial customers, he must come up with firmer regulatory arrangements than either his hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South or he himself has proposed.

In conclusion, arguments can be put forward against the privatisation of British Steel as a single entity and arrangements could be advanced by the Opposition for ensuring greater competition. However, the primary amendment or time of attack of this Report stage is this somewhat ambivalent new clause which seeks on the one hand to suggest that British Steel's monopoly is a threat, but on the other hand, and at the same time, requires an extraordinary and permanent degree of protection for one plant. I for one certainly oppose the new clause.

4.45 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I support the broad thrust of new clause 1. The reasons for this debate are, first, the way in which the privatisation is being brought forward and, secondly—this appeared not only on Second Reading but on Report—that the Government are anxious to get British Steel off the stocks while the books look acceptable and have not considered any option other than to sell it as a single entity.

Even if one brushes aside ideological and philosophical arguments, the thrust of the new clause is that, having decided that our steel industry was ready to be put into the private sector, any responsible Government would wish to look at every conceivable way in which that might be done so that they could pursue the best possible option. The House is entitled to conclude that the Government have not made any such attempts, but have simply said, "Heavens, we have a slippage in our privatisation programme. British Steel looks profitable. Let us flog it off as quickly as we can before we have even considered the best way to do it." The House is entitled to ask the Government to explain why they have not considered the options or, preferably, to say that they are prepared to consider the options and have decided on the particular course of action that is most appropriate, having presented the facts to the House.

Hon. Members representing Scotland are especially worried about the implications of the Bill for the future of Ravenscraig. In an intervention the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) told us that international competition would ensure that matters of choice and competition would be resolved. The hon. Gentleman proceeded to point to a location for the landing of foreign steel that is about as far away from the Scottish steelyards as one could get, in circumstances where the yards that manufacture steel for North sea oil production are reasonably expecting increased demand in the future and wish to look to a good quality competitive local supplier, which is what they have had in the past few years in Ravenscraig.

Another matter of concern, which has already been mentioned by the hon. Membr for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther), is that the British Steel Corporation has made little secret of the fact that it wishes to offload Ravenscraig. Indeed, if I am not mistaken, it attempted to present information that gave the impression that Ravenscraig was not viable, when in fact it was. The corporation loaded the accounts in a certain way to lead to that possible conclusion. That bears out the anxieties not only of Scottish Members, but of all Opposition Members.

The argument that was put forward by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), that somehow the market is always right and that if an entity is profitable or viable it has nothing to fear, is naive. It is possible for those in an organisation to say, "We have four viable enterprises, but we could rationalise them into three viable enterprises." That may or may not make any difference other than one of managerial convenience. It may make a marginal improvement in efficiency, but it may not. However, the idea that because one of the enterprises is profitable such a decision would not be taken is foolhardy and is not borne out by the facts.

Ravenscraig is so crucial to the core of what is left of the Scottish industrial economy that its loss would be a damning blow. We should take on board the fact that we are talking about a Scottish economy which at the moment sustains over 5 million people and which, according to Government forecasts, will sustain only 4·8 million people in 12 years' time. Unless we can reinvigorate our whole economy we shall not be able to hold the population that we have, never mind add to it. It is really not credible to argue that if an entity as large as Ravenscraig were taken out there would be sufficient residual strength in the Scottish economy. Ravenscraig is crucial not just to the 5,400 people employed and the £300 million turnover that it represents, but to the whole Scottish industrial infrastructure.

Mr. Fallon: I appreciate that that may well be the case, but does the hon. Gentleman share the view of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) that Ravenscraig is "fully competitive"?

Mr. Bruce: As far as I am aware, Ravenscraig has been profitable and, if accounts are independently examined, could have a profitable future, but that depends on several things, two of which are crucial to this argument. One is the wholehearted commitment of the management, which most of us know does not exist, and the second is the follow-through of that wholehearted commitment by investing in the plant to ensure that the extent to which it is competitive can be sustained in the future because it has the best equipment available. So far the only assurances that we have from the Government are qualified and relate to the finite nature of existing investment rather than the ploughing-in of any new investment.

Mr. Devlin: Does the hon. Member think that Ravenscraig is fully competitive? Perhaps I can home in a little more for him. Would he say that Ravenscraig is fully competitive with the other steel plants in the United Kingdom—Teesside, for instance?

Mr. Bruce: The pressure from Conservative Members shows why we have every reason to be worried, because the implication behind that question is that the hon. Gentleman thinks that Ravenscraig is not competitive and that the sooner it is closed the better. That is exactly what we are trying to defeat, because the consequences of that action would be devastating. This is not the place to widen the debate to social costs and the costs of infrastructure, but we cannot take out such a plant and ignore what that would mean to British Rail in Scotland and the effect that it would have on the cost competitiveness of our North sea oil industry in the 1990s. Those are factors that should have been, but have not been, taken on board.

I cite the record of British Steel in the early days of North sea oil development, when it decided to discontinue specialist steel pipe making just at the point when a major market had opened up for North sea equipment. We had to import a large proportion of the piping from Japan because we had closed down our capacity. The judgment of British Steel management has not always been impeccable. That may be—at this stage I say only "may be"—an argument why British Steel, if it is to be privatised, could usefully be privatised in more than one entity. Different managements might make different judgments of the appropriate priority and the market opportunity.

Given the indecent haste with which the Minister wishes to sell off British Steel, before it has fulfilled one year of viability, if British Steel gets into financial difficulties in the future, what will the Government's response be? Will they allow British Steel, as an industry, to disappear? Will Britain simply opt out of steel-making because the Government are not prepared to operate a steel industry that cannot pay its way, regardless of the strategic implications and of the effect that that would have on other industries? If so, that is a highly irresponsible attitude to take. If the Government are prepared to accept responsibility, how will they ensure that we have a viable steel industry that is not likely to get into difficulty? I say only that this may be an argument, but if there were two or three steel corporations, not all of them would necesarily get into difficulty at the same time and the scale of the problem might not be quite so severe.

The Government have failed to demonstrate that they have in mind what I would regard as responsible stewardship of this industry. I come back to the debate, having spoken on Second Reading and criticised the impetuosity and haste with which the Government have pushed this matter forward, and find that throughout the Committee stage that situation persisted.

The steel industry continues to be crucial to our economy. Everybody must welcome the fact that it is in a strong position, but questions remain to be answered by the Government, and I do not believe that they have looked at the possible different ways in which they could pursue their objective. I feel that the reason for that is that they are anxious to get British Steel off their hands while the going is good, and I for one have no confidence in their record so far.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson (New Forest): I came to the House 24 years ago direct from the steel industry. I start my remarks by declaring an interest in that I am currently associated, and have been for 30 years, with a company that makes the bulk of the melting electrodes for the industry.

The steel industry today is in very good heart indeed, which has not been achieved without going through some very difficult times during the past two decades. I remember vividly when I came to the House—indeed, I made my maiden speech on the steel industry—that the Labour party was full of the views of the late Richard Crossman and the need for the commanding heights of the economy to be taken into public ownership—and, of course, the steel industry was the most commanding height of all. Far from being an easy business to operate, it turned out to be one of the most difficult that any Government had managed. Indeed, it has been an albatross around the neck of the taxpayer that is only now beginning to release its grasp.

It amazes me to hear Opposition Members asking for assurances about what may or may not happen in the future and about one particular plant, which I shall certainly refer to in a moment, when I remember the savage treatment meted out to plants such as Consett, where the whole of the local economy was dependent on the one plant—the gas supply, the bus station, the whole lot. That was because of the need to keep the corporation viable.

One could argue that the presence of the big integrated plants has played a substantial part in the destruction of many of the smaller companies and, as a result, produced a great deal of misery and unhappiness in all parts of the country. In Scotland it is not just that Ravenscraig may or may not suffer; other plants have already had to go in order to keep these big monsters alive. One could argue whether the investment in plants, such as Anchor and the other big integrated plants, was in the best interests of the steel industry in this country. One has to recognise that, although the corporation is now in very much better shape than it has ever been before, our inability to provide the necessary products to bring the North sea oil ashore is a good example of how sadly the British steel industry has failed over the last two decades to meet all the requirements that we would all have liked it to meet.

The British Steel Corporation, as a monopoly, has been ruthless to the private sector. We are being asked by Front Bench Opposition Members to build in all sorts of safeguards to protect various individual companies when the company is eventually privatised. BISPA—British Independent Steel Producers Association—has put up a magnificent fight over many years to try to protect that sector of the industry that was not nationalised, but how can that part of the industry ever compete with a corporation with its hand deep in the taxpayer's pocket? As a result, Ministers from both Labour and Conservative Governments have come to the Dispatch Box at various times with borrowing powers Bills to top up the corporation's finances and created a situation in which a private organisation could not hope not merely to compete but even to survive. Therefore, I hope that we shall not hear too much in the remainder of these debates about the almost benevolent attitude that the corporation has taken in the past. It has been a ruthless monopoly.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: What the hon. Gentleman is saying is, of course, borne out by the record, particularly the crushing of the private sector from 1980 to 1982. Is he therefore happy that a monopoly which has the potential for being even bigger and more powerful should be put in the private sector without any let, hindrance, control, restraint or supervision in any form?

Mr. McNair-Wilson: The hon. Gentleman is making an important point. Under nationalisation, as a result of destroying companies' names and structures, all the landmarks within the industry were ultimately removed. That was done deliberately to make it extremely difficult to denationalise the industry into the shape that it had been before it was taken into public ownership. In future I, too, should like to see the industry returned to real competition. The whole of the nationalisation statute was undoubtedly based on creating a single monopoly and, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out in his intervention, that had a disastrous effect on the private sector.

The Ravenscraig plant has been mentioned. I do not represent a Scottish constituency, and Opposition Members know Scotland's problems better than I do, but in its heyday as a flat product plant supplying originally Rootes at Linwood with autostrip and the shipbuilding industry on Clydebank it obviously had a substantial home market. That has changed. I do not know what the future of Ravenscraig is. I do not involve myself directly in that. But we must recognise that other parts of the industry have every bit as strong a claim to survival, but this plant has caught the public imagination and hon. Members with constituency interests have properly fought for it. I hope that we shall recognise, as Opposition Members who lived through the days of closures know only too well, that we cannot make complete predictions about the viability of any plant or business. I hope that Ravenscraig survives and prospers, but I must recognise that its original concept was against a completely different market background from that which applies today.

I end my remarks with a plea for the industry. The industry's shape has changed, its product range has to some extent changed and, indeed, it is probably safe to say that another blast furnace will never be built. Electric melting should have a bright future, but that depends on energy costs. The cost of energy has always been a problem which we have had to confront in the industry, even when the blast furnace route was regarded as the only route. Sir Ian MacGregor, when chairman of British Steel, said that there was no future for electric melting because electricity costs would never be sufficiently low to make it viable. Indeed, subsequently when he went to the National Coal Board he stated that electricity generation costs would always militate against electric melting. That is a great pity.

If my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench are considering the future of the steel corporation as a privatised entity, they must consider it alongside what I hope will also be a powerful supporter of that entity, namely, a privatised electricity business——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Yes, but I hope not this afternoon.

Mr. McNair-Wilson: The new clause cannot provide the assurances that Opposition Members seek. Despite the fact that we all share the same desire for a successful corporation in future, no guarantees can be given from the Front Bench.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): I hope that the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) will not mind my saying that I found his contribution bizarre. The gist seemed to be that, because plants had been closed in the past in order to retain a viable steel industry, we should now sanction the closure of a steel plant which is viable at present and which would have a fully profitable future if the new clause were accepted. The hon. Gentleman almost seemed to say that we should sanction the closure of Ravenscraig as an act of vengeance for the ruthlessness of the British Steel Corporation in the past.

At least the hon. Gentleman's speech had the merit of clarity. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) seemed to suffer under so many misapprehensions that it would be impossible to correct them, but perhaps I could try to correct one or two. For the record, the red rose is not the monopoly of England. If his knowledge of Scottish poetry is as deep as his knowledge of Scottish history, he has probably been taught that Robbie Burns wrote that his love was like a red, red thistle. The red rose was the subject of that particular poem.

The hon. Gentleman seemed to suffer from a misapprehension on three other occasions. He seemed to think that we were arguing for a Scottish steel industry. At no stage in or outside Committee, or in or outside the House, have any of us argued for a Scottish steel industry; nor do we argue for one in the new clause. Similarly, the hon. Gentleman seemed to be under the impression that in the new clause we were arguing for protection for Ravenscraig. The clause merely asks that a rational, viable and cold look be taken at all the options. This is not merely a protection clause for Ravenscraig, although that is one element in the reasoning behind the new clause.

The hon. Gentleman seems to have left the Chamber, but at least he can read my comments in Hansard. Even if this were a protection clause for Ravenscraig, given the choice between a protection clause for Ravenscraig and a protection clause for City investors, I would have to choose the former, and I am sure that my hon. Friends from Scotland would do the same.

Mr. Devlin: My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) has had to leave the Chamber temporarily to meet a Cabinet Minister and he will return shortly, but I am taking note of all the hon. Gentleman's comments so that I can pass them to my hon. Friend when he returns.

Dr. Reid: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will explain the points to his hon. Friend slowly and in single syllables so that his future contributions may be slightly more enlightening than the one he made today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) outlined in considerable detail the reasons why the Government would be wise, politically and commercially, to reconsider the future configuration of the steel industry. His reasons included consumer satisfaction, competition and national interest. There are 58,500 other reasons why the Government should reconsider—the constituents I represent. I wish that the Secretary of State for Scotland was in the Chamber to hear our combined reasons and to listen to the debate. I cannot think of a more important debate for the industrial future of Scotland in recent years, yet the Secretary of State is prominent by his absence. Why he should be absent is a mystery to me. So far as I am aware, there are no cup finals in Scotland today, but no doubt he has business that he considers more important than the future of Ravenscraig.

For my constituents and their families, this is perhaps the most important debate held in the Chamber for many years. Moreover, it is vital to millions of people in Scotland who live far from my constituency or, indeed, Lanarkshire and have no direct interest in the steel industry. Today we are simply concerned about the survival of the largest industrial entity in Scotland—the Ravenscraig steel plant.

My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South has said today as well as in Committee that there are no easy options. We do not expect unanimity on the Conservative Benches, or even on these Benches, on future solutions on configurations. The task is difficult. There are conflicting interests between political parties and within them. There are differing interests of employees at different plants, as there are between managements and product groups.

I pointed out in Committee that the major steel plant in my constituency is the Clydeside tube works, which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster knows well. That has been suffering because North Sea oil-related work has been falling as the ratio of the pound to the dollar has changed in a direction adverse to the commercial prospects of the works. For all those reasons, the works has been operating at a loss.

Objectively, at first sight, it would in the interests of those who work in the plant, many of whom are my constituents, as the plant lies at the heart of my constituency, to support the privatisation of BSC as a single entity. But that view is greatly over-simplified and very dangerous, and it is the reason why I support my hon. Friend's new clause.

We are discussing nothing less than the future of the Ravenscraig steel plant. Unless the new clause is accepted by the Government, and if the Government go ahead with privatisation of BSC as a single entity, as they seem intent on doing, all the history of BSC and all the evidence that I have seen—although I am not privy to the information seen by Ministers, nor have they been inclined to reveal it to me or other hon. Members—suggests that the closure of Ravenscraig is on the cards.

Closure will not come immediately, of course. Commercial considerations will prevent an early closure of Ravenscraig, and political considerations will be involved as well. It will not do for Ministers, especially those at the Scottish Office, to allow the closure of the Craig so quickly after they have washed their hands of responsibility for the Scottish steel industry. Closure will be done very tastefully, and existing plans for the industry, including the Scottish industry, will first be passed to the private sector. Then a respectable period will elapse during which the Government can clearly indicate that they have severed for ever the ties binding them to the industry.

After a respectable period, after political honour has been satisfied and when commercial considerations, above all profit, demand it, Ravenscraig will be closed. Perhaps closure will not happen all at once but will be achieved by the infamous "salami tactics"—slice by slice, section by section—but the ultimate outcome will be closure, dictated by profits and implemented by private management and sanctioned from the safety of her bunker in Downing street by a Prime Minister who, given her political responsibility, has been reluctant so far to sanction such a closure. Today is the Government's last chance to avoid that disastrous development.

I regret to say that, from the evidence of today's debate, the Government still do not want to grasp that opportunity. On the basis of all the evidence that I have seen, I believe that privatisation of the British Steel Corporation as a single entity will mean ultimately the closure of Ravenscraig. Every person in my constituency will be affected. I will not ask workers in the tubes division to safeguard their future by being signatories to the death warrant of the Ravenscraig steel plant; nor will any reasonable person with the future of Lanarkshire and the Scottish industry near his heart.

5.15 pm

If the new clause is not accepted, my constituents who work in the tubes division will be asked to participate in an act of industrial murder, which will prove in the long run to be industrial suicide. Despite objective evidence, who can doubt that if BSC in its privatised form comes for Ravenscraig in the early 1990s, it will not be long thereafter that it comes for DL Clydesdale, Imperial and Clydebridge, the remaining rump of the Scottish steel industry.

Two facts motivate our concern and the new clause. Anyone with even a passing acquaintanceship with the Scottish steel industry knows from bitter experience that the Ravenscraig steel plant has long been a target for closure by BSC's management. The battle for Ravenscraig did not start today and does not end today with this debate. It has been fought at the plant, in the press, and in the communities of Lanarkshire. The argument has been paraded almost constantly, it must seem to Ministers, through the streets of Glasgow and Lanarkshire and it has been carried through the snow from the gates of Gartcosh to the barriers at the end of Downing street. It is an argument for survival.

Over the past few years, workers in the Lanarkshire steel industry, particularly at Ravenscraig, have waged that battle for survival. They fought, not using the traditional weapons of industrial action but by almost unparalleled feats of production. Their efforts have won acclaim from every shade of opinion in Scotland, from plant floor workers, to the churches, community groups, management and trade unions; up to now, ministerial support has come from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and from the Scottish Office.

Those of us who raise the issues today do so after long thought and consideration. On occasions we have been accused of talking down Ravenscraig or of having almost a death wish about the plight of the Scottish steel industry. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Nobody who lives, as I and my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) do, in the midst of a community that is dependent on the Ravenscraig steel plant would want anything other than a prosperous and healthy future for the plant. But the history of the BSC's imagined ambitions to close Ravenscraig in the past is the first factor that motivates us. The second is speculation about BSC's intentions. By its very nature, it is far more speculative than the history that we can read.

We have been denied access to information in order to reach that judgment, but we are eternally grateful to Motherwell district council for having financed a study, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South referred earlier. The study was carried out by Arthur Young and Company, which is not a Left-wing think tank, but a company with sound commercial credentials and an impeccable reputation in the City and City affairs. Its conclusions must be taken seriously, and they can be stated starkly.

They are that, if the Government proceed with privatisation of BSC as a single entity, first, it will not be in the interests of BSC as a commercial enterprise to keep Ravenscraig open beyond 1991. Secondly, it will not be in the interests of BSC to keep DL open beyond 1994. Thirdly, 11,000 jobs will be lost in Scotland, mainly in and around Motherwell. Fourthly, the loss of income to Scotland will be about £100 million. Those conclusions, even the possibility of those conclusions, demand a more urgent and constructive response from the Government than has been forthcoming so far, because they constitute nothing less than a national industrial disaster for the Scottish economy.

It is no use Ministers harping back to the so-called guarantees of 3 December. I said at the time that those guarantees of steel in our time were as legitimate as Chamberlain's guarantees of "peace in our time". They will not guarantee the future prosperity of the steel industry. They were a timetable for the execution of the steel industry in Scotland. There was a symmetry of cold and almost poetic logic in the timetable set out by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 3 December—legislation in 1988, flotation in 1989, amputation of the Craig in 1990 and termination in 1994. If that timetable were allowed to proceed, and if BSC is privatised as suggested, the social and economic effects on my constituency and on Scottish industry will be disastrous.

I conclude in the spirit in which my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South moved the new clause. We are not here to score party points, and we do not intend to be provocative. We do not ask the Government to prejudge the matter, as some hon. Members have suggested. We merely ask them to abandon prejudgment and prejudice. We ask the Government to leave the door ajar for further reasoned and rational decision-making. We ask them further to consider alternative offers and to encourage such offers. Above all, we ask them to accept the avenue that the new clause provides for combining the implementation of their privatisation plans with the security of our industry. If that offer is accepted, it will certainly benefit the Scottish steel industry and people in my constituency. If the Government reject it, they will find that there is no hiding place if Ravenscraig eventually closes. There will be no political get-outs or management scapegoats. The decision and the responsibility will be theirs. Neither today nor then will they be allowed to avoid that responsibility to the people of Scotland.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I speak on behalf of all my Welsh Opposition colleagues when I make it plain at the outset that we do not agree with the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell option. We in Wales are concerned, in the context of the RSD implications drawn from the structure of the new clause, that splitting-off the finishing plants of BSC from the hot metal production plants will open up the equivalent of Pandora's box. In the steel industry world-wide money is made, not at the steel production end, but at the finishing end. The last thing that we want to encourage is the idea that the finishing end, such as the tinplate or coating divisions, should be split off from the hot metal end, whether at Ravenscraig or in the two south Wales strip mills at Port Talbot and Llanwern. We want to avoid that. We do not want finishing mills to be sold off separately as the most profitable parts of BSC's operations. We do not want that possibility even to be considered, although it might be attractive to the local management of BSC in those areas and to people in the City who might want to back them.

In amendments Nos. 31 and 32 we question whether the structure of BSC should continue into privatisation without further consideration. I want to continue in the spirit of the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and by the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) and try to discuss the affairs of the steel industry in the way in which people in it do when talking among themselves. One thinks of people who have finished their shifts and have gone for a pint discussing the industry, or people on the management side of the industry discussing it with their professional advisers.

What is the proper and best future for the steel industry? We are trying to see whether we can improve the Bill. We have said that we are not keen on it and do not like it. We are attempting to persuade the Government that the Bill could be improved by slicing off the parts of BSC over which it no longer has any management control. That makes sense, because Ministers have so far not examined closely the fact that the nationalisation of the industry took place in two ways, as the hon. Member for New Forest said.

The main part of the industry was nationalised in 1967, but there was a considerable hidden wave of second nationalisation, in the Phoenix programme between 1979 and 1981, when orders in the steel industry fell off the edge of a cliff, as they said in those days, and when the creation of single-capacity companies, where previously there had been competition between BSC and the private sector, took place on a substantial scale. Some private sector competitors disappeared altogether. Duport in Llanelli was bought out by Mr. MacGregor in 1980-81 and was closed down. There was the merger of the rod and bar interests of GKN and BSC and the formation of Allied Steel and Wire in 1981. The following year—or a few years later—United Engineering Steels was formed, and Sheffield Forgemasters and the other Phoenix companies followed.

That was the second wave of nationalisation, which absorbed much of the competitive structure under which the private sector had competed with BSC, and the reason for it was that conditions in the industry were appalling between 1979 and 1981. Energy prices were far too high, the pound was far too high, and demand was low. So it was a matter of who would survive the holocaust, and single capacity working was chosen as the only method of procuring any sort of survival. Considerations of competition did not enter into it.

Now the Government must consider whether they need to undo the nationalisation of the industry as though it had all taken place in one fell swoop in 1967, or whether they should consider undoing it as it actually took place, which was in two stages—the original nationalisation, and the Phoenix nationalisation with the consequent elimination of competition in the areas in which even in 1967 it had been thought right to preserve competition between GKN, Johnson and Firth Brown and other private steel companies such as Duport and BSC.

We are asking the Government to remove from the successor company the right to inherit the minority shareholdings that it has because of the Phoenix mergers that took place between 1980 and when the last Phoenix company was formed in about 1983. We ask them to give serious consideration to whether those minority shareholdings—sometimes they are as much as 50 per cent., but in Allied Steel and Wire they have shrunk to 20 per cent.—should be separated and denationalised separately, or held by the Government. We could discuss that matter at a later stage. Should BSC be granted the right to hang on to those minority, or up to 50 per cent., shareholdings?

Accepting these amendments would introduce an area of clean competition between BSC and Allied Steel and Wire. They do not always necessarily compete in steel products, although they do in one or two. In the main, they compete in the end use—in the construction industry. As the hon. Member for New Forest said, they compete because of the competition between the electric arc production method and the blast furnace and basic oxygen method.

[Mr. Rhodri Morgan]

It is a healthy thing for the consumer to know that the Allied Steel and Wires of this world are competing flat out against the BSCs by pitting the best of the electric arc technologies in the world against the best BOS vessel technologies, without BSC having the extra leg that would stifle competition—the leg of knowing exactly the prices that Allied Steel and Wire was negotiating for its electrodes, scrap and so on. That is healthier for the consumer, and it is the way to keep imports down and produce a clean flotation of the industry. It would remove the octupus-like hold that BSC would have, because of its minority shareholdings in the Phoenix companies, on the new companies that are being created, which will shortly be floated themselves. It is suspected that Allied Steel and Wire will be floated in three or four weeks' time.

What could be healthier for the consumer of steel, for the workers in the industry and for its management than to know that BSC and ASW—and later UES, when it is floated—are competing against one another, not knowing the prices the others are paying for raw materials, the technological developments that they have up their sleeves, or the investment plans of their competitors? What could be worse for management and the work force of Allied Steel and Wire than knowing that every new investment and technological advance and every new negotiated price reduction will be known before they can be made use of, through the nominee directors that BSC will have on the board of Allied Steel and Wire? Is that healthy for the consumer? I do not think that it is.

Above all, it would not only produce a healthier climate for competition and keep down imports, but would have a beneficial effect. If the 20 per cent. shareholding which BSC holds in Allied Steel and Wire were transferred at any time of the Government's choosing before BSC is floated, early next year or later this year, into an employees' trust fund for the employees of Allied Steel and Wire, it would encourage the workers and management of Allied Steel and Wire to buy shares in the company to ensure that the company stayed independent of BSC.

5.30 pm

The Government have agreed in principle to provide a golden share type of protection for the British Steel Corporation. During the period of five years, or whatever time the Government have in mind for a golden share for BSC, the corporation might try to make a clean sweep of the Phoenix companies. It may decide to make a takeover bid for Allied Steel and Wire or for United Engineering Steels. That would do away almost completely with competition within the United Kingdom. There would still be a few companies, such as Sheerness, the ownership of which is outside the country, which would be independent, but in the main it would demolish competition within the country. Indeed, by insisting on the golden share provision, we would protect BSC and make it easier for it to do that, unless a golden share is given for the same period for the Phoenix private sector companies.

The 20 per cent. share stake in BSC being held by the Government in an employees' trust fund for the employees of Allied Steel and Wire, with comparable arrangements for United Engineering Steels and so forth, will encourage workers to have shareholdings. It will also double as a golden share to protect Allied Steel and Wire from being taken over by BSC, with disastrous effects for competition, steel consumers and the level of imports. That is why I ask the Government to think seriously before they dismiss the amendments. They would be healthy for the industry and would reflect the way in which the industry was originally nationalised. They would make a genuine improvement to the Bill.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I am pleased to support the new clause. It is modest in its intent, asking merely for a quantitative estimate of the economics of a competitive privatisation of British Steel. However, it has been enough to expose ambiguities in the Government's position. It has also exposed ambiguities in the position of the Labour party, but I shall leave that to one side for the moment.

Mr. Maxton: I do not wish to go too deeply into what the hon. Gentleman may say later about the so-called divisions in the Labour party, but his party is in alliance with the Welsh nationalist party, Plaid Cymru. I am interested in the fact that no members of that party are present. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can give us the views of Plaid Cymru on the RSD proposal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) should give his own views.

Mr. Salmond: I shall certainly do that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Neither we nor Plaid Cymru are in favour of the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell option. I am amazed that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) does not know that. We argued for an integrated steel industry in Scotland. Of course, the question has been asked many times whether the Labour party Front Bench is in favour of the RSD option, which has been argued so forcefully by Labour Back Benchers. That is a legitimate question to put to the Labour party; it has not been answered. Ambiguities on Labour's position have also been illustrated by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan).

But I want to leave the divisions in the Labour party to one side for a moment and explore the ambiguities in the Government's position. On Friday last, I made the mistake of switching on the television and seeing the Conservative party conference in Scotland. One speaker —I forget who; it may have been the Minister of State —in an eminently forgettable speech, was putting forward one argument which had an element of sense. The argument was that the process of nationalisation had removed from the Scottish economy key areas of decision making. That was a legitimate criticism of nationalisation. It is not a criticism of public sector control in itself, but it is a legitimate criticism of the process of nationalisation as it took place in the 1950s and 1960s.

We might think that it also shows the extraordinary cheek of a party which has privatised the TSB and Britoil and has shown how privatisation can remove control from the Scottish economy. None the less, it was a substantial point which was made at the Conservative party conference in Scotland. Given that the Government have the opportunity to reverse the process in the privatisation of British Steel and the opportunity through privatisation to restore management control to Scotland, it is all the more surprising that they do not take it. Here we see the first major ambiguity in the position of the Conservative party in Scotland. The only conclusion can be that the Scottish Office is taking its orders, as usual, from south of the border.

The second ambiguity exposed by the new clause concerns the attitude to the competitive market environment. I am a member of the Select Committee on Energy where we are discussing the privatisation of electricity, a major utility. There are grave problems about introducing competition into the transmission and delivery of electricity. However, the Conservative members of the Committee and the Ministers who have appeared before it insist that, whatever else happens in the privatisation, competition must be introduced. Is it not all the more curious that, in the privatisation of the steel industry, where it would be much simpler to introduce domestic competition than in the electricity supply industry, the Conservative party should abandon that principle and go for monopolistic privatisation? It is a curious ambiguity, which cannot be defended on principle. There are only the poorest arguments for sending the steel industry into the private sector as a monopolistic entity.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) is not still here. I can only assume that the important meeting with a Cabinet Minister is a meeting with the Secretary of State for Scotland. That would explain the absence of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen from the debate. Perhaps the hon. Member for Darlington is giving the Secretary of State for Scotland his weekly economics lecture and is telling him what to say in Scotland next week.

If the hon. Member for Darlington had been here, I would have put it to him that it is the most elementary point of free market economics that there should be no monopolistic behaviour. Of course, if British Steel is sent into the private sector as a single unit, it will restrict output and maximise profitability. It is incredible that the hon. Member for Darlington should have ignored that point.

If British Steel is sent into the private sector unencumbered, the entrenched hostility of British Steel senior management to the Ravenscraig complex will come to the fore, without any protection of the public interest. The Chancellor of the Duchy is fond of saying that this fear exists in the minds of Opposition parties and that we talk down the Ravenscraig complex. But that view is generally held. For example, it is held by the Scottish Council (Development and Industry). Recently, the Chancellor of the Duchy made some complimentary references to that body which by no means can be described as a party politically oriented body in Scotland.

In March, in reference to the dangers of sending British Steel into the private sector as a single entity, the council said:

> "On track record, it is reasonable to assume that a single company operated in the private sector and thereafter not subject to public control would close Ravenscraig Works at an early stage. The adverse effects on the Scottish economy have already been well documented. Closure would also jeopardise the delivered price of steel in Scotland from other sources, because of loss of the basing point which is used in the price formula."

That quote from the Scottish Council encapsulates the real fears on the conclusion of any serious examination of the likely future of the Scottish steel industry under the Government's proposed privatisation. We also recognise the important point made by the Scottish Council, that the closure of Ravenscraig would not just be a matter of the enormous direct loss of 11,000 jobs, and £100 million in output, but it would have a continuing impact on the Scottish economy because the loss of the basing point would affect many steel using industries throughout the length and breadth of Scotland.

The fears for Ravenscraig are real, and not just the fears of entrenched political interests. They are shared by many impartial bodies in Scotland, and the Government have done nothing whatever to allay the fears. No hon. Member has made the case for an integrated steel industry in Scotland as the best possible option. I should like to make that case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not seek to make that case while discussing this new clause.

Mr. Salmond: The case for how the industry should be competitively privatised is the subject matter of this new clause.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot be reading the new clause that I have before me, because it says:

> "Before the appointed day the Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament a report giving quantitative estimates".

I fail to see how that would justify the kind of argument that the hon. Gentleman is seeking to advance, and I hope that he will not persist.

Mr. Salmond: One of the important estimates that I expect to see the Government produce if this new clause is accepted is about the real possibility of an integrated steel industry in Scotland. It should be central to the debate on this clause——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems that there is a difference of opinion between the hon. Gentleman and me, and on this occasion my opinion will prevail. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to the new clause.

Mr. Salmond: The new clause would certainly prevent what would be the worst of all possible situations—the sending of the steel industry unencumbered into the private sector, unrestrained by the public interest, in so far as that is recognised in Scotland by the Government, and unrestrained by the force of competition in the market place. The new clause will test whether the Government believe in a free market or a rigged market in the Scottish economy. If the Government refuse to accept the new clause, they may well be signing the death warrant of Ravenscraig. If that happens, Scotland will sign the death warrant of the Conservative party.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): The Opposition have said a number of times that this is the wrong solution for the British steel industry. We have to work on the premise that a better solution exists and that the British Steel Corporation should stay in the public sector. If we accept the argument that it is a central, important and vital industry, then only in the public sector can it get the protection that it deserves.

We are considering the privatisation of this industry well ahead of schedule; further ahead than the Minister told us after the election. We know that there is a gap in the legislative programme and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with all his difficulties, needs more of the loot that comes from privatisation, and that BSC falls neatly into that category. This is an important and balanced debate in which we are considering one of the more serious and important issues in politics. It did not require much vision to see at the weekend how important even the Prime Minister now considers the Scottish dimension to be to her own political future.

It was fascinating to watch the Conservative party in Scotland going through a disastrous general election and then an even more disastrous series of local elections only a fortnight ago and then the Prime Minister came to Perth and spent a weekend in Scotland. It was an incredible set of experiences. The Glasgow garden festival was granted three hours of the Prime Minister's time, and Hampden park was graced with her presence for lunch. The large crowd at Hampden park found that she was there to present trophies at the end of the game. It is a matter of some pride to us that she now feels it sufficiently important to come to Scotland and to be troubled about the fortunes of her party.

5.45 pm

Those who examine the way in which the Conservative party treats Scotland—and people do not have to be terribly perceptive to do that—will have noticed a considerable difference in attitude from previous occasions. When the Prime Minister came to Scotland at the weekend she did not tell us, as the Conservatives have told us in the past, that we were a bunch of whingeing no-gooders, supplicants at the public purse. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) is the main script writer for the Prime Minister and other Ministers. This time we were told that Scotland was the birthplace of Adam Smith, that he was the precursor of Thatcherism and that we were to be congratulated on producing that philosophy. We were told that Scotland was the base for silicon glen, that it represented all that was best in the country and that only the small aberration in Scotland's voting pattern set it apart from the rest of the United Kingdom. Anyone who watched on television the penguin parade of political casualties in Perth could have been mistaken for thinking that the Conservatives had had two triumphs instead of two disasters there.

It is important to remind ourselves that Scottish politics are important in the national context and that the debate on the new clause could not be more relevant. In my constituency the largest employer is the Ravenscraig steel works, which is based in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray). I do not think that any hon. Member who has participated in the debate considers the future of Ravenscraig as a constituency matter or, indeed, as a simple, parochial west of Scotland or even Scottish interest. We are concerned about the importance of Ravenscraig and about the importance of a balanced steel industry to the British economy. At times Conservative Members, and even Ministers, have been willing to admit that that is a fact of life.

We all rightly feel inhibited about talking down the fortunes of Ravenscraig and the associated steel works in Scotland. I concede that that is a danger. If we speak often enough, and regularly enough, about the dangers to Ravenscraig and to Scottish steel, the argument will take on an inevitability that might bring the disaster that we continue to predict. My hon. Friends the Members for Motherwell, South and for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) are aware of that in this debate, as they have been in every other debate that has taken place.

We are interested, not in milking Ravenscraig, but in boosting it. We do not want to criticise it. We want to give due credit to its work force and management, who over the past 10 to 15 years have made it one of the most efficient, profitable and effective contributors to the European steel industry. That is certainly not knocking Ravenscraig. To draw attention to the dangers facing Ravenscraig, both under the Government and, perhaps more acutely, under the non-political leadership of the present management of BSC, is not knocking or criticising Ravenscraig, but is simply pointing out a basic fact of life that Ministers will have to take on board.

Much has been made in the debate of the assurances that have been given to Ravenscraig, and I have no doubt that the Minister will tell us about those. We have been told regularly how important those assurances are, and Ministers have mentioned periods of seven years and two years. They have told us that these are greater guarantees than have ever been given by any previous Government. These guarantees exist on paper, but the moment a guarantee is given people ask about what will happen at the end of the guarantee period.

The Government have a political reason for keeping Ravenscraig open. If the Prime Minister's eyes have been opened sufficiently so that she can walk through the streets of Glasgow with the same fearlessness as she displayed last year when she walked through the streets of Tbilisi in Georgia, she is beginning to learn the lesson that the Scottish people have been trying to teach her for at least the last five years. Perhaps Ministers have taken on board the importance of Ravenscraig to Scotland and the importance of Scotland to the United Kingdom as a whole.

As Ministers have now realised how difficult it would be in political terms to take a decision that would rob the steel industry of Ravenscraig, they are about to pass the industry into the hands of people whose motives are even more suspect and who are even more remote from political accountability than Ministers with only 10 Members of Parliament behind them.

I make no attack on Sir Robert Scholey and the senior BSC management. They have done an extremely good job and have produced for the Government an extremely profitable industry which is now so attractive that it is being handed over to them on a plate. Sir Robert Scholey is a man of considerable esteem. Indeed, when I left university 20 years ago I was offered a job at the United Steel Company, which was the main launch pad for Sir Robert Scholey and the group that presently runs British Steel. Given different circumstances, who knows where I might now have been in that organisation.

I make no criticism of the management's competence. They have said openly that the British Steel Corporation and British Steel plc would be leaner, fitter and more competitive in the general European context in which they believe they must operate if there were one fewer integrated steel works. They make no bones about which one they would like to see go.

The Government will now hand the stewardship of British Steel into the hands of that group. It is right for and perceptive of our constituents and the wider community in Scotland to be deeply suspicious about the future of Ravenscraig, given the declared views of the individuals who will be in charge of British Steel. It is normal to be suspicious. It is not an aberration to be suspicious of those who will take the decisions in the future. We should not take it as part of a gigantic conspiracy. Those suspicions have due foundations and Ministers should take them on board and should not, for their own political skins, dare to dismiss them as the frivolous rantings of the people who represent those areas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South introduced the new clause as a form of enabling provision that would allow the Government, consistent with their ideological fixations, to put forward alternatives within which competition could take place and accountability could be measured. The Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell plan is on the table as an example of a method by which competition could be achieved and Ravenscraig perhaps safeguarded, but there are other alternatives.

Strathclyde regional council's industrial development committee has written to the Minister suggesting the possibility of a British Airports Authority-type solution, with different components within the single denationalised organisation. The Government should give balanced consideration to that proposal. It is not designed simply to safeguard Ravenscraig. It has been designed within the context of the Government's objectives for the British Steel Corporation to ensure a degree of internal competition that would perhaps stimulate management, as Ministers believed that the BAA solution would for that organisation. If it is good enough for that, we should not simply consider a monolithic transfer from public ownership to private monopoly ownership. In fairness, Ministers should consider other alternatives, and the new clause would provide the basis for that.

The many thousands of my constituents in Lanarkshire employed at the Ravenscraig steel works do not ask for special treatment. They are not interested in giving the hon. Member for Darlington and his Right-wing cronies the idea that they are coming with a begging bowl to the Treasury, the Department of Trade and Industry—or the Department of Enterprise—looking for a lifeline or a permanent subsidy. They want recognition of the achievements at Ravenscraig over the past few years. They want an appreciation of the fact that the Scottish steel industry has been transformed out of all recognition and is now one of the finest in Europe. They want that protected and continued in the future. That is a modest enough request to make of the Government. If the Government choose to decline or ignore that request, they will not be lightly forgiven.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) is obviously well qualified to speak in this debate with his constituency interest and background in the steel industry, about which I was intrigued to hear for the first time. The mind boggles at the thought of the hon. Gentleman perhaps moving on, if he had pursued a career in the industry, to become chairman of the British Steel Corporation. He would probably have found himself doing a more valuable job than being a Front-Bench spokesman for the Labour party, however competent he may be at the job, unless his party performs better in the near future. If he had had a continuing direct interest in the steel business from a management point of view, I doubt whether he would have made the speech that he has just made about the possible future configuration of the industry.

I should like to deal with amendments Nos. 31 and 32, in the name of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), who was concerned about the position of Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. He chose a timely day to put forward an amendment about that company because its flotation was announced this morning. The purpose of the amendments is to seek to persuade the House that the Government should take away the 20 per cent. owned by British Steel and make it a Government stake, albeit held in trust for the benefit of the employees of Allied Steel and Wire Ltd.

I listened with care to the comments of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West. He was mainly concerned to protect Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. from what he perceived to be a threat to the future independence and commercial freedom of the company from the British Steel Corporation with its minority holding. I have no reason to believe that Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. is threatened by the BSC in the way that he suggests and I am certainly not persuaded by what he said about allowing the Government to have, in effect, a golden share in a company that has been in the private sector for some years. We shall deal with special or golden shares in the privatised BSC on a later amendment, but the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to know that we are not tempted by the idea of taking a special share in a wholly private sector company, albeit one in which BSC has a minority holding.

I am attracted by the idea that the employees of Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. should have a stake in the company. Once again, the hon. Gentleman's chosen method, contained in amendment No. 32—in effect, to give a fifth of the company to the employees—is generous, but it goes over the top somewhat. Most of the employees already have a stake in the company. Most of them own shares in the company, and I trust that many of them will take the opportunity to increase their holding as a result of today's flotation. Generosity would be taken considerably further by, in effect, taking a fifth of the company away from British Steel and holding it solely for the benefit of the work force. We do not need to go so far in worker participation.

Mr. Morgan: I apologise to the Minister for having missed the beginning of his speech. I was in the Lobby reading his Department's press release regarding the new special share and employee share arrangements, as it had just been handed to me by a journalist. [Interruption.] I had not read beyond the seventh line when I was interrupted and told that the Minister had started his speech, but perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) would care to look at it.

Would the Minister take a more generous view of our amendment if he understood it to mean that the transfer from the Government holding to an employee holding could take place gradually over a number of years and involve employees paying for their shares through arrangements, which could be discussed in detail, to maximise the employees' holding in the company?

Mr. Clarke: I welcome the hon. Gentleman back to the Chamber. I can see no case for removing the 20 per cent. minority holding from the British Steel Corporation. I do not share the hon. Gentleman's fears about the way in which the BSC may use that holding with regard to Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. I also believe that there is already an adequate employee stake in the company. I heard what the hon. Gentleman said, but, as amendment No. 32 stands, there is no provision for the payment for those shares and

[Mr. Clarke]

I do not find the proposition any more attractive after the hon. Gentleman's comments. The flotation that has been announced today should be allowed to proceed. I do not believe that the company's position will be jeopardised if it proceeds without the benefit of amendment No. 32.

6 pm

Dr. Reid: Does the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster consider that there are merits in the case advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), particularly as the Chancellor said that his major objection was that, although he was not opposed to it in principle, the proposed formulation was too generous? Is it really too generous to give those workers a 20 per cent. share in the company when he is writing off the public debt and writing down the public dividend capital of the BSC by almost a half or even more before gifting it to the City? In comparison to that write-off, does not my hon. Friend's proposal lack generosity?

Mr. Clarke: With respect, the hon. Gentleman is making a false comparison. Although the hon. Member for Cardiff, West has rather spontaneously tried to modify his first proposition, on its face value amendment No. 32 involves removing a 20 per cent. holding of the BSC in Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. and giving it to the employees. That 20 per cent. holding has a substantial financial value which will emerge as flotation proceeds.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) has made a false comparison about what is proposed for the future financial structure of the privatised BSC. We are not writing down debt. We are ensuring that the new privatised company has a balance sheet that reflects its present-day position. We are coping with the accumulated losses that have appeared on the balance sheet from years past when the corporation unfortunately traded at a very heavy loss. There is no cash involved in that and we are not writing off real money. The books will take account of the fact that, unfortunately, during the years of nationalisation the BSC lost a great deal of money on its trading account. That money still lies on the books, and obviously it cannot stay there if the company is to be privatised successfully.

We started this debate discussing new clause 1. We have had a particularly discursive discussion during which no particular theme has emerged, despite the fact that the vast majority of those who spoke were Opposition Members —Labour Members, Liberal Members or Scottish nationalists. That lack of theme has occurred because no one really agreed with the underlying purpose of new clause 1.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) is the prime advocate of the so-called Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell proposal. He made it clear that he sees the proposal as one way of getting hold of more factual information which he hoped might support his proposition.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, and other Labour Members, out of a sense of courtesy, did not directly contradict the hon. Member for Motherwell, South. The hon. Member for Dagenham seemed to imply that he almost supported the new clause in so far as it was a technical matter asking for a report and some information. However, it became clear that no one really supports the underlying aim of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South.

The hon. Member for Dagenham confirmed that he believes that the BSC should remain a single entity. He is no more attracted by the idea of breaking up the BSC, either in the public or in the private sector, than Conservative Members. It is wrong to believe that there is widespread support for the idea of different configurations. I hope to reveal that it is wrong to believe that the future of Ravenscraig will benefit from vaguely floating ideas that one might restructure the company and privatise it as two companies which, in effect, is what the hon. Member for Motherwell, South was advocating.

Mr. Gould: I am certain that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is sufficiently intelligent to understand that a single entity in public ownership is a different proposition from a single entity in private ownership. That is essentially the point that we have made. It is also the point of new clause 1. Of course we support new clause 1 in the sense that it provides a straightforward and unobjectionable mechanism whereby the Government can learn and then inform Parliament about the basis on which they will reach a decision on the form that the British steel industry should take in private ownership. That seems to be a very modest request and the simplest of requirements of good government in that area.

Mr. Clarke: I will consider what I believe to be wrong with the mechanism in a moment. Before the hon. Gentleman retreats and considers new clause 1 as a purely technical amendment after he and his Labour colleagues have spent two and a half hours debating the issue, I want to state that, of course, I understand the difference between a single entity in public ownership and one in private ownership. I accept that the hon. Gentleman would prefer it to remain in public ownership. I remain quite convinced—and the hon. Gentleman has never contradicted me—that, if it is to be privately owned, the hon. Gentleman prefers it to be a single entity.

It is obvious that that is the view of all Labour Members, apart from the hon. Member for Motherwell, South, who continues to advocate what I regard to be a complete red herring—namely, the so-called Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell proposal.

Dr. Reid rose——

Mr. Clarke: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, North underlined the fact that the hon. Member for Motherwell, South is not putting forward a truly Scottish option. The hon. Member for Motherwell, North rightly explained that Clydesdale is not included in his hon. Friend's proposal.

The Ravenscraig-Dalzell-Shotton option is not entirely Scottish. To make it a credible proposition, the hon. Member for Motherwell, South must try to annex Shotton, which is in Wales, to the other Scottish interests. I know that Arthur Young's report stated that the headquarters of the new entity might be situated in Wales. As we have heard from the hon. Member for Cardiff, West, that does very little to assuage Welsh fears, because no one in Wales or in the BSC outside Motherwell sees the slightest future in the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell proposal, which is the underlying aim of the new clause. That proposal is a complete red herring in the wider debate.

Dr. Reid: Neither my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) nor I, or anyone else, has ever claimed that the proposal is motivated by nationalism or national sentiment. The configuration has been put forward on the basis of industrial sense and commercial viability. It is a red herring to suggest that somehow that shows a lack of support, because we have never claimed it as a Scottish option. For the record, I want to correct the Minister. I support my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South and his proposal. Even if we stand in splendid isolation, if the proposal offers a solution for the long-term security of Ravenscraig, I am proud to support the proposal.

Mr. Salmond rose——

Mr. Clarke: It seems that the proposal has the support of the hon. Member for Motherwell, North and it appears that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) is about to volunteer his support as well. However, the hon. Member for Cardiff, West opposes the proposal and the hon. Member for Dagenham will not say what he thinks. I want to consider what I believe is wrong with the idea of privatising British steel other than through a single entity.

Mr. Salmond rose——

Mr. Clarke: It is always a mistake to guess at the grievances of the Scottish nationalists. I had better hear what they are.

Mr. Salmond: As the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is aware, I should be delighted to set out the Scottish option if I am allowed to do so. With regard to the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell option, the Minister must not invest in the new clause something which does not exist. If people believe that there should be a non-monopolistic privatisation of the BSC, they are entitled to support new clause 1, whether they believe in the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell option or any other for privatising the BSC. Both I and my party believe in that.

Mr. Clarke: The Government remain convinced that the corporation should be privatised as a single entity. If anyone is suggesting that it should be broken up for privatisation, they are at liberty to put forward the configuration that they would prefer in different companies. As far as I am aware, the Ravenscraig—Shotton—Dalzell configuration is the only one that has ever been suggested. If anyone has some alternative way of dividing the corporation, it has not been advocated this afternoon.

The reason why I believe the corporation should remain as one—and we examined a huge variety of options before taking the decision to come forward last December with the privatisation proposals—is that any change in its shape will dismember an interdependent business—which has been built up very successfully by the management and work force in recent years—which has begun to show considerable commercial success. It would throw the future of all parts of the business into considerable uncertainty and set back the achievement we have seen so far, whereby the last published half-year figures showed £190 million profits. Everybody obviously expects those profits to be maintained.

To divide up the corporation and to cut out of it and privatise the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell operations alone would be extremely difficult. The resulting company would have no kind of track record and its commercial outlook would be uncertain. It would have considerable difficulty in raising investment capital and it would be an extremely weak competitor against the rest of British Steel, let alone competitors in the rest of Europe.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South spoke of the history of what he described as the competition for survival between steel plants, and of the pressures which are placed on Ravenscraig. Competition to reduce costs and increase efficiency is an essential part of the steel business, especially in present circumstances. I do not see how those pressures would be reduced, because the proposed new RSD company would be pitched into difficult competition against the remainder of British Steel and other European competitors.

I believe that such a company would be impossible to float. There are those in Scotland who believe that a type of trade sale to Scottish interests might be arranged. I am doubtful about the prospects of raising any capital for a company having no track record of any kind.

Having listened to the hon. Member for Motherwell, South, who is very erudite and who surrounds his arguments with as much information as he can, I still believe that what has been conceived is a political structure for part of the industry. The origins of the argument centre on fears about Ravenscraig. In order to make a credible configuration for a company that might protect Ravenscraig, there has been devised the notion of Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell as some kind of industrial entity. It is not the Government who are obsessed with the Welsh trade unions, and so on. That configuration has been devised as the best that could be produced—leaving out other parts, because the trade unions are opposed to their inclusion. The hon. Member for Dagenham will not support it because he knows that the Welsh trade unions are against it. Clydesdale Steelworks is not included because the hon. Member for Motherwell, South knows that the Scottish trade unions are against it. It is the Opposition who are getting knotted over the trade unions. They are trying to produce a political structure which they believe will improve their position vis-a-vis Ravenscraig.

The whole history of steel, as of other industries, shows that once one starts making political decisions about the structure of the industry, about where investments should be made, and about the future, the more one causes difficulties, closures and disruption. We believe that privatising British Steel as a single entity is best for British Steel and for all those who work in it.

Dr. Bray: The Minister is quite inaccurate in his claim about the origins of that idea. The first time that I remember hearing about it was—if the Minister insists that I name names—from Jake Stewart, chairman of the flat products group of the British Steel Corporation. It was later argued for in the presence of Bob Scholey by the managing director, who is a Welshman but whose name I momentarily forget.

[Dr. Bray]

6.15 pm

The argument when Gartcosh was being closed was not that Ravenscraig was being robbed of a finishing mill but that the originator was being given a newer, more modern and more diversified finishing mill at Shotton. BSC itself planted the idea and made the point that it was an integral, sensible operating unit.

Mr. Clarke: I shall take that point up with Jake Stewart when next I meet him, if indeed he was the originator. However, Ravenscraig is still supplying Shotton. British Steel, when privatised as a single entity, will continue to have that link between Ravenscraig and Shotton.

Whatever the origin of the suggestion—and I accept that the originator may have been Jake Stewart, as the hon. Gentleman said—it has nevertheless been put forward by the hon. Member for Motherwell, South as a political solution to what he perceives to be the problems of Ravenscraig. He has sought to cloak it with more credibility by citing, for example, the Arthur Young report. What I regret about this debate is that, as it has progressed, it has depended upon an attempt by the hon. Member for Motherwell, South and some of his hon. Friends to continue casting doubts on the assurances that we have given about the future of Ravenscraig. The Arthur Young report seeks to diminish the calculations made by British Steel and its expectations as to the future of Ravenscraig. I do not see the point of doing that.

What ought to be regarded as the best news from the steel industry for people in Scotland for many years is British Steel's commercial estimates of its future steelmaking needs in Scotland. Its best estimate, subject to market conditions—and those are not weasel words; they are essential and sensible words which the management of any corporation would use—was that steelmaking at Ravenscraig would be required for at least another seven years. It followed that the output of the Dalzell plate mill would be required for as long as the output from Ravenscraig continued—another seven years.

That is a much better description of the prospects of an industrial plant than the managers of most industrial plants, north or south of the border, will usually give. The situation will always depend on continued commercial success, continued efficiency, and the kind of efforts which have been achieved by the management and work force at Ravenscraig in the past.

The best estimate is that at least seven years' more steelmaking is required. Beyond seven years, as was rightly pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), everything will depend upon the state of the steel market at the time and on the performance of BSC, including that of Ravenscraig. An underlying myth in much of this debate is that politicians can override those factors and give political guarantees extending beyond seven years—and beyond the best estimates of the British Steel Corporation.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Is it not a fact that but for political guarantees, of which the Secretary of State for Scotland has boasted to the House on many occasions, Ravenscraig would not be there to provide a seven-year guarantee at the time when privatisation was formulated? For Scottish Members of Parliament not to find the Minister's assurance credible is not unreasonable, given that we know what the management of British Steel wanted to do before.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) refers to previous assurances given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland that, again subject to market conditions, three years' output of steel was expected about three years ago. In the present situation, that estimate has improved. The chairman of BSC expects that seven years' output will now be required from Ravenscraig. There are no such things as political guarantees. The history of British industry, particularly during the last Labour Government, shows that when politicians claim that they can, by political undertakings, wave away the dictates of the market and the requirement to be competitive and give guarantees that a particular industrial operation will, come what may, continue, such claims are not worth the paper on which they are written or the voices by which they are uttered.

We have here a much more copper-bottomed reassurance for the people of Ravenscraig. The commercial judgment of those managing the corporation is that the mill will be required to make steel for another seven years. The Opposition are so put out of countenance by the estimates made by the chairman of BSC last autumn that they are trying to fan the flames of fear in Ravenscraig. The Opposition are attempting to imply that the situation is not what it appears to be and is not such a reflection of good performance as I have said. The hon. Members for Motherwell, North and for Mortherwell, South are trying to imply that the privatisation of a separate unit comprising Ravenscraig, Shotton and Dalzell will offer Ravenscraig a better future. I do not believe it. A small splinter company would have a difficult time after being privatised. There would be difficulty in raising the capital and it would be exposed to a much more difficult competitive climate.

Dr. Reid: As the Chancellor wishes to avoid weasel words, let me give him the opportunity to give a straight answer on the commercial guarantee. I ask him for no political guarantee. Is it the right hon. and learned Gentleman's understanding, in accordance with the statement of 3 December and the commercial guarantee, that there is no guarantee of a hot strip mill at Ravenscraig employing 1,200 people beyond 1990? Is that his understanding as well as mine?

Mr. Clarke: The hot strip mill was, as I made clear in December, not included in the forecast of BSC's steel-making requirements. BSC's best commercial estimate is that it will require steel making at Ravenscraig for at least seven years. At the moment it has surplus capacity in the hot strip mill and BSC has made it clear that it will not reconsider its future, or that of any other hot strip mill, until 1989. Beyond that, it depends on the requirements of hot strip.

I see cheery looks from the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), delighted to discover that neither I nor British Steel can give the same guarantee for the hot strip mill. Presumably the Labour party will guarantee four hot strip mills in Britain for seven, 10 or 15 years, whether anybody wants them, regardless of cost, regardless of the advantage that that may give to our overseas competitors and regardless of the cost that that may impose on British steel users. I do not believe it. The Labour party is seeking to imply that it will give a more copper-bottomed guarantee to Ravenscraig about the future of steel making and hot strip. It is not for me to judge, but I do not believe a word of it. It is not within the Labour party's capacity to guarantee the future of steel making, the hot strip mill and everything else at Ravenscraig, regardless of commercial and market considerations.

Dr. Bray: Can the Chancellor name any other works that have survived simply as a slab producer? Will he bear in mind that 70 per cent. of the slabs produced at Ravenscraig go into the hot mill hot. If they have to be transported 250 miles to south Wales before being rolled into hot rolled coil, how can they possibly be hot?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman regards himself as an alternative management for BSC. He spends his entire time lecturing the House and, when he can, BSC's management about the plant's configuration, where the products should and should not be made, where they should be sent, and so on. If I had to choose between the opinion of Bob Scholey and his colleagues on the board and their managers and that of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South, I know which I would prefer.

BSC expects steel making to continue at Ravenscraig for at least seven years. Whether the hot strip mill will continue all that time, we know not. However, BSC has made it clear that it will not close that this side of 1989. The future of Ravenscraig depends on the continued commercial success of the kind that it has achieved so far. The Opposition do not have it within their power to give political guarantees that extend beyond that.

The argument that is being used by those, other than the hon. Members for Motherwell, North and for Motherwell, South, who seek to claim they have a genuine interest in looking at alternative configurations, means that they are worried about our privatising BSC as a monopoly. When that argument is put forward, as it was by the hon. Member for Dagenham, it carries the slight implication that he would therefore contemplate breaking it up, but he never quite acknowledges that.

When talking about the need for competition and whether the privatised BSC might constitute a harmful monopoly, we are principally talking about the interests of consumers as well as those inside BSC. It is necessary to test that argument primarily by looking at the market within which BSC operates. At the very least, it is a European-wide market because we are in the European steel regime. We are not just looking at the United Kingdom market. If we were, the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell argument would not improve things much, because the RSD group would be the only producer of coated steel within the United Kingdom market. Therefore, it would not immediately inject any added competition into the United Kingdom market, unless and until British Steel started competing with it in coated steel by alternative routes.

The competition argument was used by the hon. Member for Dagenham, and it is relevant. It is no good dismissing it and saying that we are not just talking about the United Kingdom market for steel. We are looking at the European-wide market for steel, the competitive pressures within that market and the kind of choice that consumers have as things stand. As has already been mentioned, and it cannot be dismissed, 40 per cent. of steel is imported into Britain, so there is no doubt that United Kingdom consumers have a choice about steel. About one third of BSC's entire production is exported. It sells only about two thirds of its production in the British market.

When BSC is privatised, it will be the dominant British producer, but it will not have a competition-free hold on any part of the market, whether in the United Kingdom or in the rest of Europe. It is our intention to proceed to a cartel-free market. We are anticipating the end of European quotas. In the new situation that will emerge, once we have got rid of the excess capacity and quotas, there will be no legitimate grounds for feeling, on grounds of competition or anti-monopoly policy, that there is anything wrong with privatising BSC as a single entity which will compete successfully in the kind of market that will then emerge.

Mr. Salmond: The Chancellor says that having two or more companies in the steel market would not introduce competition if not all their production was in the same area. Is not that argument rather like saying that Rowntree does not compete with Cadbury because Cadbury does not produce KitKat?

Mr. Clarke: I thought that I was at last coming to the House of Commons to talk about something other than chocolate. The market for steel is not quite the same as the market for chocolate. There is an altogether more international market in steel, whereas chocolate has a particularly domestic market. The British taste in chocolate is sharply different from that in the rest of western Europe. Steel has at least a European-wide market. In fact, it is international, because American steel comes into the continent as well.

The Opposition cannot be serious in saying that they are pressing alternative configurations because of the need for competition. I am not quite sure what they are pressing and this is not the time to take that further. There may be more enlightenment on Third Reading. The hon. Member for Dagenham would not say what he was in favour of, other than hinting that on competition grounds he would like some kind of regulatory body of steel, rather like Oftel. He has floated such ideas once or twice recently.

If we are talking about how to privatise BSC and how to provide the competition to which a great deal of attention has been devoted, I should be interested to know where the Labour party has got to. It has not yet made it clear whether BSC is one of those companies that it proposes to renationalise if it returns to power. We are told by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, among others, that the Labour party is searching for a new form of public ownership. It does not seem yet to have found that new form. It is working on it hard. Not only has it not decided what form of public ownership it will have, but it has not decided which industries will be in public ownership. If we had a new, enlightened—dare I say—Social Democratic Labour party, it might go back to square one and ask whether it needs to have public ownership of any of the commanding heights of the economy at all. At the moment it is engaged in a fruitless search for some form of public ownership and it cannot even decide on the candidate industries.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I think that I can help my right hon. and learned Friend on the point of confusion because last night, with the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), I heard a speech given by the honourable Roger Douglas, the Minister of Finance in the New Zealand Labour party. I saw the hon. Gentleman taking copious notes. I suspect that he listened to this small portion of the speech where the Minister said:

"I would say to those countries which choose for domestic political reasons to ignore economic realities, that the results of your subsidy and protectionist policies are that your poor are poorer"——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What does this have to do with new clause 1?

Mr. Brown: I am trying to account for the Opposition's confusion. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) obviously realises that he will——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If there is confusion, the hon. Gentleman is making it worse by bringing in extra matters.

6.30 pm

Mr. Clarke: There is confusion on all fronts about whether Opposition Members, if they support the new clause, want to divide British Steel into more than one company when it is privatised, whether they would renationalise it if it were privatised, how they would regulate it if it were nationalised, whether they want alternative configurations, and whether they want Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell or some other configuration. No light was shed on any of those matters. The hon. Member for Dagenham regards it as a narrow, technical clause. It is harmful also on that ground. It requires us to give information about the many options that we considered before we proposed privatisation, as I said in my statement of 3 December.

We resist the new clause and the suggestion that we produce the information and the kind of report for which new clause 1 asks because the contents of the report will be of huge value to British Steel's competitors. It would involve disclosing information about British Steel's future business strategy, the kind of market share that it envisages getting for its products, where costs lay and how they are incurred in different parts of British Steel. Not only the British Steel Corporation but any other company, whether nationalised or in the private sector, would strongly object to being required publicly to produce—in this case, in the House of Commons—the kind of information that the hon. Member for Motherwell, South plainly contemplates will be produced if the new clause is carried. Although the Opposition Front Bench treats the new clause as a minor technical matter, if it is inserted in the Bill it will do great commercial damage to the British Steel Corporation while it remains nationalised and when it is privatised.

Having listened to the debate, the Government remain persuaded that the British Steel Corporation should be privatised as a single entity. It is in the best interests of the corporation, its work force, customers and the taxpayer to do so. Because we remain so convinced, and having looked closely at the options, I invite the House to reject the new clause if it is pressed on any ground.

Mr. Maxton: The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster concluded by saying that he did not wish to give information. That is his usual line. He does not want to give information to hon. Members, but he is quite happy to give it to the press. Just before the debate the Department of Trade and Industry released a press statement on the Bill, announcing two minor concessions. The Chancellor and his junior Ministers are happy to give information to the press before they give it to the House of Commons. The Minister could have given the information when our amendments were moved. That would have been the respectable, proper way to do it. It is typical of the Minister. He does not like to give information.

It is nice to see the Chancellor here at all during consideration of the Bill. In Committee he was notable for his absence. He is winding up this debate, not because he has any particular interest in Ravenscraig or because he believes that the new clause is important, but because he wants to speak early in the debate, then go and have his usual good dinner and big cigar and not have to bother with any later speeches. Any Minister and any Government with any sensitivity to the steel industry and to what the new clause is about would not have put forward the Chancellor or anybody connected with the Department of Trade and Industry to speak in this debate.

The Secretary of State for Scotland should have replied on behalf of the Government. It was obvious that it was to be a Scottish debate. It was to be about the future of Ravenscraig, not about the overall nationalisation of the British Steel Corporation. Where is the Secretary of State for Scotland? I know where he is. Tonight, Scotland are playing Colombia at Hampden park. Yet again, the Secretary of State is desperately trying to retrieve the political position in Scotland by going to Hampden park, as he did on Saturday, without, of course, informing the relevant hon. Member of his presence on that occasion. I consider that to be extremely rude and offensive.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maxton: I shall not give way. It is a short debate.

Mr. Holt: On Hampden park?

Mr. Maxton: I shall give way on Hampden park.

Mr. Holt: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman was in my constituency on Sunday, attending the opening of the new Catholic cathedral, and did not have the courtesy to let me know?

Mr. Maxton: I do not wish to go down that route. Three Conservative Members were in my constituency on Saturday. The only one who bothered to inform me was the Prime Minister, and she did so on Monday. That does not show a great deal for what Conservative Members have to say.

Mr. Fallon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maxton: No, I shall not give way. We have listened to a confused speech from the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). He spends most of his time attacking Scotland and all that is in Scotland. I see no reason why we should willingly allow him to speak in any debate. Obviously he will take part in debates, but we shall not give him an opportunity. I make no apology for that.

The new clause presented an opportunity to the Scottish Office Minister to tell us what guarantees he is prepared to give Ravenscraig. The Chancellor and his Ministers use the phrase "the future of steel making". They do not talk about the hot roll mill or anything like that. They talk only about steel making. As it stands at present, British Steel Corporation's investment programme is a timetable for closure. It is not a guarantee for the future. We are seeking, more from the Scottish Office than from the Department of Trade and Industry, a guarantee on the future of the corporation.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said, the Tory party conference was held in Scotland last week. It was quite a remarkable occasion. It is best compared to the French aristocrats gathering in English country houses after the 1789 French revolution, desperately telling themselves that the revolution had not taken place and that, with the help of the English armies, their wealth and lands would soon be restored to them. At the conference, members of the Conservative party tried to prove that a few extra votes at Edinburgh and winning one Stirling seat by one vote from an independent candidate meant that the fight back had begun. They failed even to mention the loss of one of their five out of 66 seats in Glasgow and the continuing decline——

Mr. Fallon: Let us have a vote.

Mr. Maxton: I shall refer to steel.

Mr. Fallon: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am completely at a loss to understand what the hon. Gentleman's arguments have to do with new clause 1. Why has the hon. Gentleman managed to attract only six Opposition Members to the debate? What will he do with the new clause? Will he press it to a vote?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is about to refer to the new clause.

Mr. Maxton: I am about to refer to the new clause and, more particularly, to what it is about, which is the future of Ravenscraig. The closure of Ravenscraig is of prime importance to the political future of Scotland. That is what it is all about. [Interruption.] I know what the new clause is about. It is an opportunity for debate. That is quite clear. Therefore, I am entitled to make some reference to it. Conservative Members hate to talk about their disastrous political future and presence in Scotland. They know that perfectly well. They have lost election after election. If they cannot give a guarantee to Ravenscraig, they "ain't seen nothin' yet" in terms of what will happen to the Tory party in Scotland. That will be the end of the Tories.

Ravenscraig has become a symbol for the industrial present and future of Scotland. It is no longer just about steel making. Ravenscraig's closure would be, not just another industrial closure to add to the already appallingly long list that Scotland has suffered since 1979, but a psychological body blow to the whole Scottish economy. Confidence would be lost. There would be disastrous unemployment throughout Scotland, such as exists in my hon. Friends' constituencies at present. That is why the new clause has been tabled. I am displeased that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster replied to the debate, rather than even the Minister of State, Scottish Office, because we want long-term guarantees on Ravenscraig's future, not those that we have had so far.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: If that was the purpose of the debate, why did no hon. Member ask for those guarantees until I replied? The hon. Gentleman has nothing to say on the new clause, which is about privatisation of the industry, whether as a single entity or not. Having sat here for three hours, the hon. Gentleman finally decided what the new clause might be about and what his opinion was, but so far he has not addressed himself to one solitary subject raised by the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray).

Mr. Maxton: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had bothered to come to any of the Committee sittings, or even to sit at the back of the Committee Room and listen to the debate, or had managed to read any of the Committee's reports—which, obviously, he has not bothered to do—he would know that Ravenscraig's future has been of concern. He should not suggest that my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) is not concerned about Ravenscraig's future.

Dr. Reid: On the subject of arguments that have been missing, perhaps my hon. Friend would like to give some thought to the lack of argument by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on competition, which we argued would be enhanced by the new clause, and in particular his bizarre boast that, because we have 40 per cent. imported steel, consumer choice has increased. It is rather like defending the invasion of Poland on the basis that the Poles had someone different with whom to drink.

Mr. Maxton: My hon. Friend's analogy is apt, and amusing. He is right.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—the great believer in market forces, the use of the market place and all things to do with privatisation—spent his whole speech defending the monopoly. That was remarkable.

We are concerned about Ravenscraig because it has done everything that the Government wanted it to do. Conservative Members have talked about efficiency and competition. Ravenscraig has reduced production costs, increased productivity and shed so-called surplus labour and, rightly or wrongly, it continued to work during the miners' strike. Ravenscraig has become profitable. The grave danger is that Ravenscraig can be destroyed by its own efficiency.

One of the things that Ravenscraig does better than any other part of the steel industry is to produce highly specialised steels, such as the grain-oriented steels for the electricity industry, which no other company can produce with any profit. Those types of steels are expensive to produce and do not yield the large profits that flow from other mass-produced steels. The danger is that Ravenscraig, by being able to produce such steels, can be made to appear unprofitable in the market place and therefore liable for closure. A privatised industry might believe that it is more profitable to close Ravenscraig than to keep it open, whatever its profit levels and productivity. Unless Ravenscraig can show that it can make more profit than the £100 million that closure would produce, it might be easier for the private sector to close it.

We have not had guarantees from the Government about Ravenscraig. Obviously we shall not get such guarantees from the Secretary of State for Scotland, or even from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. That appalling indictment will be visited upon the few Tory politicians left in Scotland. The day that Ravenscraig closes, they will be in deep trouble. Scotland will make its electoral decision at the next general election and even the

[Mr. Maxton]

Minister of State, Scottish Office—the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang)—will lose his seat. We do not want to see that——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): We do.

Mr. Maxton: There are grave dangers in having no Tories left in Scotland. That would put the Union at risk. Even now the Government should consider giving guarantees on Ravenscraig's future, which so far they have dismally failed to do.

6.45 pm

Dr. Bray: My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) was perhaps a little uncharitable to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he suggested that it was the thought of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's dinner and cigar to which we owe his presence. I assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the House that I shall not keep him long from them.

The hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) referred to the ruthless policies of the British Steel Corporation in concentrating production on five sites. That proposal was originally put forward in the Benson report in the 1960s, before the nationalisation of steel, so the hon. Gentleman's friends in the private steel industry were behind that move.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster powerfully endorsed the structure, as we dreamt it up in 1966, of the nationalised steel industry. As one of the Ministers responsible, I am flattered by the right hon. and learned Gentleman's endorsement of that structure, but I am not entirely persuaded that, after more than 20 years, we do not need to take a further look at it, in view of the different regime in which it will operate in the private sector.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell company would be difficult to float, but my advice is to the contrary. There would not be difficulties in financing it. It is not big enough to float on the stock exchange immediately, but the financial institutions would accept it.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that no other proposals to split off bits of BSC had been received, and he was right. That is what I expected. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) said that there was some fear that the Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell solution would open a Pandora's box, with all the finishing plants wanting to spin off from it. That is not a danger and there has been no evidence to that effect.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said that it would be difficult for the RSD group to survive. Another reaction is outrage at the thought that it should romp off with some of the most profitable bits of the BSC, leaving BSC without any coated sheet capacity. I do not think that the group would have difficulty in surviving, but it would make sense, in terms of marketing in Europe, to form wider links, just as BSC will do. One difficulty in discussing this matter has been that the moment one starts talking about steel companies in Europe, questions are asked about the United Kingdom Government's attitude, and so far we have not been able to offer any assurance. If Ministers could offer even a glimmer of interest privately, it would be possible to put forward practicable arrangements to assure the viability of Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that we were asking BSC to produce confidential information which would prejudice its competitive position with other steel companies. The most important, sensitive performance measures in steel companies, and steel works, are collected by the International Iron and Steel Institute and are published. Therefore, it was possible for the Arthur Young report to produce its argument, which has not been disputed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman or BSC. A further report might convince Ministers that that was a viable solution that would solve a number of their problems.

We met the Chancellor of the Duchy in July and were, I think, the first group of people outside the Department whom he had met since taking office in the Department of Trade and Industry. At that meeting, he said engagingly that he did not really know much about the steel industry, but that he was anxious to learn. He said that he was more concerned about getting the structure of the steel industry right than in privatising it—there was no hurry to do that. It was therefore a surprise when a few months later he said,

"By the way, the structure is the same, but we are going to privatise the industry."

In the debate today, the right hon. and learned Gentleman showed some dangerous signs of beginning to learn something about the industry, of taking an interest in and asking some of the right questions about the future of the structure of the industry. In the hope that that process will be carried further, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it your wish that the new clause be withdrawn?

New Clause 5

CAPITAL EXPENDITURE PROJECTS

'(1) The successor company shall inform the Secretary of State of any proposed capital expenditure projects the cost of which exceeds £1 million, and in connection therewith shall make an annual forecast of the domestic prospects for steel demand in the five years from the end of the most recent financial year.

(2) The forecast specified in subsection (1) above shall be laid before Parliament by the Secretary of State as soon as is reasonably practicable.

(3) This section shall no longer apply when the successor company has ceased to be wholly owned by the Crown.'.—[Mr. Austin Mitchell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

It is clear from the previous debate that Ministers desire only to sell the British steel industry in one lump—to get rid of it and to run. Their only real desire to offer any help, encouragement, support or intervention in the industry —their only real aim—is to put up posters of Sir John Harvey-Jones looking as if he is about to burp and saying, "History is in the making." That is the Government's only preoccupation with the industry. They do not have any concern about competition. They have not learnt the lessons of privatising monopolies such as British Telecom. They have not thought of the consumer, or of whether they are privatising or just creating private sector monopolies, which seems the essence of the process.

New clause 1 asked the Government to give the reasons for and an explanation of what they are doing and why they are doing it. New clause 5 puts that more positively. We want to reinforce our concern about investment because that is crucial to the British steel industry. The new clause is limited by section 3 and ceases to apply when a successor company has ceased to be wholly owned by the Crown. So far as one can gather from the rumours and the gossip, the Government's aim is to get rid of the corporation as quickly as possible. In my view, that would be a mistake and a national tragedy.

We had to put the new clause in that form because of the nature of the Bill. It is essentially a shabby little Bill. It transforms the great British Steel Corporation into a company of a kind that might have fallen off the back of the register of companies, and allows the Government to flog it off. It is difficult for us to intervene in a Bill that is shaped like that.

However, our intervention is an attempt to impose concern about investment and a requirement on the company to report to the Secretary of State and to Parliament on the need for, the prospects of and the commitment to investment, and to set a precedent which we hope will be sustained after the Government have finally got rid of it and it has ceased to be wholly owned by the Crown. We are primarily concerned about investment in the industry.

Investment will not be the central preoccupation of private investors, who will want the maximum rate of return from the British steel industry, the highest level of dividends, and to be able to write off the investment over a period. They will not be concerned, in the way in which a public sector company or a nationalised industry is, with the long-term health and viability of the steel industry. They will not have the same concern as a nationalised industry about wider social and national interests or about the need to provide a cheap basic feedstock for manufacturing industry.

The key to the Japanese manufacturing success has been the provision of low-priced, high-quality steel to manufacturing as a basic raw material. We are anxious that such steel should be provided as cheaply as possible to our manufacturers as the base for manufacturing's healthy activity. We think that a nationalised framework is best for that. If the corporation is now to be passed to the investors, who will be concerned about getting a return and not about building up the industry, we believe that we can only sustain investment by requirements such as those set out in new clause 5.

However, Ministers do not seem to be interested in investment, although it is crucial if the industry is to remain viable, effective and competitive. We must have more investment in continuous casting. The proportion of our output derived from continuous casting is lower than that of most of our competitors. We have been slow to move into continuous casting. Japanese industry will be almost totally continuous casting within a short period. If we are to stay competitive, there must be heavy investment in that area. We also need investment in continuous annealing, which is further downstream. We need investment in plate and mini-mills.

We need considerable investment. The chairman of British Steel has estimated such investment at £300 million per year. However, he has not said for how long he intends to sustain that level of investment, or whether it will be a long-term commitment, which is what we should like. However, we are talking about a heavy level of investment to bring British Steel up to the level of our competitors and to allow for the new technology and new processes that are necessary in a rapidly evolving industry.

Without sustained concern for investment and a sustained process of investment, British Steel will lag behind, and be concerned only to exploit the market and pay out dividends, which is what happened when the steel industry was in private ownership. It had an appalling record of paying dividends—often out of capital—failing to invest and failing to keep up with processes. Investment can be sustained adequately only by nationalisation. Nationalisation has transformed the industry. The under-invested wreckage that was taken over by the Labour Government in the 1960s was transformed into an industry which has been developed on five integrated coastal sites, which is highly invested and which needs to keep up if it is to remain at the forefront.

All we ask, therefore, is that there be a continuing requirement on the company to report on its investment proposals, the role of that investment as a drive motor of the economy and the role of steel as an index of economic performance in this country, and to report also to Parliament. Although the Secretary of State's views may be prejudiced and, under this Government, ill informed, Parliament will then at least have the basis for forming its own judgments and testing and measuring the assumptions built into these investment projections by British Steel. This is therefore an attempt to maintain a continuing interest by Parliament and Government in the responsibilities that both have for the British steel industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): We had a long debate earlier without a vote and now perhaps we can have a short debate with a vote. I do not want to delay the House for long.

At present, under section 4(3) of the Iron and Steel Act 1982, the corporation is obliged to act in accordance with a general programme settled from time to time with the Secretary of State when carrying out any work which involves a substantial outlay on capital account. During the period between vesting and privatisation, the question of investment by the successor campany will be covered by provisions in the company's articles of association and a memorandum of understanding with the Secretary of State. These will broadly preserve the present arrangements for monitoring the company's investment programme at a strategic level. The Secretary of State will not intervene in the day-to-day management of the company. All such arrangements will cease once the successor company ceases to be wholly owned by the Crown. While the company is wholly owned by the Crown, the Secretary of State will be accountable to Parliament as the company's sole owner. As such, he will have ultimate control of the company and its strategic operations.

During the interim period before privatisation, therefore, the successor company will have to inform the Secretary of State of major capital projects. There is no need to incorporate the arrangements in the Bill. Such arrangements in previous privatisations have been handled perfectly satisfactorily in the same way.

We see no reason to provide in the Bill that the successor company shall submit a forecast of steel demand in the United Kingdom for the five years following the last financial year. If the successor company submits an investment proposal to the Secretary of State for approval, it will be required, under the memorandum of understanding, to submit a detailed investment appraisal.

Clearly, that appraisal would be subject to commercial confidentiality and would not be proper material for debate in Parliament. If hon. Members wish to obtain forecasts of future steel demand, there are sources other than British Steel which could provide those figures.

We do not therefore accept that there is a need to incorporate the provisions of the new clause in the Bill, and I ask the House to reject it.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I find the Minister's answer totally unsatisfactory. I am very glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) moved the new clause in the form that he did because he called attention to one of the essential weaknesses in the Bill which the Government are trying to push through and one of the most important features of the steel industry. I hope that this new clause will be passed and that the Government and the BSC will be forced to take it into account.

I believe that the evidence from all that has happened in past years underlines the need for that kind of action. I cite the steel works in my own constituency, which in the past two or three years has been fairly successful. The tinplate finishing plant in Ebbw Vale has been producing tinplate as successfully as any firm on the face of the planet, but all that was planned and was dependent upon investment that took place 10, 11 or 12 years ago. When we had the big rundown in general steel making, we carried through a big expansion of investment in the finishing plant, and that is why we have been able to carry through the advances there. We had an investment of £70 or £80 million in 1977 and 1978, and that is the reason for the proper conduct of the industry in Ebbw Vale at the present time.

We want the same sort of guarantees for the future, but the BSC, for its own reasons—I am not blaming it for this—has been carrying through fresh investments in Trostre and Velindre, not quite on the scale that it did with us 10 years ago, but looking to the future there. Naturally, when that tinplate investment took place elsewhere, we asked the BSC to give us guarantees that we should have fresh investment to sustain our tinplate production on a proper basis over the years ahead.

The people in the BSC are eager that that should happen. They told us that they planned a major expansion of the operation in Ebbw Vale in two or three years' time and that there would be other capital advances in the meantime. The tinplate operation in Ebbw Vale would be serving the nation for the next 10 or 20 years, and would at any rate have the basis of proper investment for the future.

Of course, if the industry had been left in public ownership, that is exactly what could have been done. The Steel Corporation could have given a valid, continuing pledge to the people in Ebbw Vale, who have managed a very difficult changeover with great skill and success. But, owing to the miserable, squalid measure that the Government have brought forward, and their allegiance to the ridiculous dogma of handing the industry over to somebody else, the corporation is not able to give that guarantee.

So, even at this late hour, I urge the Government to accept the new clause and the arguments put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby so that at least some safeguards may be incorporated in this measure. It is quite absurd that that kind of guarantee should have been removed by the change in ownership. We are trying to rescue something so that the workers in the industry may have some proper guarantees for the future.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has put the case so powerfully that there is no need to repeat it. The Minister's reply was very unsatisfactory. It indicated that in all those hours in Committee he learned nothing, and that he did not know much in the first place. His reply was totally dismissive. Under private ownership, this industry had an appalling record of bad investment and disorganisation. It has now been passed back into the private sector, with no guarantees concerning the maintenance of investment, by a Government who tell us that they have no major proposals for investment in the steel industry at the present moment. It is no answer to our argument to hide behind the skirts of business confidentiality. We need to know that British Steel has plans for investment in continuous casting and all the other processes to keep up with the technology.

We need to be satisfied that this will be a healthy industry that will take Britain into the next century and provide a firm, strong base for the manufacturing sector—a manufacturing sector that it will be the responsibility of the next Labour Government to rebuild and that will be rebuilt on the basis of a powerful, competitive steel industry. That is our concern, and it can be met only by investment and continuous provision for investment through this new clause.

I ask my hon. Friends to support the new clause in the Lobby.

Clause 1

Vesting of property etc. of British Steel Corporation in a successor company

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 19, at end insert
'and shall remain thus owned in perpetuity'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 29, in clause 3, page 2, line 45, leave out from 'State' to end of line 49.

No. 30, in page 2, line 49, at end insert
'(1A) The proportion of the securities of the successor company which are allotted and subsequently issued in accordance with subsection (1)(b) above shall not exceed 20 per cent.'.

No. 12, in clause 6, page 4, line 13, after 'limit', insert 'of not less than one quarter'.

No. 13, in page 4, line 20, leave out 'first'.

No. 14, in page 4, line 24, leave out from beginning to end of line 48.

Mr. Mitchell: I have moved the amendment in the hope that the steady fall in the Government's majority, which was achieved by the brilliant arguments from this side of the House, will continue. The amendment deals with the basic principle whether British Steel should be privatised and will be better under private ownership or, as we believe, should continue under national control as a public corporation.

It is a basic argument whether British Steel should serve national, social and economic purposes for the nation, as it can do and does under public control, or whether it should serve primarily the interests of investors; whether its measure of success should be geared to its rate of profit. In our view, BSC should stay under public control and continue to serve those purposes which it has been serving so successfully over the years.

We argue that BSC's present success, which the Government tell us about and which British Steel itself points out in its advertisements on commercial television to prepare the way for privatisation, is due entirely to the fact that the company has been built up under public ownership. Only public ownership has allowed the amount of investment and expenditure that is required to keep steel going through the difficult periods that a cyclical industry always faces and allowed the British steel industry to develop into the successful industry that it is today. That is entirely the result of public ownership.

It is irresponsible to throw away those benefits and advantages as the Government propose to do in order to make a quick profit and seize on a window of opportunity for the sale. Fortunately, that action would be made impossible by our amendment, which allows the Government to achieve what they believe to be the benefits of privatisation. Those are the benefits of running the company commercially, of placing marketing imperatives on the company, and of freeing it from the shackles of Treasury control and interference by Ministers, who know so little about industry, and care less.

The amendment allows the company to be governed as a Companies Act company. The shareholder will be the Government of the day. In other words, we want, and we shall maintain, ultimate public control of the organisation. We draw the line there. The amendment requires the Government to keep the shares in perpetuity. Subsequent amendments, particularly amendment No. 29, stop the provisions in later clauses that allow the Government to sell off shares in the company.

It is sensible to draw the line there. What else can the Government gain by flogging shares that they have created in the company? They do not need the money. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has been insistent that he has money rolling out of his ears to give away to the wealthy, with £2 billion going to the top 5 per cent. of the population. As the Chancellor has that much money and the economy is doing so well, why do the Government need the much smaller amount that will be forthcoming from the sale of British Steel?

Not only do the Government not need the money, but there is the question of the cost of selling this corporation, as opposed to borrowing the money in gilts, which is the alternative. Privatisation is a form of public debt that is acquired by selling off assets belonging to the state. It is cheaper to sell gilts, taking into account the reduction of the value of the assets and the taxpayers' investment written off, and taking into account also the cost of privatisation—the advertising, the underwriting, and the advice given to the Government by self-interested parties in the City about how privatisation can be made more palatable and acceptable to them.

When all that is taken into account, the gains from privatising British Steel and selling the shares, as distinct from the Government borrowing in the normal way, are minimal. The answer is, "Do not sell." Our amendment allows the Government to get the advantages of the more commercial approach with British Steel, which they say they need, without the ultimate act of selling the shares to the public. It is a simple amendment along those lines.

The amendment brings us to the basis of the argument about privatisation. The Government are obsessed with ideology. Privatisation is not a matter of fact or any tenable arguments or propositions about commercial advantages. It is simply doctrine. The Government have the obsession of Lady Macbeth. They want to wash their hands of any involvement in industry and any control over industry. Yet how can they do that with steel? The industry is basic to the economy. It is the basic raw material of manufacturing, and basic to the manufacturing strength and health of this country.

It is in the interests of manufacturing that steel should be provided as cheaply and efficiently as possible and of as high a quality as possible. That needs massive investment. Indeed, massive investment has been needed to get the steel industry to its present state. That scale of investment is likely to be forthcoming only from the state. It is an industry that is capital hungry, in a way that very few other industries are. It can be fed better by the state because the state does not have to ask for the same rate of return, thus forcing up the prices of the finished products and making our industry less competitive on world markets, in a way that is certain to happen with privatisation.

The Government are so obsessed with privatisation that they are putting themselves in the position of spivs or ticket touts, seizing on a brief window of opportunity, as if they were selling a perishable product, to get rid of it as quickly as possible. That is exactly what they are doing.

The opportunity has gone, though the effects linger on in steel production. The fall in the value of sterling in 1986, which the Chancellor neither wanted nor accepted, and resisted all the way, was forced on him by the rising oil price. It made British Steel, and much of British manufacturing, competitive. It opened our export opportunities in a way that the Government should have passed on to industry much earlier than they did, if they had had the economic sense to do so.

Steel has benefited from the growth of manufacturing that was provided by that fall in the value of sterling, but it has done so at a time when the Chancellor has killed the goose that has laid its golden eggs. He has riddled it with bullets, gone through it with a macheté knife, buried it and put a stake through its heart, and put garlic on the grave. Essentially, he has massacred that goose by letting the pound go up in a way that has been destructive to manufacturing industry.

This argument between the Prime Minister and the rest of the Cabinet seems to have dominated the public prints. Nobody seems to notice that they are arguing from the wrong hypothesis. Both accept some increase in the value of sterling. The only argument is whether it should be fast and out of all proportion, or slower and more moderate. Yet there has been an increase of 23 per cent. in the real exchange rate of the pound sterling against the deutschmark since the last quarter of 1986. Our steel industry, in order to be competitive in the face of such an increase in the value of sterling, could not, even if British steel workers began to work for free, eliminate the cost increase forced on it by economic policies of high interest rates keeping sterling artificially over-valued.

The Government are laying burdens and charges on the industry by power price increases, too. The 9 per cent. increase in electricity charges will be crippling for steel and many other industries. Having brought steel to the verge of privatisation, the Government can now impose charges on it to fatten up electricity for privatisation in its turn. So another window of opportunity has been closed and another burden on the steel industry added. It is another difficulty that will make the corporation a much less marketable proposition.

By July, probably 90 per cent. of quotas on steel production will have been taken off by the EEC. There will be almost unrestricted competition in the EEC then, and it can be guaranteed that other EEC countries will support their industries more generously than we shall, even if direct state aids are forbidden. Governments can manipulate to get around such restrictions, as the Italians have shown. So, even if there are no state aids, industries in other countries will be more generously supported than will ours, through transport subsidies, redundancy payments and other indirect means of state support with which our Government are much meaner than comparable Governments in the EEC. So another window of opportunity has been closed.

There is a fourth closed window, in the sense that other industries are now going through the modernisation process and shedding labour in the way that British Steel pioneered. They will catch up. The Germans may be facing difficulties now, but they—Thyssen, for instance—are rapidly slimming down to a highly competitive state, the more so as the deutschmark has become under-valued against the pound, and there is world over-capacity in steel.

British Steel will be sailed off into dangerous, stormy waters by the Government as quickly as possible in order to grab the briefly opened window of opportunity provided by the improvement of 1986-87, which was caused largely by the fall of sterling. The symptoms of these problems are all around us. They can be seen in the Metal Bulletin of 14 April, which says that United Kingdom demand for steel is up only 4 per cent., but customers' lead times are lengthening. The only alleviation of the situation is offered by imports, which are now much cheaper because of the high value of sterling. In 1987 imports were at an all time high, excluding 1980, the year of the steel strike. Metal Bulletin for 31 March says that Teesside's order to supply slabs to Tuscaloosa has now been lost to USX, formerly United States Steel—an early symptom of what is happening because the dollar is falling and the pound rising.

In this position it will be a wise Government who recognise the risks of turning this capital-hungry cyclical industry loose on the world market and absolving themselves of all involvement in the consequences. Steel may face consequences and difficulties that will make it again need support from the State to see it through the difficulties that it has had in the past.

The real question to be asked about privatisation—it is the reason why we want to stop the sale of the securities—is who will British Steel be sold to? What are the imperatives of the investors who will take it over? I do not imagine that they will be small investors. This will be a somewhat risky investment in a cyclical capital-hungry industry—too risky to sell to Sid and his friends. All the signs from the Bank of England are that Sid is satiated and will be once bitten twice shy after last October. The buyers will be big internationally diversified investors who want another element in their portfolio. They have no interest, necessarily, in the continuation of steel production in this country. They want a return that will perhaps allow them to write off their assets over a 20-year period. All they want is another egg in their basket, which British Steel can provide.

This is part of the Government's process of making this land fit for investors to live in. They have closed down £25 billion worth of investment in manufacturing industry to make the rest of investment in manufacturing industry more profitable. They have allowed investors to diversify overseas, with money pouring out of this country. They have put on the stock market better invested internationalised industries as an attractive alternative to overseas or other industrial investment in this country. The land is becoming fit for investors, but investors do not have the same commitment to the maintenance of a powerful and effective steel industry, to providing steel as cheaply as possible to manufacturers, and to investing to keep up with the foreign competitors, as the State and community have. Nor do they have the same resources as the State to provide the wherewithal for investment. They do not have the commitment which is central to public ownership and which can be sustained only by public ownership.

The very terms in which the company is being privatised in this shabby little Bill, with its shabby little company, are incentives for investors to write off their investment over a period and for British Steel to run the company to pay dividends regularly to investors rather than to invest in new capacity, new plant and new processes as we would want.

The process of privatisation is essentially a commercial fiddle to write down the assets and make them attractive to investors. Lord Jenkin of Roding said that the Government will sell British Steel at a price that will be attractive to the investor. In other words, they will manipulate the asset value of British Steel until they get it to a price at which investors will bite and be guaranteed the return they want. Such a fiddle would be prevented by our amendment.

The Government will not only write off the £17·6 billion —at current prices—that the taxpayer has put into British Steel, and for which he will receive no return, but even the remaining £3·9 billion of public dividend capital, which is all that is left after earlier write-offs, will be written down to make it attractive to investors. The best estimate that we have of the price that investors will pay for British Steel comes from the Financial Times of 29 February and is £2 billion. At that price the corporation will be an attractive investment for internationally diversified investors who want another egg in their basket.

Clause 2 allows the Government to write down the public dividend capital of £4 billion to a level at which it can be sold—let us say £2 billion. So there will be a substantial write-off at the start to make British Steel attractive to investors. But there is another element in the confidence trick—clause 7. Our best estimate of the assets of British Steel is £5·4 billion. That figure is a combination of the fixed assets at current cost, which are £3·2 billion, plus £926 million of plant, which is fully written off and depreciated, but still in use in British Steel, which is still extracting profit from that money, plus the other assets of £1·2 billion, giving a total of £5·4 billion worth of assets.

The statutory reserve in clause 7 will be set at the difference between the written-down value of public dividend capital—say, £2 billion—and the nominal value of the shares. If the nominal value can be determined at will, the Government can create for themselves free capital which can be distributed and used to absorb losses and then form the basis for write-downs in the asset values of the British Steel Corporation. If the fixed assets are written down, as they will be, below their economic value, the returns that they produce count as income available for distribution. So the basis of privatisation is a confidence trick to fiddle down both assets and public dividend capital to a price that investors will pay. The Government are robbing themselves and the taxpayer and knocking down the value of their assets to get them on the market as quickly as possible—just to get rid of them.

The Government have no higher sense of commitment to or responsibility for the steel industry, which is so important to the economy. As British Steel's assets are already under-valued, this sets the industry out on a dangerous path. The Government say that it is possible, even desirable, to write down assets to provide dividends for investors, and that it is desirable to reduce the price to make it attractive for investors. On what path does that start the steel industry? It starts it back on the path on which it was previously under private ownership. The record of private ownership of steel was to pay dividends out of capital, to keep up the flow of dividends, at the expense of cutting down on investment or, in many cases, making no investment at all.

There was a fascinating article in Accountancy in 1959 which showed how, when the industry was privately owned, in most years up to the war it paid dividend out of capital. It resumed that process in the 1950s and continued it in the 1960s. It was effectively an industry that was eating itself. It produced a cycle in steel that was a national tragedy. Irresponsible private ownership meant no investment and distribution of dividends out of capital, so reducing the industry to a position where it had to be taken over by the state to build it up by force feeding it in a sense, because only the state is powerful enough to do that.

The state transformed the industry so that in the 1970s and the early 1980s it was a well invested, highly developed industry, producing an extremely competitive product on five integrated coastal sites. Then along come the Government to throw it back to the private sector to resume the irresponsible cycle that will reduce the industry to the state that it was in the early 1960s. This the Government call wisdom, economics and statesmanship. It is pure, simple irresponsibility which is unworthy of any Government, even this one.

Mr. Crowther: No doubt my hon. Friend will recall the Benson report, which drew attention to the fact that the industry was being starved of capital, which led directly to its being taken into public ownership. No doubt my hon. Friend agrees that if that had not happened there would not be a steel industry today.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right. Because of his long association with and deep knowledge of the steel industry, I am grateful for the point that he made.

The interests of investors will not be the interests of the nation, the workers or manufacturing. Investors will be interested only in their returns. It is worthwhile asking how the return will be secured from British Steel. The answer is that it will be secured by the kind of fiddle which the Government themselves sanction by the very basis of the Bill.

If we take £2 billion as the price for British Steel, the return that an investor will require will be about 20 per cent. We have to add to the rate of return 10 per cent., say, as a risk premium because of the nature of the industry. On our calculation, that will mean an annual dividend of about 20 per cent. to make it an attractive investment. That is a high return. If we take into account Sir Robert Scholey's statement that he wants investment of about £300 million—he did not say for how long—it will be difficult for British Steel to make an annual return to investors on that scale and carry through the national investment.

How could British Steel do that? It could do it by fiddling the figures in part, as it has done by using capital which has been written off. It has already started on that path to pretty up the accounts for privatisation. The Government encouraged that process after they had painted the picture far blacker than it was up to 1985 in order to enhance the case for loss of jobs and closures.

Even on the return which it is making in 1987-88 British Steel will not be able to provide an annual return of £400 million. Therefore, it will be driven down the path that my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) described. The report from Youngs, the management consultants from Motherwell district council, shows clearly how the profits of British Steel could be increased by closures. The figures in the report are clear and dramatic. The closure of Ravenscraig would produce, every year, an extra profit of £100 million because there would be no need to finance investment and employment. In other words, British Steel could get from closures the rate of return that investors will want.

It is not a question of profitability, but just of getting more profit as a return for the investor. That will be feasible by closing plants that might be profitable. The closure of Ravenscraig alone might not bring the dividends up to the requisite figure. The Government have already started British Steel down that path by sanctioning in clause 7 the write-off of assets. That will lead inevitably to further closures to extract more dividend for investors.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): There is another path as well as the one to which my hon. Friend has referred. British Steel could engage in asset stripping and sell off cheaply United Engineering Steels, which is so important in Rotherham and in my constituency.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is correct.

Different dangers attend privatisation. There is the wasting way, the anorexia nervosa treatment, which provides a steady return for investors at the cost of failing to invest to build up the capacity of the industry so that it may remain competitive. That started with the process which we are now on of letting imports fill the peaks and not expanding the industry to provide for them. That path was pioneered by the British motor cycle industry and has also been trodden by the British car industry. It has had disastrous consequences for both of them.

There are lots of possibilities. What we need is public control so that the industry serves the purposes of the nation, the national strength and British manufacturing. That can be secured only by public ownership in the form provided for in the amendment. The argument is simple. The danger is an irresponsible handover by a Government who are determined to get the cash as quickly as possible and to grab at the money in the window of opportunity so as to produce an incentive for investors who will take over British Steel to screw the maximum rate of return out of their investment in ways which are disadvantageous for the national purposes of the country and the economic health of manufacturing.

It would be irresponsible to throw away the benefits of public ownership and public investment just when they are beginning to make a return. Why should that money not return to the taxpayer? If the industry is to be as efficient and competitive as the Government tell us, why should the taxpayer not continue to derive the benefit and retain for himself and the community the power to sustain the industry through the difficulties which might lie ahead and which the cyclical industry of the past has shown probably do lie ahead?

Mr. Michael Brown: I am absolutely flabbergasted by what the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has said. He served with me on the Standing Committee. I refreshed my memory from the proceedings in Committee to see what the hon. Gentleman said. He said that the Labour party's amendments to the Bill

"propose that British Steel should demonstrate a track record before privatisation."

He went on to say, and I remember him saying it:

"We are not standing in the Government's way and saying, 'Thou shalt not privatise'. We are saying that we should privatise taking into account all the sense and virtues that the Government tell us are to be found in the Conservative party——".

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No, I will not give way until I have completed the quotation—

"the feelings of financial market, financial rectitude and financial responsibility—by establishing a track record before this important national asset is launched on an uncertain sea."

Later, he said:

"Our concern, which we reiterated throughout the Second Reading debate, is that British Steel should not be privatised. We do not want it to be privatised. We are flatly opposed to privatisation."

[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 10 March 1988; c. 59-60.]

8 pm

I do not think that the Labour party knows its policy about the British steel industry. Once upon a time we knew what it was. I have no doubt that hon. Members who were here in the mid-1960s—such as the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot)—when the nationalisation of the steel industry was going through the House saw the House packed with hon. Members. Today there is no passion in the Opposition's arguments, and the fact that only about half a dozen Opposition Members are present shows that there is little concern whether the British steel industry is privatised.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It is fascinating for me to hear my speeches reread with some deterioration in the style, the grammar and the charm of the delivery. It is "Play Away" politics for the hon. Gentleman to engage in that kind of exercise. He well knows that the purpose of a Standing Committee is to probe the thinking of Ministers. In Committee, we were probing to find out if there was any thinking. Ministers emerged very badly from that examination. It is the intention of the Standing Committee to approach matters from different angles. The amendments to which I was speaking approached the problem from different points of view. It is silly and irresponsible to quote one and to hold it against the other.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Labour party's position on privatisation. Our policy is to stop it. This industry needs to stay in public ownership. Public ownership has served the industry well and we feel that it will prosper only under such ownership. That is a clear statement of the position.

Mr. Brown: We have made some progress, because we know what the Labour party would not do if it were in government. It would not denationalise or privatise. If one day—perish the thought—the Labour party were to form the Government, what would they do with the steel industry? We have not heard from the Opposition whether they would renationalise it.

Mr. Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No, because I intend to be brief.

We know what the Labour party opposes, but we do not know what it would do to the steel industry if it were to come back to power. I remember pressing the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) time and again in Committee about what he would do, and his ideas changed from day to day. When he and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby had not had time to consider their policy, they expressed totally different views.

Shortly before the 1987 election, the Prime Minister announced three broad goals that the Government would set out to achieve in their term of office: first, a reduction in the burden of public indebtedness; secondly, a significant reduction in personal and corporate tax rates; and, thirdly, the improved provision of social services. A key role in the reduction of debt was to be played by the reform and sale of state-owned businesses.

Those words were used not by our Prime Minister but by the Finance Minister in the New Zealand Labour Government. He used them yesterday evening in the presence of the hon. Member for Dagenham. Labour Governments in other countries who have the responsibility for looking after state assets recognise that they cannot for ever be held in the the public sector. The Labour Government of New Zealand have found a way of giving a future to their steel industry. It was significant that the hon. Member for Dagenham took the trouble to go and listen to that speech, probably because he does not have his policy worked out and is probably trying to get some ideas to see how it is done.

The amendment should be rejected. Labour Governments of the 1960s and 1970s implemented policies that brought the steel industry near to bankruptcy. The Conservative Government of the 1980s have brought the industry back to profitability. It is now time to secure that profitablility by ensuring that the industry is privatised as quickly as possible.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): We should remember what we are talking about when we discuss these amendments. The Bill will turn the British Steel Corporation into a plc wholly owned by the Government. That could go ahead with the ownership remaining with the Government, and that is what we are arguing for in the amendments. There are very good arguments for that, and many of them have been outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

It is worth remembering that British Steel's present prosperity is a direct result of the investment that was made during public ownership. Scunthorpe would have gone the way of Corby if it had not been for the Anchor project and the massive investment in the early 1970s under public ownership. We must face the question whether that same kind of massive investment and modernisation programme will continue in private ownership, or whether the temptation will be to take the profits while they are good and while the exchange rate is to the benefit of BSC. There may be a temptation to take the money while BSC is going through a boom and then, when the industry goes down again, to forget about it.

People who have worked in the steel industry all their lives and have been through the changes when it was privately owned and state-owned have told me that, when the industry was nationalised, investment was in the form of new machinery. They said that when it was denationalised, all it got was a new coat of paint and money was not invested as it should have been. We all want to see a prosperous and competitive steel industry. We do not want to see such a national asset being sold at a loss to Britain and to the taxpayers. That is exactly what we will get under the terms of the Bill.

We have not addressed the problem of the billions of pounds of public money that have gone into the steel industry since the beginning of the 1980s. In reply to a question, the Minister said that since 1979, over £5 billion of taxpayers' money has gone into the industry to help it to restructure and modernise. Are we completely to forget about that money? Now that we have seen the fruits of that investment, are we simply to throw it away while there is an opportunity to receive some dividends, some return in terms of the profits that the steel industry is making? Those profits should go to the Exchequer to repay the taxpayers for all the money that has gone to the industry.

Steel is a strategic industry, important to the well-being of our nation. Britain is a manufacturing nation but we may well be swamped by imports and lose that status. It is important that steel is given the kind of security that a state-owned company enjoys.

I am prepared to accept that there were weaknesses in the Morrison form of nationalisation. I am not saying that we cannot look at different approaches to public ownership that will give the people who work in the industries a real say and a stake in them. I am not saying that a free-standing company should have a great deal of direct interference in its day-to-day running. Such a company should operate on a commercial basis.

Even under the Bill, the company would remain in public ownership and the money that has gone into it could be retrieved through the profits that the industry is now making. There is no logic in selling off British Steel to the private sector and thinking that there will be increased competition, because that will simply produce a monopoly. The sale of other former public companies, such as British Telecom and British Gas, to the private sector has not improved the service to consumers. In the case of British Telecom, the quality of service has deteriorated. There is no guarantee that the benefits to the consumer will be enhanced by selling the British Steel Corporation to the private sector.

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about competition. Does he accept that 40 per cent. of steel products sold in the United Kingdom are imported and that there is plenty of competition in Europe that British Steel must face, which will act as an incentive to give good quality service to customers?

Mr. Morley: I am not sure that the answer to our economic problems is to increase imports. I would rather see competition among United Kingdom plants, rather than rely upon imports.

We shall go into a unified market in 1992. Our industries already suffer the disadvantage of high energy costs compared with our European rivals. The BSC is by no means one of the largest steel-producing companies in Europe, so it runs the risk of unfair competition which will undermine its position and, as a result, this country's position as a steel-producing nation.

Public ownership protects the steel industry from its cycles. When the going has been good, the private sector has taken money out of the industry, but, when the going has been difficult, it has cleared off and left the state to pick up the pieces. After rebuilding our steel industry and making it one of the best in the world, the Government are prepared to throw it to the wolves, to wash their hands of it and to destroy what has been built up with public money and support.

Mr. Fallon: The trouble with Opposition Members is that they try to have things both ways. The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and, in the earlier debate, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) claimed that the successful steel operations in their constituencies were due to the massive investment programme of the last Labour Government. If that is true, the failure of the steel operations in Corby and Consett must also be due to that programme. Opposition Members cannot have it both ways.

I have always thought that Mr. Speaker was a generous man, but he has been more than generous in his selection of the amendments, because it is clear that amendment No. 2 comes close to being a wrecking amendment. The Labour party says that, even if the British Steel Corporation is allocated in share capital, the shares should not be sold: they should be retained for ever in public ownership. That is quite clearly a nonsensical approach for three reasons.

First, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) admitted, future and continuing large-scale investment will be required in the industry. He suggested that that could be financed from gilts, but, if that is the case, steel would always be competing against other equally massive investment in key public services, such as education and health, which are also financed from gilts and public borrowing. Steel would therefore always be competing, perhaps at a disadvantage, with other claims on investment from the public sector.

Secondly, if the shares are retained in public ownership, the British Steel Corporation will be far less responsive to its customers' and shareholders' needs. In new clause 1, Opposition Members specifically advocate taking account of customers' and shareholders' wishes. Those wishes may well be considered, but, if the shares are retained in public ownership, they will always be less important than the wishes of Ministers, particularly of the Treasury Ministers.

Dr. Reid: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that, as British Telecom is now in the private sector, it is more responsive and pays more attention and gives better service to its customers?

8.15 pm

Mr. Fallon: Yes, certainly. British Telecom and Oftel do nothing but write to Members of Parliament about all the improvements that they are making and planning. If the improvements are of the scale that they describe, one wonders what the service was like under public ownership. There is therefore no real strength in that argument.

Thirdly, if the BSC is retained in the public sector, it will be placed at a strong competitive disadvantage to other companies in the European and world market place which are privately owned or which Governments intend to be privately owned. As my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) has reminded us, such privatisation is envisaged by both Conservative and Socialist Governments.

The amendment seeks to preserve the status quo. If the shares are publicly owned, there is not much point in privatising the BSC. The amendment advocates no change in British Steel and it shows, above all, no confidence in either the management or the work force to make a success of the industry in the market.

Mr. Foot: As I have listened to the debate, I have been more and more amazed at the prospect that a Minister from the Welsh Office is to reply to it. The Minister of State, Welsh Office is the only Minister to have listened to the debate, so I presume that he will answer for the Government. That is a pretty amazing state of affairs. I have the greatest affection for the hon. Gentleman, as everyone in Wales knows, but we do not regard him as a great spokesman about steel. Is he going to come to the Dispatch Box and say that it was wrong to nationalise the steel industry in Wales?

What will happen to the Llanwern works? There would have been no such works without public ownership. When the works was set up and hundreds of millions of pounds invested in it, it was called the Spencer works. Aneurin Bevan suggested that it was better to call it the Spencer works because Sir Henry Spencer had backed it throughout. He advocated public ownership and knew that only public money could sustain the industry on the proper scale. He would have been gratified by the scale of the success of the Llanwern works over recent years, but he would have been horrified that a Welsh Office spokesman should have dared to come to the Dispatch Box to seek to justify throwing this great industry, built up by huge public funds and effort, back into private hands, when it had been built up solely by public investment and public foresight. If it had not been for that, there would have been no works at Llanwern.

My hon. Friends the Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) have put the case magnificently that the steel industry is a long-term industry. It must have a chance of long-term planning. That was the situation in Llanwern. It had some difficulties for two or three years, but Henry Spencer said that we must back it over a period. That is what the steel industry needs.

I recall vividly when the Government took the wretched decision to appoint Ian MacGregor to run the steel industry. The fact that he had ruined the coal industry was bad enough. I remember my first private conversation with him and I believe that it is perfectly all right to make the facts public now. He said to me, "You must recognise that we are not bound by the undertakings of the British Steel Corporation." I said, "But the whole point about the British Steel Corporation is that it must be bound by its previous obligations to the work force and the community at large." Eventually, for a while, we forced him to carry out the obligations that his predecessors had undertaken; that was extremely important for the industry.

Ian MacGregor wanted to wriggle out of the obligations, and under his leadership many commitments to my constituents and others were broken—shamefully so in some cases—and thereby the corporation thought that it did not have to carry out its obligations to the communities. Ian MacGregor was absolutely opposed to the plan of building up other industries and for the steel industry to play a major part in that development. The Labour Government had given that undertaking, but he wanted to wriggle out of it.

It is absolutely appalling that the Minister of State, Welsh Office should come to the Dispatch Box to throw the industry back into private ownership without knowing what the outcome will be. As my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby said, no one can foresee the world situation for steel over the next five or 10 years. It is shameful and shocking that the Government should decide now to put at risk an industry which has been through such pain and agony.

I say this in the interests of the whole steel industry, in which the whole nation has a special interest. As I said earlier, I speak in the interests of each steel plant. We want firm commitments about investment over the next five or 10 years. We should have a Minister at the Dispatch Box who is capable of giving firm commitments. If the industry is to be privatised, such firm commitments cannot be given from the Disptach Box. That is why we are opposed to the privatisation. If the Minister wants to do a service to Wales, he should tear up his prepared speech and say "No, we will not do this." He has experience of steel matters. He had better get an underling from another Department to do the dirty work.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. Wyn Roberts): The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) was sufficiently honest to admit at the beginning of this debate that he was using the amendment to debate the basic principle. Therefore, we heard the age-old argument of public ownership versus privatisation. We covered this ground thoroughly on Second Reading, and we touched on it in Committee.

During the Second Reading my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster set out the Government's position clearly when he said:

"The Government believe that good commercial enterprises should be in the private sector because they thrive better there. They are free of Treasury control, free of ministerial control and further away from political lobbying which raises problems now or in future."—[Official Report, 23 February 1988; Vol. 128, c. 170.]

I am aware of the connection of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) with steel. He may not know about mine. I was present at the opening of the Llanwern works in the early 1960s, and I remember Sir Henry Spencer. They used so much blue paint at Llanwern that it was called Spencer Blue. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman does not remember as clearly as I do that the talk at the time was that the opening of the Llanwern works would mean the end of steel making at Ebbw Vale. It did not mean that for many years thereafter. Was it not left to a Labour Government, towards the end of their term in office, to close down steel making at Ebbw Vale and in Cardiff? That was very much in prospect towards the end of that Labour Government's term of office.

Mr. Foot: The Minister should get his facts straight. The Minister responsible for the proposal to close the heavy end of steel making at Ebbw Vale was his right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Wales. The Minister had better be careful about what he says.

Mr. Roberts: I am fairly sure of my facts. It was only a matter of time and of allowing the general election to pass before the decisions were implemented. The Labour Government had been forced into the position where they recognised that the rundown at Ebbw Vale and in Cardiff had to take place.

I want to consider the Government's justification for privatisation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said, we believe that the steel industry will perform better in the private sector. The Government are not alone in that belief. The BSC wants that. If hon. Members care to look at the report and accounts published in July last year, they will discover in the penultimate paragraph that the chairman states:

"The board believes that a return to the private sector would bring clear commercial advantages to the corporation."

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Roberts: No, I want to finish this point. I shall give way later.

The chairman of BSC said that in the context of all the challenges that BSC must face in the near future. BSC is facing the challenges for the future with some confidence, and the Government share that confidence. Having listened to Opposition Members today and in Committee, it seems that they base their views entirely on their worst fears and believe that the steel industry will be better protected if it is in public ownership.

The record of British Steel in public ownership is not as the Opposition would make out. I have a copy of an excellent document written by Elizabeth Cotterell, called "The Giant with the Feet of Clay: the British Steel Industry 1945-1981." This very good document describes some of the delays and damage caused during the period of public ownership.

We have not discussed the amendment in detail. However, it is clear that it is our intention that we should sell at least the majority of shares that we hold in the successor company following vesting. If a minority shareholding is retained, it will not be because the Government consider it necessary to retain a formal interest in the successor campany; nor, in those circumstances, would the Government seek to exercise any influence over the company's policy. Once again I reiterate our firm belief that we believe that the industry will react better to the requirements of the market place when it is in the private sector.

8.30 pm

The amendments are designed to preserve a specific Government shareholding in the successor company. That is completely at odds with our policy and it would certainly be wrong to enshrine such restraints in statute. These issues were thoroughly discussed in Committee, and the broader questions were debated on Second Reading. We accept that the steel industry is important, but it does not follow that the Government must retain control over it to protect the national interest. British Steel's history shows that Government intervention is often not beneficial either to the commercial success of the company or, in the longer term, to the national interest.

I recall debates in the House in 1973—and reference was made to this in Committee—when a great argument raged across the Floor of the House on how much steel should be produced. The then Government were talking of 38 million tons, whereas the Opposition were talking of 42 million tons or thereabouts. We all know what volume of steel production was reached within a few years after that time. In other words, all of us, on both sides of the House, were wrong. So much for our deep political knowledge and judgment of the steel industry.

This is an enabling Bill, and privatisation will take place subject to market conditions. We have always made that clear. The taxpayer will have his reward through the return to the Treasury from the sale of shares. I emphasise to the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) that the return from the proceeds of the sale is likely to be far greater than any return from dividends over the years.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Minister is a poet or a bard, and he made a reply appropriate to a poet or a bard. It was not an economist's reply, nor was it a politician's reply. It was essentially doggerel. There was no mobilisation of any argument. Apart from the Minister's repetition of a few clichés, I heard no justification for taking the British Steel Corporation, which the Minister has told the House is so successful, transforming it into a shell company, and flogging it off. What gains will materialise from such an action? Can those gains be quantified? What prospects lie ahead if that is done?

We claim—and the history of steel shows this to be true—that there is an inherent tendency in private ownership to take the maximum return on investment and to draw the maximum dividends, but not to make the new investment in capacity and plant that is necessary for the industry to remain competitive. The tendency is not to build new plants, but to pay dividends out of capital or out of a failure to invest. That is the whole history of the steel industry. What will make that different now that the Government are again putting the steel industry into the hands of the self-same investing community that produced that record of neglect in the past? What will turn British Steel into a dynamic industry when it is privatised this time? There has been no indication at all from the Government.

One change is that the investors will be internationally diversified. British Steel will represent only a small proportion of their investment and will be something that they can write off. They will have no interest in the continued well-being of British Steel, provided it pays dividends. Once those investors have enjoyed a return on their capital they will be able to write it off after 20 years and put their money into another steel industry somewhere else. British Steel will be just one of the eggs in their basket. The danger is that they do not have any concern for the national interest of the kind which the Government have, and which the elected representatives of the people can have in influencing the Government through the House. That is the argument for public control, and it is one that has not been answered.

The only justification that the Government can provide for privatisation is that the Opposition are against it. That is the equivalent of a thug who has been arrested for attacking an old lady demanding of the policeman, "What is your philosophy about crime? What are you going to do to stop crime?", while not recognising that his own actions were wrong. The Minister's only arguments have come in the form of a few statements from British Steel executives. Of course they are in favour of privatisation, because they will get rid of Treasury control, with all its restrictions, and of interference by Ministers who they believe know nothing about the industry. They will also be able to pay themselves more money. In that situation, I would be in favour of privatisation. However, we in this Chamber must take account of the nation's interests and ensure the survival of a healthy manufacturing economy. We must also concern ourselves with the production of steel as cheaply and as abundantly as possible, to act as a basis for that industry.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The hon. Gentleman does an injustice to the management of BSC when he ascribes to it those reasons for being in favour of privatisation. I am sure that he would wish to take account of the entire contents of the chairman's review, in which his statement in favour of privatisation occurs. He would then see that the BSC board is in favour of privatisation because it believes that the steel industry will do better.

Mr. Mitchell: The Government have been telling the House how well British Steel has been doing under public ownership, and that the whole basis of its success has been the investment made, the reorganisation undertaken, and the shedding of labour that has been carried through under state ownership. When the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said that private ownership means success, and that public ownership means failure, his assertion is in direct defiance of all the facts. There is in the 16 May issue of Metal Bulletin a table of results for EEC steelmakers. The only major success is that of British Steel, which is publicly owned, with a profit of 286 million ecu for 1987. The privately-owned German steel maker, Klockner, made a loss of 39 million ecu. Thyssen lost 107 million ecu. Hoechst made a profit of only 24 million ecu, and both Irish Steel and Danish Steel made losses. Private steel makers are losing money, but British Steel is successful, and has been made successful by public ownership. The Government want to throw that away, and that is irresponsible of them to do so in the fashion that they propose.

The Government are irresponsible. They are a Government who have presided over years of oil wealth and have thrown that away. They have thrown away the nation's opportunity and are now selling off the nation's assets at knockdown prices—grabbing a quick window of opportunity to get the best price that they can, irrespective of the consequences for the industry and the problems that will confront the national economy later. It is Government by irresponsibility, and we shall vote against it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 1, line 19, at end insert

'and must be a company in which there shall be designated a special share which shall have the effect in terms of voting at an ordinary meeting of representing 50·01 per cent. of the shares and which shall be held by the Secretary of State for the following purposes—

(a) ensuring that all directors of the successor company are British citizens;

(b) restricting the proportion of shares held by non-British citizens or institutions to 15 per cent. of the paid-up capital of the company;

(c) protecting the successor company from being taken over by another person or body; and

(d) the restriction of any individual shareholder or their nominee to no more than 5 per cent. of the paid-up share capital of the company; and the Secretary of State shall report to Parliament on the use of the golden share designated under this subsection.'.

This amendment relates to retaining Government influence over the privatised British Steel Corporation. Even if the Government are so irresponsible as to want to divest themselves of ownership through a state corporation, they should still retain some influence over the new company and set out certain priorities in the form of a golden share. That is clearly a faute de mieux, in the sense that we prefer the corporation to be publicly owned and amenable to national interests through public ownership —that is the best way of doing that—and, in default, there should be a golden share.

From the Minister's own agnostic position on Second Reading, it is clear that he did not think of including a golden share in the proposals. It is clear also that, through our arguments in Committee, we have brought the Government round. In Committee, there was little Government movement. Perhaps it was because the Ministers did not know much about steel or the Bill. But, during our discussions, we managed to secure one concession—and there will be a golden share in British Steel plc. We rate that as a success, but it is no more than a recognition by the Government of their responsibility to privatised industry. We are glad about that concession, but we want the Minister to put some flesh on it and tell us exactly what the Government envisage in the golden share. We envisage the range of powers that is specified in our amendment. The first is "that all directors . . . are British citizens."

It restricts

"the proportion of shares held by non-British citizens or institutions to 15 per cent.".

In other words, we do not want to get into a British Petroleum problem.

The amendment protects

"the successor company from being taken over by another person or body."

Clearly, it could be in danger of that. If there is no investment and industrial strength is not maintained, it restricts "any individual shareholder or their nominee to no more than 5 per cent. of the paid-up share capital of the company."

More important, it requires the Secretary of State to "report to Parliament on the use of the golden share designated under this subsection."

That is the golden share as we would like it. We wait to hear how the Minister would define it. There can and should be no doubt about the principle of the golden share. The 23 July 1985 minutes of Her Majesty's Treasury Official Committee on Nationalised Industry Policy, which is an unclassified document on special rights shares, show that that body agreed:

"In some privatisations, there will be no need for reserve powers. But in certain cases, the Government needs to retain specific limited powers over the future ownership or control or conduct of a privatised company. Powers have been taken for example to prevent foreign control where this is judged to be undesirable, to block take-overs during a limited period while the company fully establishes itself in the private sector, and to veto any material disposition of assets. The exact powers required will need to be determined by the circumstances of each case, but they should always be limited to the minimum necessary."

In British Steel, the minimum necessary is substantial, because it is a crucial industry. We want the industry to be run as closely in accord with the national interest as a privatised industry—a plc—can be. That is why we have opted for the form of words in our amendment.

If the Minister does not think that British Steel is important, strategic or crucial enough to the economy to justify that full range of powers, it is incumbent on him to tell us why he rejects them and how the dangers that they safeguard against can be avoided if they are not specified in the golden share.

Clearly there is scope for discussion about the golden share. The golden share should be written into the legislation. That seems to be an essential safeguard. I assume that the Government's approach will be to write it into the articles of the company. That is not as effective as putting it into the Bill. If a case goes to court and a judge rules that the equal rights of shareholders are overruled or obviated by the existence of a golden share, the nature of the operation could be endangered. That is always a possibility. To safeguard against that, legislation will have priority and will be fully and comprehensively binding in a way in which the company's articles will not. That is why we prefer to have this in the legislation.

Let us examine what is in the golden share. The contents of golden shares have varied from privatised company to privatised company. There is no pattern. I should have thought that it was incumbent on the Government to set out some basic pattern of requirements to be imposed on privatised companies. The Government have certainly had enough practical experience to set out certain basic rules in the form of a golden share and what it should be about. I ask hon. Members to look at experience. For instance, the golden share of the British Airports Authority provides that there will be no individual shareholding of more than 15 per cent. It entrenches the ownership of major airports with the British Airports Authority. In British Aerospace, there is no foreign stake over 15 per cent. The directors are British, and there is one Government director. British Airways has no special share, but no individual stake over 15 per cent. and no foreign holding over 25 per cent. are allowed. In British Telecom, there is no stake above 15 per cent. The chief executive must be British and the Government have the right to appoint directors. There is a patchwork quilt of provisions.

Steel is so crucial that we should have the maximum possible provision and safeguards in the golden share. There are real dangers. It is important to assert the national interest, in whatever form it can be asserted, through a golden share held by the Government. I was pleased to hear the Minister announce that there is a possibility that the Government will maintain a shareholding. Clearly we welcome that. We prefer them to maintain as big a shareholding as possible and for as long as possible—certainly until Labour returns to power, when we shall know what action to take with the shareholding.

The golden share is a different provision—[Interruption.] The Under-Secretary of State is checking what was said in the previous debate. In Committee, he envisaged a 25 per cent. Government shareholding in BSC. I hope that he will not whittle away at the figure and cause that shareholding to vanish like a mirage. That shareholding was important in building up our vote on amendment No. 2. I notice that the Government's majority fell abruptly. Either their supporters do not have faith in the privatisation proposals or we are gathering new strength, perhaps as a consequence of the Minister's commitment in the last debate.

Since the 1920s, we have not had a totally unregulated market in steel, without any Government involvement or state responsibility for the market's overall shape. Over the years, Government aspirations about public versus private ownership have changed like a zigzag. The Conservative party came into office hostile to public ownership, but the Government increased it massively by encouraging the British Steel Corporation in the early 1980s to drive all the competition out of business. Dunford and Hatfield was the classic example. Private steel producers which had prospered and made profits under Labour—we had a different attitude towards the private sector—were driven out of business by BSC under this Government. In effect, a Government committed to privatisation were closing down the private sector. The Government then took another zigzag with the Phoenix hive-offs, in which British Steel retains a stake.

9 pm

Now, in another zigzag, the Government are to turn this dominant public limited company loose on the market without control or supervision, let or hindrance. There will not even be effective controls by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The procedures have been speeded up and will probably be weakened. How effective will those procedures be as a control on any monopolistic tendencies implicit in British Steel's performance? I asked the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs when he intended to publish the MMC's report on various nationalised industries, including BSC. Having given me a holding answer, because the question so disturbed him and the Government's actions were so obscure that he was not able to find the answer immediately, the hon. Gentleman said:

"The report was delivered to the Secretary of State in 1986."

No date was given, but it was almost certainly the beginning of 1986. The hon. Gentleman did not even give the month. He said:

"The delay in publication has been caused by the need to consider very carefully a request by the British Steel Corporation that the Secretary of State should exercise his powers under section 17 of the Competition Act 1980 to make a number of excisions to the published report in order to avoid prejudicing the interests of the corporation."—[Official Report, 3 May 1988; Vol. 132, c. 373.]

What are the Government hiding? What was cut out of the report and why can it not be published? Is the report so damaging about the privatisation prospects of the British Steel Corporation that it will deter investors?

If that is effective supervision of a nationalised company by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, it is clear that the privatised company will be turned loose with no effective control over it. That is why we want the Government to have a golden share. The fact that the Government have bungled the golden share over Britoil does not invalidate the golden share. It might invalidate its use by the Government, but it does not invalidate the principle of retaining a vestige of influence and setting the company in the right direction. The fact that the EEC has doubts about it does not invalidate the golden share. My guess is that the Government now wish that they had a golden share in BP. That is the line argued by The Independent, which, on 5 May 1988, said:

[Mr. Austin Mitchell]

"In simple truth, the Government has run into difficulty with BP because it was never envisaged that such a situation could arise."

That was a reference to the Kuwaiti investment, which is bigger than our Government's stake in BP. Kuwait, a member of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries, has more influence and control over BP than our Government. If the Government had provided themselves with the instrument which we provide for them in the amendment, that situation with BP could not have arisen.

Before the marines begin to abseil down the front of the British Steel building, unveiling the slogan "Three and threepence," as they did on BP, let us take a sensible precaution. Any Government with wisdom would maintain the vestige of public influence, national control, and point it in the direction of public involvement and interest in what will be a powerful private competitor.

Mr. Crowther: We are all probably aware that the Government have issued a press statement today, setting out what they will write into the articles of association. I think it would have been more courteous if they had let hon. Members know at the same time as they informed the press.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I did not intervene during the speech of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) when he made the same point. The press statement actually repeats the text of an answer to a parliamentary question. We followed the convention of not issuing it to the press until Parliament had been told. Our intention was that the debate on the amendment should be better informed, which could be achieved by giving advance notice of the terms of the special share that we were proposing. Whatever else we can be accused of —the hon. Member may be about to accuse us of all kinds of things—discourtesy to the House is not one of them.

Mr. Crowther: Is the Chancellor of the Duchy saying that the answer is in Hansard today?

Mr. Clarke: No, it is not. We followed the usual convention. Parliamentary questions are always answered at 3.30 pm, and press releases can be given after that. Parliamentary questions are available, as the hon. Member knows, and, if one goes to the right place in the House, one can obtain a copy of today's answers.

Mr. Crowther: I do not think that that is satisfactory. Most hon. Members will not have had the opportunity of seeing the written answer until later.

A representative of the press told me what is in the answer. As I understand it, in the first place it is intended that the Government retain a golden share in British Steel. Perhaps the Chancellor of the Duchy will tell me if I am wrong, but they are intending to limit share ownership by any individual to 15 per cent. However, whether there is a limitation on foreign ownership——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke indicated dissent.

Mr. Crowther: I see that the Chancellor of the Duchy shakes his head. That is what fills me with dismay. I thought that there was to be no limitation. However, I understood that the Government may have been agreeable to writing that limitation in. If they are not prepared to write it into the articles of association, that makes the matter worse. However, even if they had done that, I would not have found that adequate. That limitation on foreign ownership needs to be written into the legislation, which is what the amendment is all about. If we are going to protect the national interest, it is essential that this amendment is carried. The amendment deals with both those matters.

The golden share principle is fine, so long as the golden share is held by a Government who are really concerned about the national interest. I confess that I am not confident that the Government have any concern for the national interest. That is also why we need to write it into the Bill. In order to avoid uncertainty about the future ownership of the industry, a limitation on foreign ownership with no time limit needs to be written into the Bill. I believe that even the golden share principle may be limited to five years. That will be a five-year limit on the modest provisions which are now proposed.

We know, of course, that the Government are intending to push the British Steel Corporation into the private sector as soon as possible. The great danger is that this privatised company will enter into a cut-throat price war in Europe when the production quotas are lifted at the end of next month. It is now fairly clear that about 90 per cent. of all steel products in the Community will be outside the quotas. At the same time, the West Germans are still alleging—wrongly in my view—that the British steel industry is receiving Government subsidies. If the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster knows something about that that I do not know, I shall be pleased to hear it, because as far as I know there are now no Government subsidies for the steel industry——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman has invited me to intervene and I am glad to say that I agree with him on this point. I understand that some German companies are complaining about the capital write-offs that took place in the past which they claim were unfair subsidies of the British steel industry against their steel industry. Those so-called capital write-offs were cleared by the British Government with the Commission and accepted by the Commission some years ago. We agree with the European Commission that the German complaints are completely unjustified. British Steel's present position has been fairly won in the market place and reflects great credit on all those in the corporation.

Mr. Crowther: I am happy to have that assurance. However, what worries me is that the Germans may well regard their allegations—false though they may be—as a good excuse for increasing the German Government's existing subsidies which assist their industry. I admit that those subsidies are indirect, but they are nevertheless substantial.

Because of the continuing excess capacity outside Britain, which will continue for some time despite the impending closure of the Krupp works at Rheinhausen, an attempted takeover of the British Steel Corporation from another country—probably Germany—is becoming more and more probable. I am worried by that because, from the German point of view, it would make sense. Also, American steel producers which, according to a recent report, are now operating at 90 per cent. of capacity, may be looking for a way of buying into the European Community in much the same way as some Swiss companies are trying it on in the chocolate industry. That is another serious danger.

I am not concerned only about the British Steel Corporation itself. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) I am worried because the BSC stilll owns 50 per cent. of the shares in United Engineering Steels in our area. That company used to be mostly the British Steel special steels group. It is the biggest engineering steel producer in Europe. It is a successful company which, last year, made over 2 million liquid tonnes of steel, mostly in Rotherham. It made a pre-tax profit of over £36 million on sales of £577 million. It is the kind of operation that might well be attractive to predators who will think that they may get a foothold in that company by buying BSC shares. Again, that causes great concern. My constituents, and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth, who worked for United Engineering Steels are entitled to some assurance about the future ownership of the company in which they work.

I emphasise that it is not some sort of narrow chauvinistic nationalism that makes people like me worry about such matters. It is the simple conviction that Britain, British industry and the people who work in British industry still count for something in this world. They are entitled to a fair crack of the whip and to believe that the British Government are on their side, although we have seen little evidence of that recently. That may be an old-fashioned view, but it was the view of the Conservative party until it started to abandon all its traditional principles under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, who apparently thinks that a combination of empty rhetoric and wild gestures is an adequate substitute for the real policies which would allow British manufacturers to compete on equal terms with the rest of the world, instead of having to fight with their hands tied behind their backs.

At present, the British economy is more dominated by foreign-owned companies than that of any other country in western Europe. That is not something that we can be proud of as a nation. I am certainly not against foreign companies investing in new factories in Britain and creating new jobs, but I am very much against foreign companies buying British firms in order to manipulate them for their own purposes. If that were to happen to the British Steel Corporation, it would be an absolute disaster.

The Government proposals for handing over the Rover Group to British Aerospace contain no restriction whatever to prevent British Aerospace, on the expiration of five years, from selling the Rover business to anyone anywhere in the world who might be interested in buying it.

I believe that it is not a flight of fancy to suggest that in the foreseeable future vehicle manufacture, as distinct from vehicle assembly, could be coming to an end in this country. I do not want to see the steel industry, the most basic of all our industries, placed in the same hazardous position. The only way to make sure that that does not happen is to approve this amendment. If Government Members wish to demonstrate their patriotism tonight, they will vote for it.

9.15 pm

Mr. Hardy: I am delighted to follow my parliamentary neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther), because he has quite properly drawn attention to the very real need for concern about the position in south Yorkshire of the larger part of United Engineering Steels. The Government have not been very helpful in dispelling the anxieties felt by the people working there, who have contributed to establishing world records, creating profits and providing Britain with a strategically important industry.

I was extremely sorry that in the last debate I was unable to intervene as I had hoped to during the speech by the Minister of State, Welsh Office, because it would have reduced the length of his speech. However, I can make the point now and remain entirely in order. It refers to the shareholding.

The Welsh Minister said—and I am sure that the Minister, in winding up this debate, may say—that the board of the British Steel Corporation is eager to see privatisation. He gave the impression, indeed, that it is more eager than the Government, because the Minister was prepared to wait until the climate was right, while Sir Robert Scholey and his friends appear to have wanted it yesterday whether the climate was appropriate or not. The reason may be that they feel that the precedents established in other privatisations mean that they will do very well out of it.

I wanted to tell the Minister, since I am an amateur historian—I stress the word "amateur"—that my observation of privatisations over the last few years shows that the Government have been applying the rules that were applied in the Nelsonian navy in terms of the distribution of prize money to the distribution of free shares in private industry. The arrangements for the privatisation of British Telecom, British Petroleum or any of the others seems to be closely in accord with the distribution of prize money earned by the flagships, the frigates and so on in the 18th and early 19th centuries, if not before.

The distribution of shares to people in higher positions is clearly a matter of great public interest. I am grateful that my attention has been drawn to the publication of the articles of association and the details of the share arrangements. I have only received a copy in the last two or three minutes. My constituents will be most moved by the fact that they are being offered £70-worth of free shares, plus a further £2-worth of shares for each year of service. Sir Robert Scholey must have been in the industry for about 40 years, which suggests that he will be given £150-worth of shares. Some of my constituents who have worked there only 10 years will receive £90-worth. That is not an impressive way of involving people in their privatised concern.

Will the basis of distribution of free shares in this document apply throughout the industry from the chairman to the apprentice? I am a little worried that the document states that BSC pensioners applying for shares will be allowed certain facilities. Will United Engineering Steels' pensioners—those who have retired since UES was established and who may have had 30 or more years' service with the corporation before that Phoenix manifestation—have that facility extended to them?

The Government have ignored the national interest. A few months ago, together with other south Yorkshire Members, I met the Engineering Employers Federation. We were astonished to learn that British industry could now provide armour plating from only two sources. The Ministry of Defence had become extremely worried about this diminution of our strategic capacity and it invited Thyssen of Germany to tender for the engineering steel required for our defence purposes. We established that under no circumstances would the Germans allow any other country, not even an ally or another member of the European Common Market, to tender for military requirements. That suggests how low our Government's concern has been for our strategic interests.

That is not the only reason why I support the amendment. I am glad to see the Under-Secretary of State present and he will know what I am about to say. The amendment refers to takeovers. I have no great faith that all captains of British industry are fit and proper people to run the industry upon which the country depends and on which many of our constituents depend for their livelihood.

Two years ago I hesitated before I joined the demand for a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission when a company called Guinness took over a firm, Bells, which owned Canning Town glass works in my constituency—one of the most effective glassworks in Europe. Before I decided to join that demand, I wrote to Guinness to establish its intentions in respect of my constituency. I wrote two letters to the then chief executive and I was given firm assurances about its intentions. Guinness did not wait five years, which is why I am worried about a five-year golden share and why we need the protection which the amendment would afford.

The workers put their backs into the new company, demonstrated their success and more than passed the targets which the company set. The company gave such strong assurances that the ratepayers in my area gave it grants for additional work to improve the facilities at the plant. Towards the end of last year, the company announced that it was moving the administrative jobs, but it assured me that production would be untouched. Then in January came the decision to close the plant. Almost 500 jobs in Dearne valley, perhaps the area of highest unemployment, were destroyed.

When I complained, the chairman of Guinness announced that the company had never given me an assurance. Fortunately, I could present his letters which I also showed to the Under-Secretary of State. He knew that the company had behaved extremely badly when my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) and I went to see him. That is one section of the captains of British industry on which we cannot depend for our national interest.

The Minister pointed out that it is not the Government's policy to intervene in these matters, and we know that all too well. We have very good cause to know it in areas like mine. It will not be in areas like mine where a large proportion of shares in BSC or those resulting from any other privatisation will be distributed. This will be grasped more readily in the areas that have been doing very well. Concern was expressed about the green belt in the south last night; that is the sort of area I am referring to.

I believe that the amendment is entirely justified. It protects the interests of communities that have contributed to the successful condition of British Steel. It gazes realistically at the position of British commerce and business today. Perhaps those who now direct large sectors of that industry might be more appropriately placed, if not at the tables of 10 Downing street then in the Old Bailey. I am not prepared to see the interests of my constituents sacrificed to the whim of those who will trade with only the shortest term consideration and my hon. Friends are to be congratulated on tabling the amendment.

When we tabled an amendment to the Gas Bill—now the Gas Act 1986—we proposed merely that the chairman or chief executive should be a British citizen. I was called a chauvinist when I moved that amendment in Standing Committee. The Minister mocked and attacked the suggestion, until I pointed out that we had taken the amendment literally from the Act that established British Telecommunications. I am glad that we are not being so modest tonight as we were in that Committee. I am delighted that we are suggesting that the directors of the successor company to BSC should be British citizens. If we had not proposed such an amendment, and if the Government do not accept it, the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham becomes valid.

I have great anxieties about who will own the British steel industry in less than five years. Certainly I believe that there is a danger from the Germans, who know how effective our steel industry is, or that the Japanese may well look at the industry. Knowing what a soft touch we are, perhaps the next time that Nestlé and Suchard decide that they want to buy a British business, they may decide to demonstrate their interest in diversity and buy steel as well as chocolate in Yorkshire. That decision would be as logical as many made by British industry.

The amendment is valid. It should commend itself to every hon. Member who is interested in maintaining a strategic industrial capacity. Certainly I believe that it would be welcomed by those people who have made sure that British Steel is a successful industry, worth more than £2,000 million, which is the rather optimistic price that the Government will seek, according to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

By the time that the Government have carried out a few more dawn raids in Brussels, the price might have to come down—who knows?—but certainly it will be sold at far less than its value. The people who will be betrayed are those who contributed to its value in the first place.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): In supporting amendment No. 5, we are trying to provide some protection for British Steel as a major United Kingdom industry, so that it functions in the interests of its past and present employees, its customers, and the United Kingdom economy as a whole. That is not for exports, but for the many firms that feed into British Steel. That is very important, both nationally and regionally. Many secondary and tertiary industries on Teesside are dependent on British Steel, and any change in the strength and market of British Steel would have dire effects on those industries.

By the amendment we are trying to make sure that the golden share is enshrined in a formal, constitutional way within the statute. As we have seen from the press releases that we have just obtained, it will exist for only five years. Why five years? Did the Minister pick that figure by luck, or by design? I hope that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will explain and justify that period when he responds to the debate.

9.30 pm

The protection afforded by the golden share is important, and would be even more important if we had a decent Government. The 50·01 per cent. share gives us the chance of providing certain protections that are essential for the future of British Steel. First, it would provide parliamentary accountability, which is essential to the development of a major United Kingdom industry such as this. Secondly, it would maintain some formal links between Government Departments—especially the DTI —and the sponsorship of this major industry. Thirdly, it would provide additional shareholder protection. The golden share would help to inhibit price fluctuations caused by speculation. Fourthly, it would offer protection for non-shareholders. As with previous privatisations, the assets could be sold at substantial discounts. The golden share would prevent such assets being sold to overseas buyers and it would also prevent asset-stripping. These are all important reasons for protecting the industry as it moves forward into privatisation.

Other important elements must not be ignored. One is the importance of keeping British Steel as an integrated whole. Without such integration there will be problems with new products, marketing and developing new processes. Research and development—particularly on Teesside—and new capacity and facilities will not come about without protecting the nature of the integrated company and without the five plants remaining together. Integration is important also because it would mean that resource allocation and management decisions would be kept in the United Kingdom.

I hope that this protection will mean that other goods for the industry will be procured in the United Kingdom, and that research and development and the patents and licences that result from them would flow into the United Kingdom rather than out of it. The future development of the industry is important to my constituents in Redcar and to other hon. Members' constituents who depend on British Steel and on the secondary and tertiary industries which in turn depend on the company remaining integrated, not broken up.

Information technology is a good example of what happens when an industry moves to branch plants. It is bad for direct and indirect employment, for future competitiveness and for other United Kingdom manufacturers. I am sure the Minister knows of the report on software in information technology, which showed the sorts of dangers that would ensue for British Steel—the problems of technological dependency, partial supply and non-supply. We are worried that such problems would afflict the industry without the integration of its several plants spread around the country.

The golden share protects the integrity of the corporation. Without it the investment and confidence that are needed for the future of the industry will not exist. If the amendment is not accepted, I and my hon. Friends are worried that financial predators such as we saw in the Guinness and Westland affairs—or in dawn raids by Nestlé or Suchard—will feature in the future of British Steel, which would be a crime. For eight years we have suffered on Teesside, and without this amendment our future there looks bleak.

Mr. Morley: The amendment is a major step forward in what the Bill is attempting to do. It would give the Government the best of both worlds. We could argue that on the one hand they have a free standing company which operates without commercial restraint, and on the other they have the golden share and the option to make sure that whoever controls the company and is involved in it has some responsibility. Responsibilities are involved, such as the responsibility to my community. If the steel industry was removed from my constituency, it would take the very heart out of the constituency.

The Government have been consistent on these issues, as we have seen with Suchard and Rowntree, where they have shown not the slightest concern, but many hon. Members on the Government Benches have shown concern. I hope that they will show concern tonight by supporting the amendment and giving security not only to the steel industry but to the many communities which rely upon steel.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I wish, first, to answer a couple of points with which I shall not deal at length in my reply to the debate. I took note of the point made by the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) about employee shares. We shall return to that later in a debate on a suitable amendment. I accept that he is interested in what has been announced today in answer to a parliamentary question on employee shares. At this stage I can assure him that the availability of shares to employees will be on an equal footing with management throughout the rest of the company. Management will have no special rights.

I also know of the hon. Gentleman's great concern about the circumstances in which Guinness took over the company which owned Canning Town glass works because my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has discussed the case with me. Obviously this is not the time to discuss that further. I do not think that it is right to generalise, as the hon. Gentleman did, about all takeovers.

The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms. Mowlam) also raised a point, which I shall not deal with at length, about the need to keep British Steel as an integrated whole. I wish that she had been here earlier for the debate on new clause 1 which arose out of a desire of certain of her hon. Friends to see the company broken up when it is privatised. I should like to pray her in aid in saying that, whatever else happens to British Steel, at the moment it is in the national interest that it is privatised as one unit and not broken up.

The debate was really about special shares. First, I must congratulate the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), as usual, on carrying the heat and burden of the day on the Bill. I regret that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) has not returned. He teased me earlier by saying that I would vanish to have a large meal and a cigar. I have had the cigar, but I have not had the meal. I assume that the hon. Gentleman is having a good meal, wherever he is.

Apart from his leg pull, the hon. Gentleman accused me, as did the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther), of discourtesy to the House by giving details of the special share in a press notice this afternoon. I think we followed the usual convention in this place: that no announcement is made to the press until an announcement has been made to the House. There was a parliamentary question today, answered at 3.30 pm. I believe that hon. Members can always browse through the day's answers in the Library when they come in at half-past three. The parliamentary answer was followed by a press notice. I am glad that it came to the notice of both hon. Gentlemen, which means that they know the nature of the special share which we propose.

We begin at least with agreement. The Government have accepted—as I said on Second Reading that we were considering, and as my hon. Friend said in Committee—the case for a special share. As the hon. Member for Rotherham has discovered, we propose to put in the articles of the company a provision which will restrict individual shareholdings in the company to a maximum of 15 per cent. of the equity and to retain that special or golden share for a period of five years.

In several of the privatisations that the Government have taken through, we have included varying provisions for special or golden shares. As the hon. Gentleman said, no pattern has emerged because we have held that each industrial situation and each company should be judged on its merits. Our policy is as far as possible to put privatised companies into the position of any private sector company.

To varying degrees, in different terms and with different companies, we have had a look at the situation and have decided that, usually for a limited period, some sort of restraint is required on the ability of outside companies to make bids for the acquisition of other companies. In terms of British Steel, we have come up with the formulation that I have described. I shall shortly explain why we have done that. Our suggestion does not match the Opposition amendment that we are discussing. I suppose that it differs in one very significant respect because what we propose will not discriminate between British holders of equity and overseas owners of equity. We see no case for doing so in the case of British Steel because we see no defence or strategic interest in British Steel. It is a Bismarckian view to regard steel as one of the key defence industries. Many private sector steel companies have no restrictions on foreign ownership.

Mr. Crowther: I am astonished that the Minister can say that the steel industry, of all industries, has no strategic importance. Can he tell us any type of weapon that does not have steel in it?

Mr. Clarke: In terms of modern warfare, electronics is probably more important than steel and more difficult to get in the required quality, whereas the world is somewhat awash with steel of varying qualities. I am not a defence expert and the hon. Gentleman may be ahead of me in that respect, but I think that he is thinking in terms of the Franco-Prussian war rather than in terms of today's warfare.

I have recently detected to a growing extent that the Opposition are going through one of their fits of slightly anti-foreign fervour when they speak about industrial policy. The Conservative party is the patriotic party of Britain and we demonstrate that quite frequently. The Labour party goes into occasional fits of chauvinism where suddenly everyone across the Channel is some sort of dread threat to British industry. In this case, I do not think that we should go as far as the Opposition want us to go and place restrictions on foreign ownership or say that no director should be a non-British citizen. It is quite absurd to say that there should not be an American, let alone a European, director. It is absurd to say that one should have to produce a passport before one can become a director and that shareholdings should be restricted.

This is a somewhat unsuitable time for the Labour party to go through one of these anti-foreigner fits, because we are presently contemplating the implications for British industry of 1992 and the European single market. We wish to see, perhaps, much stronger Europewide companies that can compete with the Japanese and the Americans, and this is not the time to impose fancy restrictions about foreign shareholdings. Presumably such restrictions would apply to citizens of the Irish Republic and Germany and to French companies.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) has not agreed with a great deal of what I have said about the Bill. He quite rightly touched on the possibilities of Europewide integration in the steel industry. He contemplated his hobby horse of a Ravenscraig-Shotton-Dalzell company perhaps linking up with Europeans. British Steel has made it clear that it is not opposed to overseas participation in the equity of the company. I think that the hon. Member for Motherwell, South and I agree that as a private company British Steel may well contemplate some overseas acquisitions and buy into the European steel industry in order to strengthen its position in the European market.

Whatever else we are looking at in the special share, we should not be looking at a tight little national, British holding and we should not be averse to all overseas holdings or overseas equity investment on the scale that the Opposition amendment would seek to rule out. If we are contemplating a British company taking shareholdings in Europe, we cannot possibly start laying down legislative or other restrictions on European shareholdings in Britain. It is a mistake to discriminate against foreigners whether it applies to the nationality of the directors or to overseas holdings or anything else. As I said, there is some agreement between us because upon consideration we have accepted the case for having a special share in British Steel.

We have time-limited the share because we contemplate that British Steel will eventually be a private sector company like any other and should be open to all the commercial pressures that we believe improve a company's performance. Among the pressures to which management should be subject is the ordinary need to compete for market share and to achieve a decent return on capital by producing the right products and selling them in the market place, but, if performance falls, the threat of possible acquisition by people who believe that they can improve the performance of the company and who appeal to the shareholders with the prospect of acquiring the company and improving its performance is a perfectly legitimate commercial pressure.

I do not believe that all mergers are undesirable. Occasionally, the House goes into a fit to try to restrain them. Managers are usually against takeovers of their companies. If I were the manager of a company, I would want to resist anything other than a welcome acquisition of my company, because my position might be threatened. The pay and taxation of British management have now become extremely attractive and high rewards are available for high performance, although managers who take those rewards are not entitled to consider themselves as having a job for life, free from their shareholders being able to look to someone else who might acquire the company and improve the management performance, if that person thinks that he can do better. In most cases, those privatised companies should be open to the same perfectly desirable pressures.

We have opted for the special share because we believe that too early a bid might be disruptive. It is fair to give a reasonable time for the company to become established as a private sector company before it is opened to those pressures. We are privatising British Steel at a time when there is still excess capacity throughout the European market. Some other European countries must face up to the need to shed unprofitable excess capacity which is no longer producing products that can be sold. We cannot return to a stable market until that has been done. We wish to protect ourselves against the prospects of the acquisition of British Steel by someone seeking to acquire it for the purpose of closing down capacity. That is a perfectly legitimate point, and another reason for having a time-limited anti-takeover provision.

The hon. Member for Redcar asked why we had chosen five years. There is no right time. We hope that eventually British Steel will act in the market like any other private sector company. Within five years, I very much hope that the excess capacity problem will have been resolved, and I believe that five years is long enough to give what might be described as a fledgling company to establish itself in the market place and to get rid of the risks of purely predatory bids designed to cut capacity.

Dr. Bray: Will the Minister make clear the apparent limitation of the special share that he is proposing? Will he confirm, first, that the Government are able to agree to a person holding more than 15 per cent? They can agree to that at any time, so there is only the possibility that they might block a takeover bid. Secondly, will he confirm that the special shareholder will have no other rights in respect of other provisions in the articles or in respect of voting and that, in other words, it is solely a possible blocking function in respect of a person holding more than 15 per cent?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is quite correct, but I shall not go into that in detail now. It may be a further point of division between us.

On the hon. Gentleman's second point, we do not intend to use the special share for the purpose of intervening in the company's commercial decisions. That is a case of division between the Government and, for example, the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, who believes that the Government should continue to exercise an influence. We do not intend to do that through our policy.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's first point, certainly there is only a right to use the blocking mechanism. If the Government chose not to exercise that right, we would be answerable to the House for our decision if for some reason a larger than 15 per cent. holding was not contrary to the national interests or the interests of steel consumers or employees. The hon. Gentleman's description was quite right.

Finally, I want to consider why we have not included the special share in the Bill but are merely undertaking via a parliamentary answer to include it in the articles of association. I hope that hon. Members will agree that that is a technical point. A parliamentary reply to a question is binding and we intend to include the special share in the articles of association.

The suggestion was raised in Committee that the golden share might give rise to litigation. No doubt we have all taken legal advice. However, anything can give rise to litigation, as lawyers are always happy to say. The prospects of litigation of the kind that hon. Members fear is slight. People who take shares in the private sector company when it is floated will be aware that they are taking shares in a company within which there is a special share. I am advised that they would have no prospect of redress if subsequently they tried to claim that the use of the special share was contrary to the overriding interest of the company to act in the interests of the shareholders.

There is at least some agreement between the Government and the Opposition on this amendment. The disagreements are about foreign holdings and foreign management. We see no reason to be against that in principle, but we see a need to protect the company against takeover while it is a fledgling industry. We see a need to protect the company while there is an excess capacity problem and the risk that competitors will buy the company to close it down. At least we have gone part way towards meeting the Opposition. I await the Opposition's response. Perhaps we will end on a note of happy accord.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: If the Minister calls that moving part way, I am not sure what he would call long-distance running. The Minister's response was pathetic. It is no wonder that he had to trail his parliamentary answer this afternoon—which was itself a shabby device—so that we should not be too stunned by incredulity at the inadequacy of his comments. To assume that we were thronging the Library at 3.30 pm to skim through the parliamentary answers is an excuse designed to disguise the total shabbiness of the manoeuvre of leaking information in that way.

It is always possible to tell when something nefarious is afoot. It is leaked in a written answer to a stooge question asked by a page boy in this particular case—[Interruption.] Ministers could have given us information in Committee. They dared not do that. They held out grandiose prospects of a golden share with real meaning, because they knew that if they told us the reality they would have to face long barracking opposition in Committee rather than the co-operation that they received. They knew that they would have to face much more hostility.

As defined in the Bill, the golden share is practically useless. It goes no way towards meeting the proposals that we have put forward. The limitations that the Minister revealed about the golden share in response to questions from my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) are pathetic.

It is not that the mountains of labour have produced a ridiculous mouse. The mouse does not even have a squeak. It is a pathetic creature. When we consider the golden share, we must bear in mind the nature of the world into which the BSC will be turned loose as a public limited company. It will not be sold to Sid like British Telecom or British Gas. Sid is not in the market. I imagine that Sid's hands are firmly in his pockets, if he has any sense.

The Minister clearly does not want to sell the company to the small shareholder. It is also clear from the parliamentary answer that he does not envisage much employee participation. The gesture made to employees in the parliamentary answer is insulting. Seventy pounds worth of free shares and a further £2 of shares for each year of service is insulting as a gesture to those who have worked in the industry, seen it slimmed down and their jobs threatened. Nothing is offered to those who have sacrificed their jobs in the massive rundown of the industry that has taken place under this Government.

That share offer, which we shall be discussing tomorrow, is an insult. However, it is clear that a small shareholder company or an employer participation company is not envisaged. It will be a company for the big boys, turned loose for the big investors—the top 1 per cent. of the population, the institutions, and possibly, because the steel industry is an incestuous world, its competitors, too. We want to guard against that. In an area where big investors will be operating and in which British Steel will not have a broad shareholding base—which is what the Government wanted for British Telecom—there is a danger that it will fall prey to the wrong people. That is why we want the safeguards in our amendment.

Steel is a tough and peculiar industry. It is conventional to distance oneself from competitors by an occasional punch in the ribs and a sally of exports into competitors' markets. It is also conventional to take shareholdings in one's rivals, to damp down competition and to maintain cartel-like relationships. The danger is that competitors will take a stake in British Steel—particularly European competitors, because they are the closest and those with which British Steel is in most intense competition for its markets.

It is our contention that control of British Steel should remain in this country. Only British investors and the Government of this country have the interests of the nation in mind. It will be in the interests of others to take a stake in British Steel, perhaps to increase the company's prices, to dampen the competition that it poses and to reduce its exports. It may be their intention not to invest in British Steel but to run it down. Foreign shareholders do not want a healthy foreign competitor, and if they take a stake in British Steel it will be with those intentions in mind. We want to safeguard against that situation by means of the golden share.

It is also possible that foreign shareholders will wish to take a stake in British Steel for financial reasons. It will be possible for them to demand the maximum return and maximum dividends on the minimum investment, and to require that British Steel is run in such a way as to cream off the market rather than to build up the industrial strength of this country.

Contrary to what was said by the Minister, there is also a defence interest. By weakening the industrial capacity of this country, the Government have practically eliminated our ability to fight a war or a sustained conflict. They have decimated engineering and shipbuilding and done much damage to our steel-making capacity. It comes ill from such a Government to say that steel is not essential in the fighting of any conflict or in any other military endeavour. Steel is the very sinews of war. It would have been impossible to undertake even the Falklands conflict without it.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have already made the point to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) about the dated nature of his argument. Defence sales represent about 5 per cent. of British Steel's turnover. The Ministry of Defence could decide, for purposes of tendering, to extend competition to German firms, for instance, because it must be remembered that the Germans are on our side now. West Germany is a friendly nation.

Mr. Mitchell: I am glad that the Minister is able to give me that permanent guarantee, and I look forward to exercising it in the future. Special steels in particular—it is a highly specialised field—are essential to any defence capability. For that capability to slip outside the control of this country will mean a loss of national sovereignty and of power. We cannot fight a sustained conflict without a steel industry. We want that industry to be sustained under British control and British investment. It must not become prey to competitors in the way that is likely to occur unless the special share is written into the Bill.

We want British Steel to produce to capacity as part of British manufacturing industry. Steel is a cyclical industry. If it is producing to capacity, money pours out of its ears, but if it is producing under capacity, it becomes a bottomless pit into which one must throw money. That is one risk, but the risk also is that under this Government British Steel faces a very hard future until we have a Labour Government in the 1990s dedicated to rebuilding Britain's manufacturing and industrial strength. That Labour Government will want a powerful, independent, British steel industry to produce the sinews of our manufacturing strength. That is why we shall pursue the amendment in the Division Lobbies.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Further consideration of the Bill adjourned.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Bill to be further considered tomorrow.

Joint Research Centre and the EUREKA Programme

10.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John Butcher): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9454/87 and 5616/88 on the Joint Research Centre and 10845/86 on EUREKA and Community Science and Technology; and supports the Government's aims of raising the quality and relevance of the work at the Joint Research Centre and of using EUREKA to help British industry become more competitive in world markets.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The motion refers to European Community document No. 5616/88. The Scrutiny Committee has not looked at that document, which recently arrived at Whitehall. The explanatory memorandum was issued within the past two or three days. Had the Scrutiny Committee been able to see the document last Wednesday it might well have concluded that this matter did not materially affect the course of the debate, but the debate on the document occurs a little too soon. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that and on the timetable of the debate in relation to the decision in Brussels, with which it may well be connected.

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). As a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation, I should like to raise a similar matter in connection with this document. There is at least one other document which the Scrutiny Committee has recommended should be considered by the House—that on the mutual recognition of higher education diplomas. That matter will be decided within a short time by the European Council and has been recommended for debate, yet we have not been given the opportunity to discuss it. This seems to be an odd juxtaposition of business.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the Minister has heard what has been said. The motion is in order.

Mr. Butcher: It may be helpful if I deal immediately with the matter raised by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) before going into the main body of my speech.

European Community documents Nos. 9454/87 and 5616/88 deal with the Joint Research Centre. The first document forms the original basis for the debate on the JRC. I am aware that the second document, 5616/88, has not yet been considered by the European Legislation Committee. I apologise for the fact that we have not given the Committee time to give us the benefit of its advice on this second document, which contains slightly amended proposals on the JRC. It was only recently provided by the Commission. After careful consideration, we did not consider that it merited postponement of the debate, in view of the pressure on the Parliamentary timetable and, more important, so that we could have the view of the House well in advance of the next Research Council meeting, which will be on 29 June, when further negotiations are scheduled.

We shall be delighted to receive any further observations of the Committee well in advance of that date, if that is its wish. The House has exercised its right in the highest form by debating these two issues this evening. I assure the hon. Member for Newham, South that my hon. Friends and I will carefully examine the record of this evening's exchanges. We will find it helpful to have that in advance of our negotiations on 29 June.

Mr. Haselhurst: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said, but he will understand the perplexity of members of the European Legislation Committee when there is uneven treatment by the Government of measures that are put forward. We are not ungrateful for the fact that the House has been given the opportunity to discuss this matter, but it is odd that it should be discussed before the Select Committee has seen the document, especially when there are the measures to which I referred on a point of order which we recommended for debate but which have not been considered.

Mr. Butcher: I shall draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend in another Department the subject matter on which my hon. Friend would like a debate. However, as I said in my response to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), there was a delay in the documents coming from the Commission. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster explained the complication and the difficulties of the time table in a letter to the Committee. I readily conceded that under more ideal circumstances this should not happen, and we will take into account the views expressed for by the House. As requested, we have supplied the day for the debate. I hope the House will consider that I have observed the courtesies in that explanation to the hon. Gentleman and that I can now proceed to explain what these two issues are all about.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I am also a member of the Select Committee on European Legislation. Although we understand the position as expressed by my hon. Friend, the fact remains that, as we move nearer to the implementation of the internal market, with the increased use of article 100A and the accelerated procedure that that must involve, there will clearly be a greater need for closer observation of the requirements that have been laid down by resolution of the House. Further, there is a strong case for the changes in the terms of reference of the Committee to ensure that, in the avant-project stage,. there is greater opportunity for consideration of those matters that cannot be met exclusively by other Parliaments. The Committee needs to be fully involved at an earlier stage. I hope my hon. Friend will accept that as a short interruption, but one that I regard as highly important.

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. I do not disagree with a word of what he has said. There is the additional factor of the sheer volume of measures, directives and papers that are now emerging. This means that all Whitehall Departments must be vigilant in ensuring that the Scrutiny Committee and, if it so recommends, the House have ample opportunities to look at those well in advance, if necessary, of decisions being made.

As I explained earlier, we are dealing with two issues tonight which bring together two very different ventures which in some ways characterise the old and the new approaches to European collaboration in research and development. What both have in common is that they need to remain flexible and attuned to Europe's needs. It is illuminating to compare and contrast the two.

The first is the European Community's Joint Research Centre. It is the Community's own public laboratory, financed by the Community member states, with the European Commission bearing responsibility for its overall management. Long-established, it seems increasingly to have lost its way and is now failing to respond to the Community's needs. The Commission's proposals seek to correct that state of affairs.

EUREKA, on the other hand, is a very much newer and different venture. It brings together European industrial partners, both from within the Community and outside. It avoids bureaucratic central control. Responsibility for initiatives rests with the industrial participants themselves and flexibility of response is very much the keynote of its success. The Commission document addresses the specific aspect of co-operation between EUREKA and the European Community.

The JRC is a considerable undertaking, with four laboratories in different member states of the Community —Ispra in Italy, Karlsruhe in the Federal Republic of Germany, Geel in Belgium, and Petten in the Netherlands.

The JRC's last four-year research programme, covering the years 1984 to 1987, showed a total staff complement of 2,260, of whom about three quarters were at the largest laboratory at Ispra and with a central management team in Brussels. Total expenditure was some 700 million ecu, roughly 26 per cent. of the Community's total R and D expenditure at that time.

It is not possible to understand the problems that we are facing at the JRC today without going a little further back into its history. It was established in 1957 for the joint conduct in the European Community of nuclear research for peaceful purposes. In the 1950s nuclear power was a young science and the many important subsequent developments in the safe generation of nuclear energy were still in the future. By the late 1980s the nuclear industry is, by any standards, mature and the nuclear research community in all countries has developed with it.

At the JRC, however, one might be forgiven for thinking that time has stood still. It is true that the range of its activities has widened, but as recently as the period 1984 to 1987, 60 per cent. of the JRC's research programme remained in nuclear fission and reactor studies, with a further 7 per cent. concerned with nuclear fusion. Non-nuclear energy studies accounted for a further 6 per cent. Some 14 per cent. was concentrated on the environment and only another 14 per cent. was devoted to research into industrial technologies.

In short, the JRC has not diversified its activities as have comparable public laboratories in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. It has not stayed in step with the rest of the Community's R and D effort, which is directed ever more to improving the competitive position of European industry.

That is not acceptable for what, under the Commission's proposal, amounts to nearly 1 billion ecu of expenditure—or £700 million—at the JRC between 1988 and 1991. We are, therefore, looking to the JRC to earn an increasing share of its expenditure from external customers and to accomplish more from the still substantial financial resources that would continue to be provided by the Community's framework programme. Despite growth in external earnings, those resources are expected to amount to about 700 million ecu—£500 million—or some 13 per cent. of the framework programme. Only the ESPRIT programme of 1·6 million ecu is larger. The United Kingdom has been outspoken in its criticisms and in pointing out that this unhappy situation cannot continue, and we are now far from alone in making that judgment.

Last year a panel of distinguished European industrialists prepared a report which was sharply critical of the JRC. They advocated major reform. They urged faster movement towards a larger proportion of external contracts for customers outside the Commission. Other Community member states have similarly stressed the need and the Joint Research Centre's own board of governors —which is at present more an advisory body than a governing board in the true sense.

I am glad to say that in its proposal the Commission faces the need for change. It provides a good basis for further discussion, even though it does not go as far as we believe is required. Above all, we need to make faster progress and to see a greater sense of urgency on the Commission's part.

We accept that change at the JRC cannot happen overnight, but the problems have been allowed to slip for too long. Our public laboratories in this country started long ago to adopt a more commercial approach to their work. The JRC has to face change which may be more harsh than if it had been tackled earlier. Now is the moment when the JRC must be given clear guidelines for the future.

The Commission has a key responsibility. The Single European Act highlighted its role in the management of the Community's joint R and D effort. It should make no mistake. The JRC, representing such a large proportion of that total effort, will demonstrate whether or not it is prepared to discharge that responsibility effectively.

It is our intention to work rapidly towards the conclusion of an agreement with the Commission, the European Parliament and other member states which will set the targets for a Joint Research Centre that will increasingly show real vitality and responsiveness to customers' needs.

We shall expect the Joint Research Centre to go after more demanding targets for growth in external contracts and to accept tighter financial targets overall. We are looking for a target that by 1991 at least 20 per cent. of the JRC's turnover will come from work for public or private customers external to the Commission. This is a demanding target, but not an unreasonable one. Only in this way can we be sure that the stills at the JRC will be more widely tested as well as becoming more widely available.

We shall expect clear-cut principles governing the JRC"s relationship to the customers for its work. These customers must include the various directorates general of the European Commission, which must be free to turn to laboratories other than the JRC if they consider their research needs would be better met elsewhere.

We shall expect a more rapid turnover of staff. Some members of staff may wish to leave. New blood will be required as well. The JRC must have the right staff with the right disciplines. Its staff costs must come down.

We shall expect the JRC management to be given clearer responsibilities, to pay more heed to the advice of customers and experts from Community member states, and to demonstrate the ability to improve the quality of JRC research in areas where it has been deficient.

We shall expect the executive role of the board of management to be strengthened too.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As a member of the indirectly elected European Parliament Budget Committee who on several occasions has been to Ispra, may I ask whether the Minister agrees that the root of the matter is Italian law and all its difficulties? The Minister says that we must have a turnover. It is difficult to get any kind of turnover once one accepts that Italian law operates, at any rate in relation to local employees. Having tried, as a Member of the European Parliament, to negotiate with the Italian trade unions, let me say that it is extremely difficult to get things changed as the Minister is suggesting.

Mr. Butcher: If tonight we were looking for a model of the sort of operation and apparatus that we should like to see, we need not go further than an establishment not too far from the constituencies of the hon. Members for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray)—the National Engineering Laboratory. It and other research establishments have responded positively to the freer movement that is now taking place in engineering disciplines. They are responding to the market, looking for external contracts and are being successful.

I do not wish to go into the question of Italian practices. On many occasions we have debated Spanish practices. The question of employment conditions in Italy as they affect research-based workers must be addressed within the new disciplines that we are putting before the House tonight. In rehearsing our negotiating stance, those who will pursue the negotiations are aware of these questions. Perhaps they do not have such vivid experience as the hon. Gentleman, but I assure him that his point will not be lost on those who speak for us in the third week of June.

The United Kingdom wants to see in the JRC a modern, worthwhile, scientific institution. We want to see relevant research programmes, effective management, and an efficient operation. I hope that this will not be the last chance to get it.

EUREKA is an initiative presenting unique opportunities and challenges to British and European industry, as I shall briefly explain to the House. Established in 1985, with considerable United Kingdom influence, EUREKA's goal is to help Europe compete with the rest of the world and to win markets for advanced technology goods and services. This can be achieved only by strengthening European and United Kingdom industrial productivity and competitiveness, and by exploiting the single market as a springboard for worldwide sales. EUREKA's purpose, therefore, is to foster and facilitate pan-European collaboration in high-risk, technical projects. But the choice of projects is left to industry—the so-called "bottom-up" approach.

Fostering projects does not create wealth. Profits come only from successful exploitation in the market place. EUREKA aims at achieving that outcome through a flexible, collaborative framework within the 19 member countries. The driving force comes from industry, with national Administrations and the Commission playing an important role, making sure that the economic conditions are right and that the European market is ready for exploitation.

What does EUREKA provide in the way of incentives for industry to take up the challenge of pan-European collaboration? First, it provides a network of national EUREKA offices for bringing projects and partners together. Secondly, and most important, it provides supportive measures. Put simply, these are steps taken by Governments towards improving a project's commercial prospects; for example, the adoption of a new common standard or regulatory measure. Lastly, EUREKA offers political commitment from all 19 member countries and the Commission, which is a member in its own right, to removing obstacles to collaboration, and ultimately commercial exploitation.

The real hallmark of EUREKA is the nature of its projects, which are industry led and market driven. Participants are free to manage them as they wish with the minimum of red tape. The projects can be in any area of advanced technology and can cover the full spectrum of research and development. There is no central bureaucracy for the participants to deal with, no single pool of funding with conditions attached that the participants must meet, no preconceived strategies or limitations imposed on them, no prescribed EUREKA contract restricting their freedom to negotiate, and no regulations on the way participants establish and run their projects.

I have already said that EUREKA is not simply a funding mechanism. Firms wishing to make their own private financial arrangements are free to participate in and benefit from EUREKA, just as much as those being publicly funded by their national Governments. Each member country is free to make its own funding provisions for her national participants.

This, then, is the theory of EUREKA in outline. But is it working? The answer so far is clearly yes, for there are now more than 160 agreed projects, involving a total estimated investment cost of nearly £3 billion. Most projects have a duration spanning two to five years. Most of them are therefore still at the early stages, but the signs already point to these projects having a major impact in the future. Just over half these projects involve estimated costs of under £7 million. In another third, project costs lie between £7 million and £35 million, and for the remainder the costs are still bigger, with four projects exceeding a forecast spend of £70 million. Even more pleasingly, British participants are involved in one third, or 56 of these projects, 14 being United Kingdom-led and having an estimated total investment cost of £1·1 billion.

To give the House a flavour of the project mix so far, about 35 per cent. are in information technology, 18 per cent. in robotics and manufacturing, 13 per cent. in biotechnology, 12 per cent. in new materials and the rest mostly cover lasers, energy, telecommunications and the environment. Specific examples involving the United Kingdom are HDTV which is a European competitor to the Japanese and American versions of the next generation of TV for the 1990s, EUROLASER or the application of lasers to industrial production technology, and FAMOS, or new flexible, automated manufacturing systems.

Through that outline description of EUREKA I hope that I have helped the House to understand better what makes EUREKA so special and the reasons why it has a priority role in my Department's research and technology initiative. It ensures that United Kingdom firms form part of a stronger European technological capability through industry-led projects with European partners, and that United Kingdom firms are well placed to take advantage of the completion of the single market.

As the motion states, my Department's aim is to use EUREKA to help British industry become more competitive in world markets. Through EUREKA our innovators can combine strengths and share risks with their counterparts in Europe, free to profit from their undoubted talents and enterprise, through the critical mass and synergy which characterise all EUREKA projects. The rest of Europe is taking up the EUREKA challenge, and British firms must do the same if they are not to miss the boat.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Does my hon. Friend accept that, in addition to the advantages that he has enumerated, there is evidence from those who have attended debates in the European Parliament, as I have done, of the coming together, perhaps for the first time, of our parliamentary colleagues in the European Parliament and ourselves in looking to opportunities in the regions and in our constituencies? Collaboration between European and Westminster parliamentarians can provide the basis for an active role in furthering the process that my hon. Friend has been outlining tonight.

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. The additional advantage that accrues to these projects is that they extend outside the 12 or 13 countries within the Community.

I know that our colleagues in the House who have strong connections with Europe have mainly become great supporters of EUREKA, not least because at the beginning it was seen as a counterbalance to the growing strength of American research and development work in certain key technologies. It is to the credit of those who saw EUREKA as a major opportunity—I see my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie) here today—that the programme has moved so fast and so many excellent projects have been brought forward already.

From what I have said, the House will be clear that EUREKA is quite different from other collaborative programmes, such as Community research and development, of which the JRC is a part. EUREKA is not in competition with these other programmes. It complements them and provides a major route for exploiting the pool of raw technology coming through from these other programmes. This applies particularly to the exploitation of the fruits of the Community's research programmes, which point leads me to the third document, 10845/86, concerning links between EUREKA and Community science and technology.

The Government's view is that these links will become clearer through following the case-by-case approach, as the Research Council concluded in December 1986. Since then, there has been very little progress. However, I am pleased to inform the House that, following the most recent meeting of the Research Council on 11 April 1988, the Commission will be bringing forward new proposals for clarifying these matters.

Mr. Dalyell: What, in the Government's view, is the reason for the delay since 1986?

Mr. Butcher: The various partners have been anxious that the EUREKA programme should be complementary to other programmes. There has been a continuing discussion about the relationship of ESPRIT, BRITE and other aspects of the framework programme. If there has been crab-like progress in the interim, that is because Ministers from different countries may have wanted value for money and non-duplication of resources. That is my assessment of one of the major factors. The Government's view is that these links will become clearer by following the case-by-case approach. There seems to be no dissension about the fact that that process has served us well.

We wish these proposals to recognise that EUREKA is indeed a natural route for exploiting the results of Community R and D, and also that some of the R and D needs identified by work under EUREKA could be more appropriately carried out under a Community programme. The best way forward remains the step-by-step approach that we have advocated from the beginning. Only by close collaboration between projects, EUREKA officials and the Commission can the right decisions be made, consistent with EUREKA's bottom-up philosophy.

In view of what I have said, this debate is most timely. With regard to both the JRC and EUREKA, our basic aims are value for money and to help British industry become more competitive in world markets. I therefore commend the motion to the House.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The House is indebted to the Select Committee on European Legislation for juxtaposing these documents. I fully understand its members' complaints about not having had time to consider one of them, but I should have thought that a more justifiable general complaint was that the House was generally far too dilatory about considering the papers that the Select Committee recommends to it. The Committee has certainly made helpful observations about the documents.

We support the Government's intention to tighten up the management of the joint research centres. They need to be more clearly pointed at objectives and integrated with industry. They need to update their range of concerns to bring them into line with those which industry and society face.

However, I find no great contribution in the Government's approach to positive thinking about what the joint research centres should be doing. For instance, if the Government were thinking positively about the jobs that the centres need to do, their thinking could not be encompassed by the present framework of the joint research centres.

Let us consider one piece of work that should clearly be done nowadays on a European basis: the maintaining of absolute standards of mass, length, time and so on. Historically, that has been perhaps the principal mission of the National Physical Laboratory in this country. We devote an inadequate and incorrectly scaled effort to that area. It is not justifiable to do it on a national basis. It becomes expensive if one gets involved in hydrogen masers, and so on, which are of great interest for radio telescopes, radio astronomy work, and co-ordinating and synchronising signals across the diameter of the earth and out to the satellites. It is not exactly the sort of thing that is done on a tiny budget to measured time standards in the National Physical Laboratory.

If Europe as a whole is to do sensible work on the management of time standards, it must encompass the frontiers of research on the one hand and working down through the different levels of application to the grass roots implementation of standard services to industry on the other. The National Physical Laboratory used to do that. It is beyond the scope of the budget it can hope for today, but it would be reasonable to ask the joint research centres to do it, although I am not thinking necessarily of any existing joint research centres. It might be sensible to enlarge the framework of scientific and technical activity which is covered by the joint research centres.

If the Government were willing to put positive thinking into the work programme, they would find it much easier to deal with some of the intractable problems which I am sure they are faced with in ESPRIT and elsewhere in the JRCs. If the Government appear to be on the side of the people with whom they are working, and if they share their technical interest and the view that they have an essential contribution to make to industry and society, it is more likely that those people will be on the Government's side and will be willing to accept the major changes which are needed in their work and organisation.

I ask the Government, not just from a British point of view, to consider the traditions of the great national laboratories in Germany and France and ask what benefits we can gain from the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique in France and the Max Planck institutes in Germany. The Government should ask how the work of the JRCs fits into the wider context of what Europe should be covering in science. I can well understand the Government and the Commission running a mile at the thought of subjecting a wider range of scientific activity to the present management and structure of the JRCs, but that is not the necessary end point of the freer thinking which the Government should initiate.

To put the different parts of the picture into a pattern, on EUREKA it is bottom up, industry-led and market-driven, but basically it is a familiar pattern of technological support to the many schemes which we have had in this country. Those who know how to operate them know how to put in applications; they know the procedure in departments and they get their proposals through. Approval is not automatic, nor is there an overall, coherent industrial programme of application lying behind it.

The Government may say that its very strength is that it is intended to be industry-led, market-driven, bottom up and all that, but it can result in an extraordinary jumble of variable-quality work without necessarily achieving the increase in technological competitiveness which we seek, say, in electronic components or in mechanical engineering so that Europe can fully match the best that is available in the United States in professional equipment or in Japan in consumer products.

The Select Committee on European Legislation and the European Commission point us to the need for examining the relationship between EUREKA and the collaborative programme of the European Community generally—ESPRIT, RACE, BRITE and so on. In this, there is a quite different approach in that there is, for example in RACE a clear perception not only of the sort of technology developments that will take place in telecommunications, but of the developments that will take place in standards and applications. Clear developments are already under way in important software areas, and to their credit the Government support and recognise those in other ways.

BRITE takes traditional technologies and industries and begins to explore the immense potential for the upgrading of the technology used in many rather down-to-earth industries. ESPRIT is reaching a significant volume of activity and should offer the prospects of major initiatives. I hope that those initiatives will be followed up by industry.

The joint research centres are being looked at rather narrowly as a revamping of a particular research organisation which is perhaps rather dead on its feet. EUREKA is very much a first come, first served programme that is industry-led and market-driven, but it has no special industrial logic. Then there are the specific technology area of programmes such as ESPRIT, RACE, BRITE and so on. They have industrial logic and a clear technology strategy.

The reason for a certain sense of dissatisfaction about the overall pattern in Britain is that the Government do not offer any overall strategy for industrial and technological development. They rather positively turn their face against that. It is not simply that no clear picture is emerging in Britain for developments for broad band, space fusion and so on, but that the basic underlying logic is not clear. The Government follow the general principle of non-intervention and say that the free market must provide.

In the early days after 1979, the Government started to develop a clear understanding that there are some things that industry could not do well or could not do at all and on which the Government needed to take a positive initiative. I attribute a good deal of that initiative to the influence of Duncan Davies who, as chief scientist in the Department of Trade and Industry, had a good deal of influence upon Lord Keith Joseph. I understand that directly from Mr. Davies. That pattern has not been carried through to the enterprise initiative or whatever it is called—the one in which the arrow comes up one's backside—in the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): It is a harpoon.

Dr. Bray: I am grateful for that explanation.

We urgently need a statement about the Government's overall science and technology policy. That cannot wait until the next election. It must have urgent attention or we will lose desperately important time. The statement should embrace a Government reply to the strategy document of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and the practical, down-to-earth concerns about the supply of scientists and engineers and the support developments needed in the education system and the school curriculum.

Once in place, that overall strategic plan for the application of science and technology would enable us to make a positive contribution to European science and technology. It would also enable us to take a positive approach to the joint research councils and build them up into the genuine European science framework that Europe justifies and requires. It would enable us to integrate EUREKA with the much more positively mission-orientated approach offered by the other programmes. It could begin to get into Europe as a whole the sort of technological initiatives that we badly need and that our European partners, in their own interests, would like to join us in furthering.

[Dr. Bray]

Sir Geoffrey Pattie (Chertsey and Walton): I wish to say a few words about the joint research centres, particularly the centre at Ispra.

The commentary by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs on the documents represents a reasonable behind-the-scenes achievement by the Government in their negotiations, but it shows that there is still a great deal more work to be done. Bearing in mind the difficulties to be surmounted, particularly the obdurate nature of the relevant commissioner, I do not want to underestimate the magnitude of the Government's task. However, the performance of the establishment at Ispra in recent years has been nothing less than a scandal because it has conducted a series of irrelevant programmes. During the time that I was involved in the Department of Trade and Industry, I could never find anyone in any Government or in the appropriate circles in Brussels who could say what the organisation was supposed to be doing and to try to change its tack proved to be absolutely impossible.

The panel of industrialists referred to in the Government's commentary reported on the future role of the joint research centre and recommended

"a much larger customer orientation and a re-structuring of the largest JRC establishment at Ispra in Italy. In its proposals the Commission recognise the need for change and have taken account of some of the principles set out by the Panel. However, a large part of the customer orientation will consist of work for other Commission Directorates."

We see here the sadness and reservation in the words of the officials drafting the text—for example, that the Commission has taken account only of "some of the principles set out by the Panel."

The document continues:

"Work for genuinely external parties is expected to increase from about 10 per cent. at present to only 14 per cent. by 1991."

As the Department fairly says:

"In negotiations so far we have been pressing for this target to be raised to 20 per cent."

I pay tribute to what the Government have been able to achieve so far, but the task is enormous. We should all like to see the various programmes improved, but, in view of waste of this order—hundreds of millions of units of account—it becomes scandalous. The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) mentioned his experience in dealing with the Italian trade unions. As he well knows, that is all part of the solidity and intractability of the situation. The people involved, whether Italian nationals or not, are completely locked into a series of programmes. It is verging on the obscene at a time when there is great pressure on the budget and we would like to see money released and used for other purposes.

I hope that the steps reported to the House tonight for a new structure for all the joint research centres will lead to an improvement and a dramatic change at Ispra. My hon. Friend the Minister, in his introductory remarks, mentioned the problems that even the board of governors has experienced. I know, from talking to the chief scientific adviser to the Government, that the governors have a great advisory role. They can submit a report and make suggestions, yet the joint research centre at Ispra carries on exactly as before.

All those things must change. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to maintain the pressure. A series of first steps have been reported to us tonight, largely taken as a result of the pressure that this country and others have brought to bear. In the time that I represented the United Kingdom at the Research Council, I did not find another Minister representing any of our partners—it was not a case of Britain being isolated in that respect—who know what Ispra was doing. Therefore, there was total unanimity about that.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will maintain the pressure and regard what is being reported to the House tonight as the start. I welcome what my hon. Friend has told us tonight about EUREKA. The United Kingdom played a full part in getting that series of programmes into a relevant format. Department of Industry and Foreign Office officials worked extremely hard on that and continue to do so. I believe that the Commission has never particularly liked or welcomed EUREKA programmes. They are a little maverick and involve awkward people from outside the Community. Although the memorandum has some pleasant things to say about EUREKA, in the overlap sections there are other comments about the various programmes that are duplicated—as is their tendency.

I add those comments about EUREKA while welcoming what my hon. Friend said about the programme. I urge him to keep up the pressure.

11.1 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): There are obviously two aspects to the motion before the House. I hope that it is acceptable for me to qualify my comments by introducing a slightly jarring note about the clear general acceptance of criticism of the system, the need for reform and for the British Government to take a positive role in pushing for that reform. I do not dispute the need for that. However, the Government are not formulating a clear direction where they believe things should be going. I am sure that the Minister is aware that there is a lack of confidence in the Government's domestic approach to research and science in general. Against that background, there is legitimate suspicion about the Government's objective in terms of the pressure that they are bringing to bear in the Community.

That is borne out in the motion. As has been accepted, the joint research centre needs to be reformed, targeted and given specific direction. The explanatory memorandum states:

"The JRC's activities are relevant to the creation of the single market"— something that will concern us all—

"to the improvement of the Community's industrial competitiveness, to the protection of the environment and to the enhancement of safety."

I wonder why the Government's motion refers only to helping

"British industry become more competitive in world markets" and excludes the relevant references to other factors. Is that because the Government have decided that research projects have no business doing anything other than promoting competitiveness?

I am not disputing the desire for competitiveness. However, I believe that the other objectives are also important, relevant and worth supporting. I should like the Minister to tell us whether he agrees with me, or whether the exclusion of those factors from the motion is significant.

Reference has been made to the need to push research according to market or near-market considerations. It has been obvious for a long time that the Government have a warmth for EUREKA rather than for the joint research centre for that reason. That is perhaps understandable and consistent. I have no objection to attempts aimed at ensuring commercial relevance and research taking account of its applicability and commercial accountability. However, does the Minister accept that too much pressure in those areas can prejudice useful follow-up research?

That aspect is of particular concern to the scientific community when it sees that pure research is being squeezed out of the system at the same time. My understanding is that researchers complain that they are prevented from following up opportunities which may lead in interesting directions because they do not have immediate commercial relevance. I am worried that the general thrust of the Government's contribution seems to militate against such work.

Will the Minister tell the House how he believes the EUREKA projects can usefully be assessed and evaluated? Reading the documents, one sees figures on the number of projects and how much money is involved, but it is not clear how useful those projects are. Reference has been made to duplication and overlap, but, leaving that aside, is there not a method for evaluating how valuable research has been and what kind of results have been produced?

In the Alvey programme, the Government have gone for fairly rigorous testing and have subsequently ordered cuts. It would be interesting to know whether the Government have any constructive proposals for evaluation.

Arising from that—perhaps this is putting the matter too simply, but the Minister will know about this more than I do—fears have been expressed about instances where two large companies, which operate from different locations in two European countries, get together and qualify for a research project that really does not provide anything new or dynamic. If so, the present system of evaluation is neither useful nor valid. The Government could make some valid input by making constructive proposals for dealing with such situations.

Will the Minister tell the House how smaller companies can cut themselves in? If the situation is as I have described, it is clear that larger companies with larger research organisations, and having a greater degree of sophistication, find out fairly rapidly how to milk the system, whereas small companies, which do not have the same guidance and opportunities, are shut out. I can only say in a very mundane way that, having experience of working for small or medium-size companies in my own area—in the days when they existed—which sought access to funding under European or British Government innovation projects, it is apparent that the sophisticated companies corner the market and that small companies are squeezed out. It would be nice to see the Government pressing for a role for small companies and helping to secure a greater share of relevant funding.

I have asked one or two quesions which I hope will be considered relevant. I believe that if this debate is to follow through constructively, the Government—I do not wish to stray beyond the bounds of order—must give us a clear idea of their own science and research policy, over and above trying to ensure near market or market commercial accountability.

Many people in this country are proud of the fact that Britain has a good research record, but they are worried that our application of that research is not always as good as it could be and that the pressure applied by the Government will not solve the problem. They believe that applying that pressure will result in the quality and volume of pure research being squeezed, without any noticeable increase in the successful application of research to the country's advantage.

I look forward to the Minister's replies with interest. I hope that the Government will steer future debates more clearly, showing that their lead is not a purely negative one about waste and duplication, but a slightly more positive one on accountability, how small businesses are becoming involved, what our clear objectives are and how we can ensure that the EC and the wider European interests get on track in a coherent direction. It would be nice to see the Government giving a lead rather than just carping about the cost of what is being produced.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Government inherited one almighty mess in relation to Ispra. The whole Ispra project started on the wrong foot, because it never had any clear scientific object or mission. It was a sop to the Italians for not getting the research facilities to which they thought they were entitled. It was a national partition of the European cake. That is almost the worst possible basis for starting any kind of scientific union.

In brackets, I might say something pretty awful. We can thank our lucky stars that, thanks to Commissioner Brunner and to a number of hon. Members of all parties, Conservative and Labour—I and colleagues played our part in this—we prevented the Joint European Torus project from going to Ispra. I say here and now that if fusion had gone to Ispra, the kind of advances that have been made at Culham simply would not have taken place. Commissioner Brunner was right to say that it should be either at a German site or in Britain, where there is a determined engineering capacity.

I listened to Italians such as Senator Noë and Mr. de la Briotta in the European Parliament going on and on about Ispra. It was deeply unsatisfactory, but, having said that, I am sanguine as to what can be done about it. I do not say that I have news for the Minister—I think that he understands the position full well—but there are such things as contracts. That is why I interrupted in relation to Italian law. The Italians have cast-iron contracts. The Milanese lawyers have done a wonderful job for them, and the Minister will find that they are contracts for life. Unless something can be done about all this, root and branch, I do not see what progress can be made and what turnover of people can possibly be achieved.

My information is rather secondhand. It used to be firsthand. Before the debate I made inquiries, and I understand that things have not changed greatly from the old days. What will be done about the whole basis of contract, because no progress will be make at Ispra unless something is done about it?

Incidentally, that may be part of the difference between Ispra on the one hand and Karlsruhe on the other, which, from the occasional visit, I thought was rather good, and perhaps Petten and Geel. Do the same gloomy predictions occur in the other three?

I ask, as the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) asked, what is their function and what does the Minister see as their object? They were doing what seemed to be quite good work on sunlight and heating, but it was pretty small scale and I am told that better work is done elsewhere. The right hon. Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie) has recent ministerial experience, and he asked the same question.

What is now seen as a sensible objective? Is there any future in some joint European effort on radioactive decommissioning, radioactive waste management and, in particular, super-compaction of solid waste? The Government have not said that that is best done at Ispra. Incidentally, it may be done better at Dounreay. Nevertheless, with this type of objective, it is sensible to ask whether it should be done on a European scale. I should like more clearly to hear what ideas the Government have on the constructive things that Ispra, Petten, Geel and Karlsruhe can do.

Paragraph 14 of document 9454/87 states:

"The United Kingdom would like closer links between JRC programmes and other Community programmes in similar areas. The proposals for enhanced powers for the Board of Governors are welcome, though the details have yet to be clarified and it is necessary that other structural changes at the JRC should operate in the interests of clear management responsibility."

As has been said, the board of governors does not have a great say. I wonder what is really meant by "other Community programmes in similar areas".

Can flesh and blood be put on those words? What exactly are we getting at? My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) wishes to speak, and I must allow time for the Minister to reply to the questions that have been asked of him.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I shall raise two points in relation to EUREKA. The Minister described the EUREKA document as clearly showing that EUREKA is successful on two grounds. He said that we are getting our share of it, that it does not follow bureaucratic principles, that it has the solid, good, old-fashioned virtue of a step-by-step approach and no red tape, and that it is bottoms-up. They were all good, sound phrases, borrowed from a Daily Express editorial of 30 years ago. They do not demonstrate whether EUREKA will perform in terms of the objectives of an industrial and technological policy of reducing the gap that has emerged between Japan and, to a lesser extent, the United States of America and the disparate countries of Europe, because EUREKA covers several countries outside the European Community.

We want to know how EUREKA will achieve objectives, not merely that it will not fall into the trap of over-bureaucratisation that we can see in Ispra and, to a much lesser extent, in the administrative systems that the Commission must impose on directly funded research programmes such as ESPRIT, BRITE, RACE, and so on. We want an assurance that it will not fall into those traps and that it will achieve something. The right question is not whether we are getting a share of EUREKA but whether it will produce results. Surely the dangers are just the same as those with RACE, ESPRIT, BRITE and other directly funded Commission programmes. They do extremely little for regions, small firms and the encouragement of enterprise.

For too long we have suffered—EUREKA is likely to suffer in the same way—from being dominated by large firms. I refer to the national champions—the firms that are in with the powers-that-be. In this country, in electronics it is GEC and, occasionally, ICL and Plessey. In Germany it is Siemens, and in Holland it is Philips. Those firms already have the cash, and they are already well in with their Governments. They get much public sector funding, and they have no problems in getting private sector funding. They participate in EUREKA in the same way. Because of the way in which Davignon set up the ESPRIT programme, they were the first firms to get in with ESPRIT.

Ludicrously and paradoxically, firms with enormous cash mountains—such as GEC with well over £1 billion—are given cash. Apparently, such firms do not have enough cash to carry out research and development in collaboration with industrial partners. That is nonsense. The firms which have a desire to take risks—unlike, say, GEC—and which do not have cash should be given cash. Firms such as GEC with plenty of cash should be encouraged to take risks.

EUREKA operates on a national champion to national champion basis. It says, "GEC will please talk to Siemens. Philips will please talk to Thomson. Olivetti will please to talk to Philips and, preferably, Thomson." Cash-rich firms which wish primarily to protect their market share in Europe, rather than to catch up with the Japanese in world markets, will inevitably be the participants in EUREKA. They are the powers-that-be. They get in first. They get the invitations to the big conferences in the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre and in Hanover. They will dominate—not the small firms in the regions and the firms willing to take risks and make the breakthroughs.

What would happen if the Government had a science and technology policy which they tried to relate to EUREKA and the other European sources of public funds to encourage research and development? The Government may want to look beyond the silicon chip to the next generation of materials, such as gallium arsenide, which can do the job much faster. They may try to link the University Grants Committee funding for pre-competitive research and development, which is carried out with encouragement from ESPRIT, with the collaboration at industrial level on development rather than research, through EUREKA. They may also want to look at those firms undertaking significant work.

Over the past year, firms such as GEC and Plessey have been engaged in a massive quarrel over whether Britain will have a modern properly funded gallium arsenide foundry. The whole idea has been squashed, despite enormous efforts by the Department of Trade and Industry to get the two companies to work together. Smaller firms still at the venture capital stage, such as those involved in plasma technology in Bristol and electro-tech instrument development in south Wales, have made great efforts. In collaboration with University college, Cardiff and the university of Wales institute of science and technology in Cardiff, they are getting on with the job and doing the type of work on which the Minister would like to be able to report to the House. EUREKA and other Community programmes are intended to assist in that work.

Small firms which are still in the venture capital stage and universities such as Cardiff, which do not get big favours from the UGC and are outside the main stream of collaborative research, are willing to take risks and to reduce the gap in micro-electronic technology between Britain and Japan. Those firms are most unlikely to get funds from EUREKA on a big scale and to do well out of ESPRIT. They do not have the clout with the powers-that-be.

How will the Minister correct the fundamental flaw which has occurred with ESPRIT, RACE and others and which is likely to occur with EUREKA? The small firms that are genuinely not averse to risk and the universities that are not in the golden triangle are cut out. How will the Minister ensure that the small firms and the universities in the regions get their proper share? This is needed if Britain is to catch up with Japan in science and technology. Jobs should flow from that catching up.

Mr. Butcher: I thank all those who have spoken in the debate, during which considerable agreement has emerged. I shall do my best, in the time available, to deal with the various requests for information.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) wished to know the stage that negotiations had reached and where we see our position to be. I am sure that he would not expect me to say in fine detail exactly how we will pursue our objectives, but it is right to restate what we are doing in those negotiations.

The last JRC programme ran out at the end of 1987. An informal discussion on the Commission's proposal for a new programme was held last December at the Research Council, and there was a substantive discussion at the 11 April Research Council. The European Parliament has also examined the proposal, and it should be possible for the Council to reach a common position at its next meeting on 29 June.

The main outstanding issues relate to aspects of management and staffing policy. I shall come in detail to the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie) and the hon. Members for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) and for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). However, en passant, I say to the hon. Member for Linlithgow that we support his contention that the search for best practice now has to be on a pan-European basis.

If, for example, I am looking for examples of best practice in the higher education institution in engineering, I should look at Aachen. I know that some of the more enlightened engineers in this country see Aachen as a model that has critical mass, expertise, and delivers teaching in volume of the highest quality, but, in addition, it is a major research centre. If the hon. Gentleman decodes some of the remarks made by Ministers from the Dispatch Box in recent months, he may see the beginnings of a policy that we believe will learn from the Aachen experience.

Having said that, we also have to learn from the Ispra experience. The root of the matter has been identified in two speeches tonight as being Italian law operating in favour of local employees. I do not wish to turn this into a political debate, so I shall not go into too much detail about the role of trade unions in Italy. However, at the start of the JRC, the staff conditions of our Commission employees were determined by the Commission, and the trade unions have been resisting the introduction of flexibility. That has not been helpful to the JRC's scientific vitality. We believe that the trade unions, too, are increasingly aware of the need for change. It is primarily for the Commission to tackle this obstruction to scientific change.

The United Kingdom would like agreement on the following changes to JRC's staff conditions: a greater rate of annual turnover of staff, including the entry of younger scientists, with skills appropriate to JRC's future needs; more staffing to be on the basis of secondment to and from national institutions rather than on a permanent basis; a programme of compulsory retirements, which is necessary to achieve those ends; and a reduction of the cost of the JRC on the Community budget. The Commission has produced a working paper on staffing policy. It includes proposals for a reduced number of permanent staff, reservation of posts for visiting scientists and the transfer of some service staff out of JRC budgets, consistent with the practice elsewhere in the Commission.

The Commission assures us that the necessary flexibility in staffing policy is available under the present legal base of JRC. We are willing to examine the possibilities within the present framework, but we do not rule out the need for a more radical change if pressure is unsatisfactory.

In case Opposition Members think that we are in a draconian gung-ho mood and are seeking redundancies, I refer them to my opening speech, when I said that we need new blood. Further, without naming sites in the United Kingdom, at our own research establishments we are familiar with the problem of staff who have been in their positions for perhaps a quarter of a century. They are comfortable in their programmes, which have been rolling for a long time, and would bitterly resent the accusation that somehow they should examine how it is that they have been deploying their intellectual resources over this period of time on programmes which perhaps need some adjustment, and perhaps reassignment to other branches within their research establishment.

Ispra is that writ large, but with some peculiarly domestic Italian questions that need resolving. For reasons which I am sure my right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton will understand, it is not advisable for me tonight to engage in a tirade against that. I simply state the criteria on which we shall judge the efficacy of the Commission in making its arrangements for its employees. I suspect that there will be consensus among Ministers at the next Council meeting on the sorts of things that we want to see achieved.

Mr. Dalyell: In the New Scientist of 29 October, under the byline of Debora Mackenzie, a table was published showing that 350 staff are between 51 and 55 years of age, that between the ages of 56 and 60 there are just under 200, and that between the ages of 46 and 50 there are 250—I suspect that the table is familiar to the Minister—with just 10 or so between the ages of 21 and 25. Is the age range really as cock-eyed as that?

Mr. Butcher: I do not have immediate access to figures to confirm or deny that point. However, those who have observed the Ispra phenomenon have remarked on the way in which the staff are deployed. I stated earlier that we in the United Kingdom are vividly aware that staffing is top-heavy and that it may be subject to hardening of the arteries in both a metaphorical sense and, perhaps, among many of the staff. However, we are on to that. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton asked us to keep up the pressure, and of course we shall.

Perhaps this should not have been a debate in which we examined the Government's general domestic research policy, but Opposition Members have tempted me to make one or two comments on that. It is interesting to note that what is going on in Europe in the framework programme and in the EUREKA programme is mirrored by what is happening in the United Kingdom. We have said clearly that, as a Government, observing an industrial sector that is now making healthy profits, it will be for companies to make their own commercial judgments in their own way now that they can luxuriate in investment, and their own R and D decisions.

Given the changed trading conditions—if this is not a strategy, it is a matter for debate, and I believe that it is simply an observation on changed conditions—it is correct for public sector money, whether employed by the Department of Trade and Industry or by the Department of Education and Science, to move upstream and away from near-market exploitation. We have been discussing that very concept tonight. This is not a strategy in the way in which the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) would recognise a strategy. However, it is clearly stated in several of the objectives in our White Paper and it is articulated in the pattern of spending which the House can examine carefully, because it has been placed before the House.

We can look, for example, at LINK, to meet the higher education links with outside industry, at EUREKA, at our DTI-sponsored programmes on advanced technologies, on things such as SMART—the small firms merit award for research and technology—at our exceptional projects and at things within sectors such as launch aid. We already have a number of programmes moving forward on key enabling technologies. The IT programeme rolls at £85 million over the next five years, building on Alvey, which was well assessed. Although Alvey has had its critics, any objective evaluation of it will show that it produced the goods and the results. The question now is the one raised by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West: will industry have the sense to exploit those technologies and not simply leave behind another collection of fundamental ideas which others may exploit?

Higher education institutions are participating in EUREKA, as are small and medium-sized enterprises, to a significant extent, so the point that was made in that connection is not lost on us. I hope that there will be an occasion, should the House wish, when we can look more closely at the Government's current emphasis on research and development policy.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton suspected that the Commission never liked EUREKA and tended to overstate its overlaps with the Community's own research and development policy. I can only tell my right hon. Friend that he is absolutely right. I did not regard his speech as cynical. I thought that he made an observation on a real phenomenon.

As for the profiles of the programmes within the various sites, at Ispra we have reactor safety, industrial hazards, fusion research, non-nuclear energy, environmental protection and remote sensing. At Karlsruhe they are undertaking research in the nuclear fuel cycle. At Geel in Belgium they are producing nuclear measurements and reference materials. At Petten in the Netherlands they are dealing with reactor studies and high temperature materials. In Brussels there is an administration of 20. That is the central administration and is not to be confused with the administrative function in the REs.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow asked what we wished to see by way of new emphases within those facilities. In my opening remarks I said we felt it regrettable that, for example, the environmental programmes were running at about 14 per cent. Hence much work remains to be done there. We feel that their briefs could be expanded, but we must encourage them to seek custom, and in the first instance that custom will have to take advantage of the expertise that exists in-house. As with operations such as NEL and NPL, what they have in situ will bring along their first customers, but we hope that many of those will be industrial and private sector, although the Commission may put some work to them.

I have referred to small and medium-sized enterprises. It is not true to say that we are talking only about large firms in the programmes. Many small firms are involved in EUREKA, ESPRIT and BRITE. They are involved in at least 40 per cent. of the projects across those programmes.

I was asked about evaluation—about how we are to assess EUREKA—and whether it is simply to be reliant on numbers of projects or the amount spent. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West highlighted a point of crucial importance. In the past, Governments—I am talking generically—have measured success either by the amount spent or by whether those who benefited from projects stated themselves to be content.

If a research or other body has just received a large sum of money, it will be reasonably content. We have had difficulty—as a task of Government generally—in measuring the output of any Whitehall Department's spending. We find it easy to measure input, taking into account the number of staff deployed, the amount of cash and the degree of effort but as soon as one asks what has been achieved, one gets different replies. We are aware of this and my Department is perfecting the science of measuring output against expenditure on the commitment of man and woman years.

It is early days yet for EUREKA. The projects are industry-led and are funded primarily from the private sector. It is up to industry to assess the value, although, in the final analysis, the market will make the assessment, remembering that all the projects are allegedly near-market projects.

I was asked by the hon. Member for Linlithgow what we meant by closer links between the JRC and Community programmes in similar areas. The JRC has activities in materials, environment and energy, and we hope that these will be kept in step with other efforts within the framework programme.

Mr. Dalyell: The Minister has been courteous in answering my questions and I am not complaining, but what about the decommissioning of radioactive waste? Is there a future there?

Mr. Butcher: The short answer must be yes, because it would appear that in several member states this has become a political as well as an industrial question. My personal view is that the search for safer fuels is of equal importance. That does not mean that I shall impose my bias into these arrangements, but the decommissioning question remains, if the House will excuse the metaphor, a live one.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) pointed to the lack of confidence in the Government's science policies. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science told the House of the increase of 15 per cent. in the science Vote since 1979. That is not enough for some scientists. There are wild accusations that we are no longer supporting basic and commercial research, and it is alleged that our sole criterion for supporting research is whether it will achieve a measured result in the market in the short term. That is a wholly unfair allegation. We have shifted the emphasis of science and technology policy in the right direction. If industry in its current state of profitability cannot bring forward appropriate development projects that are near to the market it will not be the Government's fault. We have delivered the framework within which it can do that.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9454/87 and 5616/88 on the Joint Research Centre and 10845/86 on EUREKA and Community Science and Technology; and supports the Government's aims of raising the quality and relevance of the work at the Joint Research Centre and of using EUREKA to help British industry become more competitive in world markets.

Bristol Channel (Waste Disposal)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

11.42 pm

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): It is with great pleasure that I see my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in his place for this debate, not least because it shows the gravity with which the Government view the whole position.

First, I should state what I am not seeking to do in this debate. I am not seeking some sort of anti-nuclear crusade, not least because I have a great respect for the CEGB, the quality of engineering and the ability of the nuclear inspectorate. Secondly, I am not seeking to attack Hinkley Point by some water-borne assault. It has existed for many years and has an excellent record. Thirdly, it is fair to say that my great interest in alternative energy is not intended to be anti-nuclear.

After all, provided that all goes right, nuclear energy is the cleanest non-pollutant energy source, outside the range of wind, wave and solar power. Nuclear energy causes no acid rain, does no damage to the ionosphere and does not push lead into the faces of small children on our streets from car exhausts. This debate comes about from the accident of a rural and tourism Member of Parliament deeply concerned simply about three beaches that do not meet EEC standards: no more and no less.

The Bristol channel runs from the River Severn to the Irish sea, with south Wales on its right, and Somerset, north Devon and north Cornwall on the left. Since obtaining this debate I have been overwhelmed by the instant response of others who, like me, are worried about the quality of the Bristol channel—or, rather, the water within it. Too many authorities control pollution and dumping. Although my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister says that the Department of the Environment co-ordinates all these works, I have not found that to be the case.

When I saw detailed answers about the type of pollution that was occurring, I asked the Prime Minister about co-ordination, as well as the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Welsh Office, for the Welsh side of the channel, and the Department of the Environment regarding sewage and other deposits, and of course the Department of Transport, in relation to the water-borne sewage coming from coastal vessels moving up and down our side of the channel.

Some of the answers conflict strongly, but I must thank all the Ministries concerned, especially the Ministry of Agriculture, for speedy and accurate answers. The only Department that has not answered my questions, despite the role allegedly placed upon it by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, is the Department of the Environment, which has had the co-ordinating job—in other words the co-ordinators unfortunately have lost their co-ordinants. Individual Departments can tell me what is happening, but not the co-ordinator. I am not filled with confidence in the Department.

The Bristol channel is seaside for those who live in north Devon; it is ever-present, as one crosses Exmoor, and as one comes into my constituency. There is the water, which we call the sea. I have known it well since I was a child. It is the place where one builds sandcastles, plays in the water, and later swims, surfs and goes water-skiing. There is fishing and trawling of course; all are pleasures of clean water, or so we thought.

I sought simply to find out why the water is no longer what it has been and why we were not putting it to rights; I suspected that raw sewage outlets along the coastline were the cause. The results were as fascinating as they were unfortunate. I was astounded to find, from some very honest answers from MAFF, that we have a number of industrial sites, or sewage deposit sites. I had known, frankly, that the great and super city of Bristol, and the city of Cardiff, through their water authorities, dump their sewage sludge a mere 11 miles off the coast of Ilfracombe.

I knew through a councillor friend of mine, Councillor David Spears of Ilfracombe, who is a fisherman, that there was an application from Port Talbot to dump 7 million tonnes of what is nicely called "capital spoil", again 11 miles north east of Ilfracombe. On top of this, MAFF told me that there were two minor liquid low-level radioactive outlets, one from Hinkley Point and another from Amersham International off the River Taff. I do not believe for a second that any one of those sources causes total pollution.

Then the information grew worse. In seeking to find out just what goes into the Bristol channel, I asked that marvellously honest body, the Welsh Office. It answered simply that there are all the things that I knew about already, and by the way, there are 27 other outlets whereby low-level nuclear waste is indirectly dumped in the Bristol channel.

So I had information from the Ministry of Agriculture, and learned more about the two nuclear sources—Hinkley on the Devon side and Amersham on the Welsh side—and the 27 other outlets, as well as sewage dumping, from the Welsh and English sides. There are no heroes or villains in this, just people going about their work, quietly polluting the waterways on the doorstep of north Devon. There are the industries of Port Talbot, and so it goes on, and on.

Then I asked my friends in the coastguard service and the Royal Air Force about maritime pollution. The Ministry of Transport said with superb openness that it is quite legal to pump out the tanks of a ship in the channel, and that one may discharge gash, or rubbish, there. Rubbish from ships and cleanings from tanks—all goes into this narrow waterway that we in north Devon call the seaside. This grew from a simple problem of finding out how the water authorities work.

I owe every credit to the water authorities. The South-West water authority is spending much money and doing very well in cleaning up sewage. I am sure that the Welsh authority and Wessex Water are doing the same. It is not the individuals who are polluting our waterways; a major hole is being caused, not by any of the pinpricks, but by the totality of water authorities, the industrial, agricultural, and agrichemical concerns and all the rest of them.

We come to a very simple question: why do I find dead sea birds and plastic rubbish when I wander along the shores of my constituency? I find not the romantic things of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh, which could be looked at with excitement, but useless plastic rubbish. All of it is man-made and man-deposited because no one is obliged not to do it. That is the essence of my problem.

We are not much better on land. Dog owners—I am one—allow their dogs to foul the beach for children to sit in. Councils are getting better and beginning to enforce byelaws, but there is still pollution on the beaches. Our small local authorities still allow outfalls to be tucked away under the sands and to spill raw sewage into the sea for the pleasure of surface and submariners and all who enjoy fishing.

The beautiful island of Lundy, just off my constituency, is the site of a maritime nature reserve and I am proud to have been instrumental in making it so. It is surrounded not by lobsters, however, but by the debris of civilisation. No one is forbidden to put it there, which means that everyone is allowed to. I was surprised to find that ships are allowed to pollute the area, but not with oil. So they pollute with oil after dark. Oil slicks appear on the beaches in my area, and, I am sure, across the water in Wales. Irridescent pools of oily water appear from ships dumping in the channel.

So we have an incredible collection of debris all along our coastline. I do not seek to apportion blame to any authority or Ministry. This is not a case of villains; it is a case of everyone exercising rights given by statute or regulation, but the total result is that what should be a pleasant open stretch of beautiful water is polluted. As one approaches my part of the world, one comes across the top of Exmoor and sees the Bristol channel in the foreground and Wales in the background. It is a beautiful sight and equally beautiful from the other side. However, it is no longer a pleasure to walk or bathe there. I am a walker, bather and sailor in that area. The hulls of people's boats get coated with human excrement. Human debris, too, figures in the pollution of the coastal waters.

No one in particular is at fault; all of us are at fault. The Welsh Office told me all about its problems. I asked about the capital spoil from Port Talbot, but no one appeared to know about it. Officials said it was dredging from the harbour. That is fine; but Port Talbot has been a fine industrial area and I am not sure that the dredgings are as pure as one might expect sand to be. No one minds; one applies for a grant.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will not tell me that he has granted permission to dump 7 million tonnes in this narrow, shallow channel—a super-tanker carries 100,000 tonnes, by comparison. The material may not be dirty—I do not suggest that it is—but it seems odd. Why can they dump 11 miles off Ilfracombe? It is not a personal affront to me. That is the nearest point at which people can say that the dumped waste will go out to sea. But the Bristol channel does not work that way. Waste does not just all go out and come in—it swirls around. There are bays on the Welsh side, and on the Devon and Somerset side. What is put in the water does not exit on the tide. I wish it did. Some does, but some goes around and around. We are damaging the lives and pleasure of our people.

I am grateful for being granted this debate. I do not seek villains. I am only saying—perhaps tediously—that three of the beaches in my area do not meet EEC standards. We should be grateful to the EEC; we condemn it often, but it has given us standards that I want my beaches to meet. All the things I have mentioned, taken together, are causing the trouble and pollution. My right hon. Friend has told me in parliamentary answers that he would be happy to bathe in our waters. God bless him, and I hope he enjoys it. It is a beautiful place and I am sure he will come to no harm. But, with all these different authorities allowing dumpings, it seems strange to assume that ultimately no harm will be done.

I suspect that I speak not just for my own area but for the whole country. For centuries we have used the sea as our cesspit on the assumption that the sea would clear it out. In our case it is no longer working. My right hon. Friend may say, as he has told me in answer to questions, that there is no apparent problem for fishing stocks. I must tell him there are problems. The fishing stocks have gone. The fishing stocks which were there in my youth are not there any more. My fishermen, not primed by me, say that they get boils from the water of the channel. The sub-aqua clubs tell me that there are problems when they are swimming; the surf clubs say the same thing. Everyone tells me that we are allowing our environment to be more and more polluted.

I have asked the questions of all the individual Departments. All I could find out was that no one was exceeding his authority or doing anything he should not do, but all of us in total are doing what we should not do —damaging the environment of our beautiful country. All of us are proud of our own areas. Whether from Devon, as I am, or from Wales or Scotland, we all love our country, but, through nobody's apparent fault, the environment is being destroyed. Yet industrial refuse, nuclear waste and sewage sludge must go somewhere. In the south-west they go from other people's doorsteps into my constituency. That is not fair. It is causing aggravation —which brings us to this debate.

I ask my right hon. Friend for simple assurances. I am told that the Department of the Environment co-ordinates. That amazes me because that is the one Department which has not the ability or the will to answer a priority written question. Every other Department does— Agriculture, the Welsh Office and Transport, but not Environment. How can I have faith in a Department which is said to co-ordinate, when it cannot answer simple questions such as how many sewage outlets or permits there are? I do not believe that the Department knows.

My right hon. Friend is not responsible for that Department. His Department is responsible for the cleanliness of water and the agriculture side of things. I pay the Department credit for the work it does, but it seems wrong that all this waste is deposited in the Bristol channel. I will list it all for the last time—sewage sludge from the big cities of Wales and the west country, capital spoil, tippings and dredgings from the great industrial ports, nuclear waste from Hinkley Point, nuclear waste from Amersham International up the River Taff—it must be fun being a swan on the river—and 27 other indirect nuclear waste deposits on the Welsh side alone.

I have had no answer, alas, for the English side of the water. The Department of the Environment is to write to me as soon as possible. That will be as soon as possible after the debate is over and is in Hansard, one suspects. When the battle is over, the gentlemen of England, now abed, may think themselves accursed they were not here, but they are wise not to say their piece because they would damn themselves out of their parliamentary questions and answers.

On the agricultural side I say very little, but we know that agrichemicals leach into our waters. Some of it is the fault of the agricultural system and some is the fault of the water authorities being underfunded in the past. But all in all, from the shipping on the top of the water to the sewage at the bottom, we are doing great damage to the nation. We must get together and say that what we did in the 19th century out of ignorance we may not continue at the end of the 20th century out of knowledge, nor in the 21st century when, I trust, the environment will be at the top of our agenda.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): First, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) for raising the subject which, as he rightly says, is not only of interest to him and to his constituency but to any of us who represent coastal areas. My constituency has 54 miles of coast, the nuclear power station at Sizewell A, a new one to come at Sizewell B and the proposal to build another at Sizewell C, so I hope he will accept that, apart from my ministerial responsibility, I have a personal, local responsibility which makes me sympathetic to the issues that he has raised.

I should like to begin where my hon. Friend ended by saying that in the 20th century we must not do out of knowledge what in the 19th century we did out of ignorance. I am happy to say that we have learnt and that what we now allow to be dumped in the sea is different from what would have been dumped in the 19th century.

I recognise my hon. Friend's desire to tread the narrow path between worrying people unnecessarily and making sure that the programme and policy of the Government are sufficiently structured to protect people. That is a difficult path for an hon. Member to tread because he must not make people feel that something is wrong with the beaches while at the same time he must protect the beaches. I see the balance that my hon. Friend has to maintain, and he maintained it admirably in his speech.

My hon. Friend spoke about co-ordination. He should draw some confidence from the fact that it is largely the scientists in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who provide the basis for the work that is done. The scientific staff in my Ministry assess the potential effect of pipeline discharges, for example, on the marine environment. My hon. Friend mentioned dumping in the sea from Wales. The Welsh Office is deeply involved in trying to solve such problems and my Ministry is its agent in this work, thus ensuring that the effects of dumping from Wales are taken into the equation.

My hon. Friend made an important point when he spoke about the equation. We must ask ourselves whether, when we add together all the things that happen, we get an unacceptable result, even though the individual things being done are acceptable. When the adding together takes place, it is the scientists in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who play the vital role.

In the Bristol channel area, there is a specific way of doing this because, as my hon. Friend rightly says, this area is of considerable concern as it is bordered by the great industrial areas of Wales. It is an important tourist interest and an historic waterway. For those reasons we have a special group of interested authorities which co-ordinate the assessment work in this area—the Severn estuary technical working group—and it includes representatives of MAFF, the water authorities, the Water Research Centre and Plymouth marine laboratory. These bodies each present the results of their monitoring work to the group which thus ensures that a detailed picture of the quality of the estuary and Bristol channel is available.

[Mr. John Selwyn Gummer]

My hon. Friend need not worry about the co-ordination aspect. It is co-ordinated overall at ministerial level by the Department of the Environment. In the specific area that he spoke about, we have gone to particular trouble to cover this in the special working group. That group is of a technical kind and it covers precisely the problems that my hon. Friend rightly adumbrated. As he said, the problems that we have here are affected not only by the quality and type of waste that is put into the sea, but by the movement, the ebb and flow, of the sea. In this area the ebb and flow is much more complex than in other areas. That must be considered as well, and my hon. Friend was right to draw that to our attention.

The reason for choosing a dumping site 11 miles off Ilfracombe, to which my hon. Friend refers, was not intended as a personal insult to my hon. Friend; nor was it chosen because it was the nearest place at which we could get away with such dumping, which perhaps my hon. Friend implied. The site was carefully chosen because we know the way in which the sea operates in that area. Its mechanism does what we intend it to do: it satisfactorily cleanses the area.

I want to face head on the problem that my hon. Friend has placed before us. In this world we ask for all the benefits and advantages of a modern society, such as being able to turn on energy at the flick of a switch, of being able to drive to the lovely holiday beaches in his constituency and of being able to be warm in winter and cool in summer. We cannot expect to have all those things and the jobs in the industries that sustain them unless we accept that they produce waste that has to be dealt with somehow.

I think that my hon. Friend would be the first to recognise that we must make sure that the waste that we produce does not pollute the environment. However, he is wrong to suggest that the sea has no part to play in the removal of waste. We must ensure that we do not put in the sea waste that cannot be purified or disposed of. If we treated the sea as our communal cesspool, we would do great damage to the environment and to future generations. We take considerable care about those decisions.

Let me give my hon. Friend two examples of the care that we take. First, when I receive a new application, I consider it carefully, but, even in circumstances in which I believe that it is right to grant it, I seek to find an alternative way of reducing other inputs to the sea. I try to strike a balance to ensure that the total is, if anything, less than it was before. I always try to use it as the pressure point for reducing the use of the sea for the removal of waste, and I have found that approach very satisfactory.

Secondly, I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the decision of the North sea conference, which was a great success and in which Britain took a major part. My hon. Friend referred to throwing things off a ship and getting rid of oil in the sea. We must draw a distinction here. People do things illegally and we then have to deal with the question of enforcement. They do other things legally, but we nevertheless have to deal with the problem of stopping them doing those things. I hope that our enforcement policy will increasingly enable us to ensure that ships do not do what they have done in the past—flush out their oil tanks illegally, late at night, when no one is around. The evidence shows that that is a decreasing activity and that our policing has helped in that direction.

However, we must improve as well as enforce the rules. I took a small part in ensuring that the British Government joined others in agreeing to much tougher rules about the use of the sea as a garbage pail for ships, whose crews appeared to think that they had a right to throw into it anything that they liked because it was waste produced on the ship. That is unacceptable and we have done a great deal to change that. The countries of northern Europe will now stop that and regulations are being prepared, as my hon. Friend knows from the reply that he received from the Department of Transport. That is a major improvement which will depend on the efficacy of the regulations and on the way in which we impose them.

Mr. Speller: The answer that I have received from the Department of Transport simply says that it is not in itself an offence for ships to clean their tanks in the Bristol channel or, at present, to discharge ship's garbage into the sea, although regulations are being prepared. Can my hon. Friend tell me when those regulations will be in force and who will enforce them?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend must understand that those regulations will be in force as rapidly as possible because we gave an undertaking at the London conference. I cannot tell him exactly when they will be laid, but it will be as soon as possible. The responsibility for enforcement of the regulations will be spread between Departments, although the Department of Transport will have the primary responsibility. However, as other Departments have opportunities to watch out for these things, we all try to work together.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will accept that, although it is not as unitary a system as he would wish, our fisheries patrol vessels, coastguards and local sea fisheries committees play their part in notifying the tell-tale signs that those incidents have occurred. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that we catch people not simply in flagrante delicto, but also after the incident, when we can see what has happened. There are various ways of going about that, and I assure him that we are most concerned that the system works effectively. I have not yet considered or given a ruling on the question of the dumping of material from Port Talbot. We are discussing that issue, and I give an undertaking that I will look at the matter extremely carefully.

The two licences currently issued for sewage sludge—one each to the Wessex and Welsh water authorities—apply to material that is already carefully refined. That is why it is put in the sea, and 96 per cent. of it is water. That would not have happened in the 19th century. I hope that my hon. Friend will remind his constituents of the enormous advances that have been made since then. In the 19th century, raw sewage was dumped into the sea, but we purify it seriously now. My hon. Friend should be happy that we monitor very carefully what enters the water. He should also be pleased that 70 per cent. of the sludge from Wessex is spread on land and does not enter the water. We are constantly trying to find alternatives where they are available.

I want to refer briefly to the apparent inconsistency to which my hon. Friend referred. I am sure that he will not mind if I say that if he asks a slightly different question of two people he may get a slightly different answer. When he asked the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what we gave licences for, we told him; and I hope he will be kind enough to acknowledge that we were very honest in our reply. We gave him full details. However, if he asked the Welsh Office what it granted licences for, he must accept that the Welsh Office would include licences for extremely small amounts of waste such as radioactive material from hospitals. Such licences are not granted by my Ministry. Therefore, the figures tie up as long as my hon. Friend remembers what the question is in the first place. Nothing was hidden in either case, and full details were given to my hon. Friend. I hope that he will acquit us of not co-ordinating this properly.

We have very tough controls on what is put into the sea. More important than that, it is our intention and the fact——

Wednesday 18 May 1988

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

DEATH OF A MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to inform the House of the death of Sir Brandon Meredith Rhys Williams, Baronet, Member for Kensington, and I desire, on behalf of the House, to express our sense of the loss we have sustained and our sympathy with the relatives of the hon. Member.

MESSAGES FROM THE QUEEN

SUMMER TIME

THE VICE-CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:

I have received your Address praying that the Summer Time Order 1988 be made in the form of the draft laid before your House.

I will comply with your request.

TAXATION

THE VICE-CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:

I have received your address praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Venezuela) Order 1988, and the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Turkey) Order 1988 be made in the form of drafts laid before your House.

I will comply with your request.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Vacant Council Houses

1. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses are vacant but available for letting in the northern region according to the latest figures.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Marion Roe): Housing investment programme returns indicated that 2,702 local authority dwellings in the northern region were empty and available for letting at 1 April 1987, the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Fallon: Is not the real scandal not that more than 2,000 homes are empty but that no one seems to be doing anything about it? I have asked this question every year for the past five years. Will my hon. Friend consider legislating either to allow young homeless couples to homestead in these empty council properties or to improve letting procedures by providing for compulsory auction of any council homes that are not relet within, say, three months?

Mrs. Roe: Following discussions in Committee on the Housing Bill we are considering measures to reduce the number of local authority empties. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning is to make a statement on the subject at the Report stage of the Housing Bill. I am not convinced, however, that compulsory disposal along the lines suggested is necessarily the most effective means of making housing available to those in greatest need.

I support the principle of encouraging homesteading. My Department encouraged it in circular 12/85. Homesteading depends on low sale prices and purchasers getting improvement grants. The ball is clearly in the local authorities' court. For our part, we are considering changes to the improvement grant regime, to be contained in new legislation.

Mr. Cousins: Will the Minister bear in mind her own splendid example? When 15 houses run by the Property Services Agency in my constituency had been derelict for more than a year the Government gave Newcastle city council £300,000 to bring those derelict houses back into use. Is that an example for the Minister in this case?

Mrs. Roe: One must remember Government empties that are held for operational reasons. My Department does not collect data on reletting times. However, the Audit Commission estimates that if the national average relet period could be reduced by two and a half weeks by better management and by streamlining the reletting procedures, an extra 20,000 dwellings could be occupied. The commission recommends a maximum three-week reletting period. The London borough of Greenwich manages that, but the average time for the borough of Southwark is 24 weeks. That puts 1,800 dwellings out of commission—enough for all its homeless households for a year.

Mr. Soley: Are there operational reasons that lead to the Government's having 6·9 per cent. of their properties empty? In average terms, that is three times as many as the number held by a local authority. Why does the Minister have to rely on people such as myself and other Opposition Members going to Government Departments, in the way that I went recently to the Home Office, to get the Government to put back into use houses and flats that have been empty for as long as nine years? When will she do something about Government Departments that have hundreds of thousands of empty houses and flats all over Britain?

Mrs. Roe: Government empties are regularly reviewed and Departments are strongly urged to sell surplus stock. Reduction targets agreed by the Treasury are also set. Where disposal is not practicable, Departments are encouraged to let empties temporarily to local authorities or to housing associations for use by homeless people. The Ministry of Defence has arranged 275 such lettings.

Single People (Housing)

3. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any new proposals to deal with housing need among single people.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): The Government's housing policies—and in particular the proposals in our Housing Bill—will assist all categories of housing need.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Secretary of State's answer will come as a considerable surprise to most people. Would he like to live in cardboard box under Waterloo bridge? If not, what will he do to rehouse people who are living like that?

Mr. Ridley: I imagine that the hon. Lady will strongly support the Housing Bill, which introduces assured tenancies, amended rules on shorthold, and fair rent tenancies to encourage more private landlords to come forward. It also encourages building societies by giving them extra powers to provide accommodation for rent, and encourages the housing association movement to build large numbers of social houses to rent, with Government subsidies to keep those rents low. In the light of that tremendous effort to help the housing shortage, I am surprised that the hon. Lady asked such a stupid question.

Mr. Heddle: I acknowledge the enormous initiatives in the Housing Bill, but does my right hon. Friend agree that many of the single homeless could be adequately housed in pubic sector properties that are currently too large for their tenants? Does he also agree that perhaps many local authorities are not using the tenants' charter provisions of a previous Act to best effect for the single homeless?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, Sir. There are well over 100,000 empty council houses and well over 500,000 empty private dwellings. The Government's policy is to bring the maximum number into use to ease the housing shortage.

Pollution

4. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline those measures taken by Her Majesty's Government to reduce the incidence of pollution in United Kingdom offshore waters.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): A wide range of measures exist to control pollution in United Kingdom waters and recent quality status reports for the Irish and North seas show that they are generally in good condition. Substantial programmes are well under way to achieve improvements in water quality. In addition, a range of further initiatives were included in the ministerial declaration following the North sea international conference chaired by the United Kingdom last November.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. I am sure that he is aware of public anxiety about pollution levels, particularly in the Irish sea, and of the effect of such pollution not only on the environment but on important industries such as fishing, tourism and agriculture. Is it not time for a major Government initiative aimed at drastically reducing what many people regard as unacceptably high pollution levels? Such an initiative would go a considerable way to allay that genuine public worry.

Mr. Moynihan: It was for those very reasons that the Government supported the conference declaration to reduce the input of dangerous substances into rivers, because that is a major source of pollution in coastal waters. That declaration aimed to reduce such pollution by 50 per cent. by 1995 by stopping the dumping of harmful industrial wastes into the North sea by the end of 1989. It is also intended to ensure that there will be no increase from 1987 levels of inputs of contaminants and sewage sludge.

Mr. Gale: Will my hon. Friend study carefully the report on the protection of the North sea against pollution, which was carried unanimously by the Council of Europe on 6 May? Will he consider the effect that the dumping of waste has on the north Kent coastal resorts such as Margate and Herne Bay in my constituency? Will he consider carefully the implementation of recommendation c.i. in the report? It recommends:

"ensuring that ships' waste is stored and treated in port, and that any discharge of such waste at sea is severely punished".

Mr. Moynihan: Full consideration is being given to the report and, as my hon. Friend will know, it is precisely because of the sort of worry that he has expressed that we are committed to substantial expenditure through the water authorities of up to £70 million per annum, to seek improvements in the quality of coastal waters and a reduction in bacteriological levels. As to my hon. Friend's point about shipping, he will know that we are committed to working through the International Maritime Organisation to improve controls on pollution from ships.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The Minister referred to the ministerial declaration from the second international conference on the protection of the North sea, but how will the Government implement the recommendations to which they put their name? What dangerous substances going into our rivers will be reduced by 50 per cent.? The Government have not given us any idea of what those substances are. How will they reduce the contamination of sewage sludge by persistent toxic and accumulable materials when the amount of sewage sludge that needs to be dumped in the North sea is increasing? When will the Government respond to the assurance given by the Secretary of State for the Environment in the House? He said:

"I am certainly considering whether to create nitrate protection zones and I expect soon to come to a decision." —[Official Report, 2 December 1987; Vol. 123, c. 916].

When are we to have the decision, or is the row with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food continuing indefinitely?

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Gentleman will know that we shall be publishing the red list of substances in connection with river quality objectives and the pollutants that are of specific concern to the Government once we have finalised the list. As to the range of other issues, I would encourage the hon. Gentleman to read in detail the 46 proposals on exactly how the Government intend to put into practice the recommendations agreed at the second international conference on the protection of the North sea.

Regional Assistance

5. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which areas have received Government assistance under the urban regeneration grant and urban development schemes in the last six months.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Trippier): Thirty two urban development and urban regeneration grants totalling £36·4 million have been approved since November 1987, including one urban development grant of £529,000 in my hon. Friend's constituency. I have made arrangements for a list of the areas receiving assistance to be placed in the Library.

Mrs. Hicks: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the substantial urban development grant that he has recently given to Wolverhampton. Is he convinced that the new city grant that has replaced it will be even more attractive to developers?

Mr. Trippier: I am convinced that the new city grant will be more attractive. We have cut out a considerable amount of bureaucracy that was attached to the former grant regime. We have streamlined the process, giving the private sector direct access to the Department of the Environment. I have given an undertaking that a decision on the applications will be made within a shorter time scale than hitherto.

Mr. Steen: Is not the most important problem to which urban regeneration grant should be directed getting rid of the 100,000 acres of public derelict, vacant but under utilised land on the register? Although my hon. Friend has made some steps towards getting rid of the land, more land is coming in because of the planning process. At the present rate it will be at least 1,000 years before we get rid of all the land on the register.

Mr. Trippier: I agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's question. I draw his attention to the fact that almost half the public land registered last year was directed by the Department of the Environment to be sold. The problem is not confined to local authorities, but occurs in Government Departments as well, and as a result of the initiative in the "Action for Cities" presentation by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister we are taking further steps in that direction.

Cluttons (Contracts)

6. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contracts have been awarded to Cluttons by his Department over the past seven years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): Ten contracts have been awarded to Cluttons in the past seven years. Five were for the sale of surplus property, four for valuations and one for dealing with noise compensation claims.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not true that Cluttons was paid £40,000 for valuing Richmond Terrace and that the same work could have been done in-house for £2,000? Is the Minister aware that that information comes from civil servants within the PSA? So that we may get at the truth, will the Minister publish the comparative costing documentation within the PSA and place it in the Library? This is a time bomb ticking away under his appointment as a junior Minister in the Department of the Environment, and we will get at the truth in the end.

Mr. Chope: There was never any question of the valuation being carried out in-house. The decision was taken to employ experts. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because they are experts in valuation. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chope: It was the first time that there had been a new freehold in Whitehall for valuation. We considered it best to get the most expert advice and for that advice to be based on the best evidence available. It is important in valuations to have evidence of comparables. The firm that we chose to carry out the valuation employs experts in that work.

Mr. Harry Barnes: Is this not a case where privatisation has clearly failed and has led to an increased bill for the taxpayers, only because of the Government's obsession with privatisation? The fee amounts to 70 or 80 people's poll tax payments for a year.

Mr. Chope: I do not know that the Government are obsessed with privatisation. We are convinced that privatisation is a sensible policy and it is being pursued vigorously by the Government where it is most appropriate.

British Olympic Association

7. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the British Olympic Association; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Moynihan: I had a private dinner with the chairman of the British Olympic Association on 19 April. I last met him formally on 13 January. We discussed my open letter of 19 November 1987 to John Smith, chairman of the Sports Council, about the future direction of our sports policies.

Mr. Campbell: When the Minister next meets the chairman of the British Olympic Association, will he impress on him the importance of the British Olympic Association assisting the elimination of the taking of drugs—particularly anabolic steroids—by sportsmen in the United Kingdom? Does the Minister share my worry about the possible effects—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member. Private friendly conversations across the Chamber do not help at Question Time.

Mr. Skinner: It is the Ladbroke's man.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be helpful if the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) kept quiet.

Mr. Campbell: I shall not start again from the beginning. Does the Minister share my anxiety about the extent to which the use of such drugs appears to be prevalent? May the House take it that he is as keen as the 179 hon. Members who signed an early-day motion recently to see that the taking of such drugs is eliminated?

Mr. Moynihan: I share the hon. Member's anxiety about the use of anabolic steroids to enhance performance in sport. For that reason, the subject of anabolic steroids has been referred to the advisory council to consider whether the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 controls are appropriate. The BOA wholly supports the recommendations of the inquiry that I undertook with Sebastian Coe, and the Sports Council has now implemented them. The BOA is committed to testing being undertaken by independent sampling officers, to the random selection of competitors and, most important, to testing outside Olympic competition—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would help us all if the hon. Member for Langbaurgh would keep quiet.

Mr. John Carlisle: When my hon. Friend meets the chairman of the British Olympic Association, will he express to him the extreme anger of British sportsmen and sportswomen at the treatment afforded to Miss Zola Budd, who was hounded out of this country by Left-wing political extremists? Does he agree that those bigots and hypocrites have no place in sport or the Olympics? I hope he agrees that the time has come to return sport to the sportsman and not to the politician.

Mr. Moynihan: My hon. Friend will be aware that that is a matter not for the BOA but for the International Amateur Athletic Federation and the British Amateur Athletic Board. Having said that, my hon. Friend will be aware that there are millions of people outside the Chamber who share the strength of his opinions.

Mr. McCartney: Would the Minister care to express a view on the fact that amateur rugby league in this country is not being provided with the same resources as other amateur sports? Is he prepared to meet the parliamentary group to discuss the future investment in the sport at amateur level and at school and university level? Given the nature——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about the Olympics, not about football.

Mr. McCartney: I understand that. To get to Olympic standard, the sport needs resources at amateur level and at school and university level. I would be pleased if the Minister would give some indication of his support.

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Gentleman will know that I am a great fan of rugby league. There have been some outstanding performances this year at amateur level and the sport is deserving of considerable support at both local and national level. The hon. Gentleman will need to direct his comments not just to International Olympic Committee delegates and the BOA, but to other countries, if he is to achieve his aim of seeing rugby league played as an Olympic sport.

Mr. Hayward: Will my hon. Friend consider asking the chairman of the BOA to convey internationally the efforts of the Sports Council to put a stop to the use of drugs and convince other countries, for example, the United States, which is a major offender in sports in terms of taking drugs?

Mr. Moynihan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, This is not just a national but an international problem. It is for that reason that I have had meetings with the president of the IOC, Juan Samaranch, as well as the president of the IAAF. We had a major breakthrough during bilateral discussions with the German Democratic Republic, when we reached an agreement over the exchange of personnel and further developments in this area, which we hope will come to fruition in the not too distant future.

Mr. Denis Howell: As the IOC and representatives of every one of the 26 Olympic sports long ago decided that no one connected with South African sport should be involved in the Olympic movement and that the spirit of that undertaking should be observed by international athletes, does the Minister not think that his remarks a few moments ago were wholly out of place and outwith the interests of British sport?

As the Minister is meeting the chairman of the IOC about his letter to John Smith, why has he not yet met formally either the chairman or any other member of the executive of the Central Council of Physical Recreation—which comprises the governing bodies of British sport—which he did not see fit to invite to address his conference on Monday, although there were 18 speakers? Does he realise that he can make progress with British sport only if he respects the voluntary and democratically elected nature of British governing bodies of sport?

Mr. Moynihan: If the CCPR was that keenly interested in the conference, one would have thought that the two invitations sent to it would have been accepted for the whole day. Only one person turned up, and he left at lunchtime.

As for my comments to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), I should say that the Government are totally committed to the Gleneagles agreement and remain so. The answer that I gave my hon. Friend, which can be read in tomorrow's Hansard, was that there can be no doubt that millions of people outside the House share the strength of the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that politics could be the death knell of the Olympics and all sports? Is it not high time that politics was taken out of sport in all lands, altogether?

Mr. Moynihan: In an ideal world nobody would disagree with my hon. Friend. However, I regret to say that there are too many people who use the sporting playing fields and arenas to focus their political attentions. That is to the detriment of sport and, therefore, the thrust of what my hon. Friend has said meets with complete agreement from me.

Homelessness

8. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give figures for the number of households accepted as homeless in Greater London in 1979 and in 1987; and what is Her Majesty's Government's policy for reducing homelessness in London.

Mr. Ridley: Acceptances in 1979 and 1987 were 16,650 and 30,000 respectively, I should emphasise that these figures represent households qualifying as homeless under the terms of the Act. It is likely that most had some form of accommodation before applying.

Mr. Hughes: Do the Secretary of State and the Government not stand condemned by those figures, which show that under the Tory Government homelessness in London has doubled to 30,000 families a year, while the number of rented properties has diminished by 13 per cent., or 200,000? Is not the only solution for the Government to realise that affordable rented accommodation is required to meet the needs of the homeless? Is not the only immediate prospect of that an amendment to the Housing Bill on Report next month to ensure that in London, as in the rest of Britain, we have affordable rented housing for those who would otherwise have inadequate housing or no housing at all?

Mr. Ridley: No, Sir. The failure lies very much with the local housing authorities, which are responsible for housing. I am glad to say that the category that really counts—those in bed-and-breakfast accommodation—has grown smaller. The figures fell from 8,000 at the end of the first quarter of last year to 7,000 at the end of the year. That 7,000 is almost one fifth of the number of council-owned void and squatted properties, which stands at 33,000, so there are almost five times as many houses as people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. The hon. Gentleman mentioned money. I point out that this year more than £800 million is available for housing capital works in the London boroughs, so it can hardly be said that the boroughs do not have the resources, given that most of the repairs necessary cost less than £15,000 per unit.

Mr. Bowis: I do not underestimate the need to look for solutions to the genuine problems of homelessness, but does my right hon. Friend agree that the definition of homelessness needs to be kept under constant review? In the light of his answer to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), does he recognise the need to introduce measures to cajole, if not force, Labour authorities sitting on empty or squatted properties to put them to good use to help homeless people?

Mr. Ridley: Yes. We should always keep all these matters under close review. I agree with my hon. Friend that we must prevail upon local authorities to bring more of their properties back into occupation. I would add that the Housing Bill will definitely greatly increase availability in London because of the large number of empty private properties that may by released by removing the Rent Act restrictions.

Mr. Tony Banks: How dare the Minister blame local authorities in London for the homelessness crisis? Is he aware that there are between 30,000 and 40,000 people in 600 bed-and-breakfast hotels in Greater London? It is absolutely insufferable for the Minister to stand there in his complacent fashion and blame someone else. Why do the Government not accept responsibility for the scandal and crisis of homelessness in London? Why does the Secretary of State not do something positive for once? Why does he not call together the leaders of all the local authorities in London, Tory and Labour alike, for a conference to try to find some way of working the problem out together?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman's last suggestion that I should call the leaders of the London boroughs together makes my point, that it is the responsibility of the London boroughs to deal with homelessness. Parliament has placed that responsibility on local authorities. Half the time I am told not to interfere with local authorities—except when Opposition Members try to make a political point.

I would add that the money available to local authorities—as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis)—for repair and restoration of houses is £800 million a year. There is plenty of opportunity for authorities to put the problem right. Furthermore, the figure that the hon. Gentleman gave is not the figure that I have for those in bed-and-breakfast hotels, which was 7,000 households—not 30,000—at the end of last year.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Does my right hon. Friend recall the parliamentary answers that he gave at the beginning of the year concerning empty properties nationally and in London, and rent arrears, showing that the constituency borough of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) had the highest number of empty properties anywhere in London and that the borough council of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) had 1,800 empty properties and took six months to relet them?

Mr. Ridley: The figures for Newham show that at the end of 1987 there were 2,764 void dwellings and 575 households in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. The answer to the problem is perfectly clear—those homeless people could have been housed in the empty properties in Newham.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be helpful to the whole House if Members' questions could be confined to the Minister and not asked of each other across the Chamber.

Dr. Cunningham: How can the Secretary of State deny responsibility for London's housing problems or those of the country as a whole when the Government have deliberately and systematically cut local authority housing investment programmes by more than 70 per cent. in real terms during their period in office? Does the Minister agree with his right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who, in addressing himself to this problem, said that he was far from persuaded that building more and more houses which fewer and fewer of our children could afford to buy would solve the problem of homelessness?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has always failed to realise that, on top of capital allocations, 20 per cent. of receipts is available to local authorities to spend. That amounts to a record figure of £6,000 million for capital investment.

The hon. Gentleman quoted my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who I wish was with us. I shall quote exactly what he said.

Dr. Cunningham: I have his words here.

Mr. Ridley: I have them too. My right hon. Friend said:

"If there is an assumed right of the newly created family, the newly separated single family or the pensioner living longer to have a home in the south-east, then we are effectively abandoning the south to an inevitable and irreversible erosion of the very qualities that are today so prized by those who live there."

That is the view of my right hon. Friend. What he means is that surplus people should be transported.

Housing Stock

9. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any proposals to prevent the deterioration of the housing stock in England and Wales.

Mr. Ridley: Proposals for the improvement of the housing stock in both the private and public sectors were included in last September's White Paper "Housing: The Government's Proposals".

Mr. Patchett: Given the present housing crisis, will the Minister allow local authorities to spend at least some of the moneys accrued from the sale of council houses on making improvements, to meet the basic needs of existing council tenants?

Mr. Ridley: I said earlier that local authorities may spend 20 per cent. of their housing receipts per year, which means that they can spend money, but over a period of time. That sum, together with the allocations, results in the high total of about £6 billion a year for local authority capital investment. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman has noticed that both figures should be added to give the real total.

Mr. McLoughlin: Will my right hon. Friend consider forcing local authorities that have empty houses to ensure that those properties that have been empty for longer than six months go on to the housing market for homesteading purposes? One of the problems of public sector housing is that many properties on housing estates become dilapidated. Young people would like the opportunity to buy those properties at prices they could afford, for the purpose of doing them up themselves.

Mr. Ridley: I agree with my hon. Friend. There is every possibility of homesteading taking place. I have listened to the pressure from my hon. Friends that we must do something more with empty council houses, and I certainly take their comments seriously.

Mr. Rooker: Does the Minister agree that the rate of renovation and new building when taken together should at least equal the rate of deterioration, otherwise, whatever figures the Minister may quote at the Dispatch Box today, matters will only get worse? Will he dismiss and completely repudiate the comments of his hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) talked of people—and he must have meant the elderly—under-occupying their homes, saying that they ought to be chucked out to make room for others?

Mr. Ridley: It is for my hon. Friend to look after himself, as I am sure he can do very ably. I can tell the hon. Gentleman, however, that if he adds together allocations and the amount spent from receipts he will find that the total is running at a very high level. Furthermore, it has been increased because of the success of the right-to-buy policy, which has produced more receipts.

Mr. David Nicholson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that we await firm decisions on the future of improvement grants with some concern? First, such proposals would, we hope, minimise the invasion of the statutory and non-statutory green belt. Secondly, I hope that they would help the owners of Woolaway homes in my constituency, about which I have corresponded with the Minister of State and which face severe deterioration as a result of non-traditional building methods.

Mr. Ridley: I can tell my hon. Friend, first that proposals to reform the system of improvement grants will be the subject of legislation at the earliest possible opportunity, so that money can be concentrated on the cases of greatest need.

Secondly, considerable extra allocations have been made for defective housing, and a further £20 million has recently been released for the very purpose of trying to gain ground against the large number of defective houses that need to be put right. Most councils with such houses will find that they have recently received a large new allocation.

Housing Corporation

10. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of people employed by the Housing Corporation; and by what percentage he expects the number to rise over the next three years.

Mrs. Roe: As at 1 April 1988 the number of staff employed by the Housing Corporation in England whose costs are met from my Department's programme was 573. Future staffing requirements are currently being assessed in the light of the functions to be conferred on the Housing Corporation under the Housing Bill now before Parliament and the proposed establishment of separate bodies which will carry out the corporation's functions in Wales and Scotland.

Mr. Howells: I thank the Minister for that very thoughtful reply. It is well known in the House that she is a staunch devolutionist, and I am delighted with the news that Wales will have its own Housing Corporation. In view of the large guango that is building around the Housing Corporation in England, will she bring forward proposals to devolve power to the various regions of England?

Mrs. Roe: As I have already said, we announced that amendments to the Housing Bill would be brought forward to transfer the Housing Corporation's functions in Wales to a new body, Housing for Wales. The Housing (Scotland) Bill currently before Parliament also provides for the Housing Corporation's functions in Scotland to be transferred to a new body, Scottish Homes, the constitution and staffing of which are matters for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Council Housing and Home Ownership

11. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total subsidy to council housing for the year 1980-81 and for the year 1987-88; and what was the total level of support for home ownership for each of the same two years.

Mr. Ridley: Housing subsidy up to 1980-81 was paid under a different system, so I am using 1981-82 as the base year for this reply. Council houses in receipt of Exchequer subsidy and contributions from general rate funds received an average of £265 in 1981-82; those similarly supported in 1987-88 received an average of £271. In addition, housing benefit was available to those who qualified. Owner-occupiers receiving mortgage interest tax relief in 1981-82 obtained an average of £514 and in 1987-88, £576.

Mr. Pike: Is it not a fact that over the past nine years there has been a reduction of 1 million in the number of properties available for rent, and that more than half are in the private rented sector? Is it not true to say that the number of properties to rent will continue to decline until the Government give those who want to rent a fair deal comparable to that available for those who wish to purchase their homes?

Mr. Ridley: First, the figures that I have given to the hon. Gentleman are not really comparable, because subsidies to council house tenants are not comparable with mortgage tax relief as the subsidy to council housing is calculated on the historic cost of building the house, whereas mortgage relief goes to people who have paid market values for their homes. If it were calculated on a comparable basis, the subsidy to the council tenant would be very much higher. Secondly, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support the Housing Bill, which aims to bring forward more social housing to rent on a large scale.

Mr. Ashton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister is misleading the House. He has been asked for total subsidies, not individual house subsidies.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Ministers do not deliberately mislead the House and I am not responsible for their answers.

Mr. Dykes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the increase in home ownership under this Government is one of the Government's greatest success stories? Does he further agree that, in the outer London boroughs, a paradoxical effect is beginning to develop whereby very tight planning controls are needed to have a dampening effect on developers with strong financial power because they are impinging too much on a particular area and preventing first-time buyers making their first purchase?

Mr. Ridley: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the policy of encouraging people to buy their own homes has been one of immense success and satisfaction to the over 1 million tenants who have exercised their rights.

With regard to my hon. Friend's other point, as he knows, we consider all planning applications and policies with the greatest of care and I am fully aware that in some parts of the London suburbs there is a feeling that they are being asked to take too great a density to relieve pressure elsewhere.

Ms. Armstrong: May I invite the Minister to answer the question that was tabled? If he cannot deal with the total subsidy to council housing nationally, perhaps he will tell the House what is the differences in housing allocation for the north of England, in terms of Government subsidy to council housing, between 1980 and today?

Mr. Ridley: I would be happy to give the hon. Lady the global figures, but they mean little unless one directs them to the number of houses to which they are applicable. The total figures for Exchequer contributions to council housing in 1981-2 was £1·3 billion and in 1987-88, £0·8 billion. [Interruption.] There were many fewer houses. Mortgage tax relief cost £2·7 billion in 1981-82 and £4·3 billion in 1987-88, when there were many more houses. Housing benefit amounted to £1·7 billion in 1981-82 and £3·5 billion in 1987-88.

Mr. David Shaw: Is it not true that the amount of private housing now being built is back to the 1973 level, which was the highest for some years? Is it not also true that people want to buy and live in private, rather than public, sector housing? Is it not further true that much public sector housing has deteriorated badly in recent years, with massive maintenance being required after about eight years, and often complete rebuilding within 30 years? Is it not therefore true that the best value for money over the past 30 years has been private sector housing?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot be absolutely sure, without notice, of the figure that my hon. Friend quoted, but it is certainly true that last year was the best year for house construction for many years. With regard to the relative merits of owner-occupation and renting, there is a need for supply in both markets, for people to buy and rent houses. That is why we are taking action through the Housing Corporation and the Housing Bill to provide more social housing to rent.

Mr. Soley: Why is the Minister so ashamed to admit to the figures that were eventually wrenched out of him by the Opposition? Why will he not accept that there are 1 million fewer homes available for rent in this country since 1980, over half of them from his much loved private rented sector? Why do Conservative local authorities use council rents to subsidise ratepayers when, at the same time, we are prepared to use taxpayers' money to subsidise the private sector? Why can he not get his act together and make sure that there is a proper subsidy for people who seek to rent in both the public and private sectors.

Mr. Ridley: The question asked for figures which would have been misleading because, obviously, subsidy must be related to the number of houses to which it is applied, not to the total figure irrespective of the number of houses. My later point, which the hon. Gentleman did not deny, was that because council house subsidies and rents are based on historic costs the true cost of the subsidy of those houses is represented by the cost of disrepair, because enough money has not been put by to repair them and eventually replace them when that is necessary. These figures are not similar, and I made my best efforts to give the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) the figures for which he asked.

Crown Suppliers

13. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 20 April, Official Report, columns 817-18, what criteria he intends to use in assessing the public interest in the proposed privatisation of the Crown Suppliers.

Mr. Chope: I shall ensure that the public interest is taken into account by having regard to wider Government policies, including those for privatisation, procurement, value for money and the maintenance of adequate security.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the House of Commons have the clearest, unambiguous assurance that before any moves to privatise the Crown Suppliers there will be legislation? Or is Parliament to be bypassed?

Mr. Chope: It is not my practice to comment on press speculation about advice requested from or given by officials. I am considering the details of the package for the Crown Suppliers' activities which will be offered for sale to the private sector and the arrangements for the staff of the Crown Suppliers. It is certainly not my intention to bypass this House as yesterday's articles in The Guardian and The Independent suggested.

Mr. Holt: In his consultations and deliberations on privatising the Crown Suppliers, did my hon. Friend recognise the recent experience of Langbaurgh council when it put lighting maintenance out to contract and its in-house tender of £450,000 was beaten by a private sector tender by £150,000? As a consequence, the ratepayers are that much better off and, more important, workers who had their jobs transferred to the private sector are now earning £40 a week extra.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend's latest evidence from his local authority area of the massive savings that can be made from privatisation are being replicated in other areas as the Local Government Act 1988 is implemented. There is no doubt that billions of pounds can be saved for local authorities by going out to competitive tender.

Mr. Boyes: Is the Minister aware that his treatment of the loyal and skilled work force of the Crown Suppliers is seen as high-handed and downright insulting? Does he recall that a petition given to him on his visit to Hastings and signed by 99 per cent. of the work force condemned privatisation and his handling of the situation, and called for staff transfer on a voluntary basis? Why does he not give the Hastings' work force, and, indeed, the entire Crown Suppliers' work force some straight answers, instead of treating them as objects to be flogged off at an auction?

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman does a disservice to himself and to the loyal employees of the Crown Suppliers. It is certainly the intention of management to use its best endeavours to meet staff preferences, but I cannot give assurances that all staff who do not wish to work for the privatised Crown Suppliers can be found jobs within the Civil Service.

European Football

14. Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will next meet the chairman of the Football Association to discuss the future of English participation in European football.

Mr. Moynihan: I met the chairman of the Football Association on Saturday 14 May, together with the president of UEFA and the president of the Football League. It was agreed that the decision on the re-admittance of English clubs was for UEFA and that it would take it in the light of my report of the domestic season and events during the European championships finals.

Mr. Pendry: When the Minister next meets the chairman of UEFA, will he give him, and all of us, some good news? Will the Minister tell him that he intends in future to speak up for our national game and highlight the successes of English football over the past three seasons? In particular, will the Minister praise those who attended last night's match when Manchester United, which would be returned to Europe should the ban be lifted, played the Italian champions AC Milan in front of a crowd of 37,392 and there were no arrests inside or outside the grounds? As this is not an isolated occasion, why is the Minister not being positive and saying that we should be back in Europe? Or will he continue to chicken out?

Mr. Moynihan: I will always speak up for success and I will always speak out against hooliganism. For that reason I have been determined throughout the whole season to put in place a package of measures to deter hooliganism. As for the European championships in West Germany in June, I hope that the comprehensive approach to tackling the problem, particularly through police intelligence and co-ordination, will be successful. Of course I praise games where there have been no arrests, but I hope that the day will come when I need not comment on there being no arrests, because there never should be arrests at sporting venues.

Mr. Ashton: Is the Minister aware that his record in supporting the application of British teams has been despicable this season? Why should innocent people who have committed no offence see their teams barred because of the antics of a few National Front supporters, who will be judged on their behaviour in Germany this summer? When will the Minister start backing British teams and praising British crowds for their good behaviour over the last three years?

Mr. Moynihan: I recognise that the vast majority of football fans go along to enjoy the game and do not want to have anything to do with hooliganism. It is fair to say that the hooligan element is not a football fan element but a criminal element. Regrettably that criminal element has done enormous damage to our national game and to our reputation, not least at Heysel. I am determined to take every possible measure to ensure that the innocent are protected and that at every opportunity we bring to book the criminals—[Interruption.]—who have caused so much trouble for our national game.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know what it is about Environment questions that always lead to an excited atmosphere.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I endeavour to call hon. Members on a fair basis. The hon. Gentleman has had one supplementary question. I decide the order in which Members are called.

Mr. Carlisle: I am very grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. Does my hon. Friend accept from me, as vice-chairman of the all-party football committee, that he has the full support of the Tory Benches in his determination to make the Football Association, the Football League and the European football authorities responsible for their own behaviour and that of their clubs? Does he agree that if more clubs had followed the example of Luton Town football club, worthy winners of the Littlewoods cup, in banning away supporters, with the result that there were no problems of hooliganism this season, all British clubs would be readmitted to Europe?

Mr. Moynihan: I appreciate, recognise and support what Luton has done. It is deserving of support from both sides of the House. As my hon. Friend will know, the package of measures required to tackle hooliganism varies from ground to ground and circumstance to circumstance. It was for that reason that we took police advice on the level of membership schemes appropriate to deter hooligans at each and every ground in the Football League.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Has the Minister monitored the increasingly good behaviour of Scottish football fans, which has meant that no Scottish football teams have been banned from European competition, unlike their English counterparts? Therefore, we should not be talking about British teams in this context. Will he join the chief constable of Strathclyde in congratulating the football crowd at the Scottish cup final on Saturday on their good behaviour, in spite of the provocation of some unusual spectators?

Mr. Moynihan: In regard to the UEFA decision, I have always referred specifically to the readmission of English clubs, because that is what we are talking about. However, because of the record of previous years it has been necessary to put in place exceptional measures in preparation for the game on Saturday. I hope that those measures and the recognition by Scottish as well as English fans of the importance of having a trouble-free game on Saturday will be borne in mind, especially as we are on trial when it comes to UEFA's decision later this season.

Mr. Favell: Will my hon. Friend take it from me that, contrary to the impression given by Opposition Members, the vast majority of people support him entirely in his view that, until he is satisfied that British football fans can behave, under no circumstances should they be allowed to go abroad and bring shame and disgrace to this country?

Mr. Moynihan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. There will never be a time when the Government can guarantee the behaviour of fans in Europe. However, I hope that the comprehensive package of measures to deter hooliganism will result in UEFA recognising that there has been a satisfactory improvement in our national game. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are not on the football terraces here—[Interruption.] Order. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) does not help with his continual shouting across the Chamber.

Mr. Denis Howell: We shall be playing added time, I take it Mr. Speaker.

The Minister is correct to describe the evil people attached to football grounds here and abroad as criminals. However, if that is the case, why are the Government expecting football clubs to police those criminals and to pay the bill? Why are football clubs paying for the policing of their grounds if, as the Minister says, the problem has nothing to do with football clubs? Why does he expect the Football Association to have any control over evildoers abroad? That is something that it should not be expected to do. If this is the Government of law and order, when will their law and order policies bring peace to football?

Mr. Moynihan: I have never said that the problem has nothing to do with football clubs. On the contrary, the package of measures requires decisive action by football clubs to deter the hooligans. The importance of the clubs providing the police inside their grounds is reasonable, as they are going into private property. Outside the football grounds the Government, through the police authorities, pay for extensive policing from the public purse. There is no doubt that the determination shown by the Government in association with the football authorities is absolutely essential if we are to solve these problems. We have to continue with such determination in the future.

BILL PRESENTED

English Church

Mr. Tony Benn, supported by Mr. Eric S. Heffer, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Bill Michie, Mr. Bernie Grant, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Bob Cryer, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Ms. Mildred Gordon, Mr. Chris Smith and Mr. Bob Clay, presented a Bill to disestablish the Church of England: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 156.]

"The House Magazine"

3.31 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Has The House Magazine any official status in the House? I ask this question because the article by the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) in the current edition does not apparently include all that he wrote. What has been deleted?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me. I am not responsible for The House Magazine. I cannot answer the question that the hon. Gentleman is about to put to me. He should raise it with the editor.

Mr. Winnick: On this point——

Mr. Speaker: No, I cannot answer a question like that. The hon. Gentleman now knows perfectly well the content of that article. He would not expect me to make any comment upon it. Nor do I think it is appropriate for him to raise it in the Chamber.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that on a previous occasion an article was written in a review of a book by a professor of journalism, a former business editor of The Times, about a correspondence and contact between a Grand Companion of the Bath, Sir Robert Armstrong, and a Companion of the Bath, Sir Brian Hayes. As a result of that article, the whole issue of The House Magazine was pulped.

There is cause for reflection by the Chair, because outside the House, whether we like it or not, The House Magazine is seen to have the imprimatur of Parliament. If the magazine has nothing to do with the House, why does it have the portcullis all over it? It must be one thing or the other. This review by a respected journalist caused embarrassment to 10 Downing street. Now embarrassment has occurred again for the same reason.

Mr. Speaker: The House Magazine is nothing to do with me. It is nothing to do with a point of order. It is a private publication, and a number of hon. Members sit on the editorial board. I cannot answer questions about it in the Chamber. It has nothing to do with me.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I heartily endorse everything that you have said. As somebody who has an article in the current issue of The House Magazine, which was cut and overwritten, may I say that the points of order that have been raised by Opposition Members are completely bogus?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to answer any questions about The House Magazine. It is absolutely nothing to do with me—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about the portcullis?"] That matter should be drawn to the attention of the appropriate authorities. I am not responsible for that either.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Holt.

Mr. Holt: During questions today, Mr. Speaker, you had occasion to reprimand me. I have no reason to cause you any aggravation and I respect this House very much. You know and I know, because we have had a private conversation on this matter—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—that I will continue to shout, "Shut up, Skinner," as long as—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be unwise if private conversations were exposed in the Chamber because then they would hardly be private. I must advise the hon. Gentleman—[Interruption.] Order. I say to the House that it is a great disservice while the Chair is seeking to concentrate—a high level of concentration is required at Question Time—if hon. Members continually seek to cause distractions. [Interruption.] I must advise the hon. Member that every time that he comes in and does that it causes a disturbance. I ask him to refrain from doing it in future.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No further point of order arises.

WELSH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That the matter of Education and Training for Employment in Wales, being a matter relating exclusively to Wales, be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 7658/86+COR 1 and 9928/87 on the protection of workers from the risks related to exposure to chemical, physical and biological agents, 10662/87 on the protection of workers from the risks related to exposure to carcinogens at work, and 4544/88 on the marketing and use of certain substances and preparations be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the ten-minute Bill.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not taking further points of order on that matter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does it concern The House Magazine?

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I called Mr. Campbell-Savours.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Could you advise me, Mr. Speaker, about whom one should approach regarding the misuse of the portcullis?

Mr. Speaker: The Serjeant at Arms.

We now come to the ten-minute Bill. I call Mr. John Battle.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to take his point of order and the hon. Gentleman knows the reason. I ask him to obey the Chair.

Statutory Minimum Wage

3.37 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to introduce a statutory minimum wage to be paid in all industries and services as a requirement on employers.

I have been asked why I have chosen this opportunity to bring before the House a Bill about a statutory minimum wage. My answer is that it is my first opportunity to do so. First, I represent an area of west Yorkshire in which low pay is the primary cause of family poverty. Secondly, this could not be a more apt time to introduce the Bill because, when our Budget debates have to the national average male wage of £244 per week in Britain, it does not seem to me that there is widespread awareness of how little many people have to live on week by week.

The primary aim of my Bill, therefore, is to eradicate poverty by tackling a primary cause—the persistence, even in what is heralded by the Government as a booming economy, of low pay. My Bill will bring forward a framework for the introduction of a statutory minimum wage in Britain, built on the establishment of a basic level of two thirds of the average wage, with a procedure for regular revision of that figure, and monitoring and enforcement provisions by a new minimum wages inspectorate.

First, I shall address the question whether there is a need for the Bill. West Yorkshire has been traditionally renowned as an area of Britain which pays lower wages than elsewhere. In the heart of my constituency of Leeds, West, which is a traditional textile and engineering manufacturing area, is the Bramley jobcentre. The jobs that are on offer at that jobcentre are predominantly in the service sector and are part-time, temporary and low-paid. One of the best jobs on offer is a general catering assistant post at the princely rate of £2·10 an hour. There are five cleaning jobs featured in the jobcentre window with hourly rates that range from £1·70 an hour. For those who cannot do the arithmetic, that works out at £68 for a 40-hour week. There is a job for a play scheme leader, who needs to have experience and references, at a wage of £55 a week. One can apply for a job as a security guard at a rate of £1·50 an hour for a basic 60-hour week.

This means that there are many working for much less than £2·50 an hour, or £100 a week, which is well less than half the national average of £244 that has been cited in the Budget debates. That is well below the Council of Europe's decency threshold of £3·50 an hour, or £135 a week, which has been fixed for the whole of Europe. In reality, about 9·4 million adult workers in Britain earn less than the Council of Europe's decency threshold of £135 for a week's work. That is one in three of male manual workers in Britain.

The new earnings survey, to which I shall refer briefly without citing figures, spells out the fact that many workers in west Yorkshire are on less than £100 a week. Many workers in Yorkshire, both manual and non-manual—these are predominantly women—earn significantly less than the decency threshold, or half the accepted national average.

Some may say that the remnants of the wages councils remain to deal with the issue. In 1987, 23 per cent. of the establishments checked by the councils were found to be paying less than the set levels. The clothing industry is one of the lowest of the low-paid industries, yet the Minister has been petitioned to abolish the wages council that sets wages in that industry and its hourly rate is £1·98 an hour.

A new minimum wages inspectorate is needed to replace the voluntary approach which has been tried and has failed. If the view is presented that most low-paid workers are women who do not need the money they earn —the so-called pin-money argument—and that home workers, who number about 250,000 in Britain, and piece-rate workers should not be counted, I shall press the argument for economic justice in our society by using the following quotation:

"Just remuneration for the work of an adult who is responsible for a family means remuneration which will suffice for establishing and properly maintaining a family and for providing security for its future."

I suggest that that should be our baseline approach. To generate a low-wage economy for a large minority in our society alongside the current economic boom for the rest of us is grossly unjust. It is pricing people into work at the expense of their families.

I shall use what little time remains to me to argue that a statutory minimum wage will not jeopardise the economy but will increase its efficiency. I could press the case that a national minimum wage operates effectively in many other countries. I could further ask, with the move to an integrated European labour market in 1992, what more opportune moment could there be to prepare for it by adopting the Council of Europe's decency threshold as the statutory minimum wage? Without a commitment to a national minimum wage, we perpetuate the conditions that manufacture poverty in our society alongside the wealth of others.

The Bill offers an opportunity to change those conditions and to introduce a basic cornerstone that will enable us to tackle poverty in our society. The way to prevent poverty is to pay decent wages and not force families into the benefit system. I hope that the Bill will gain the support of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Battle, Mr. Frank Cook, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Ms. Clare Short, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. Tony Blair, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Ms. Harriet Harman, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mr. Kevin Barron, Mr. Ian McCartney and Mr. Doug Henderson.

STATUTORY MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. John Battle accordingly presented a Bill to introduce a statutory minimum wage to be paid in all industries and services as a requirement on employers: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 July and to be printed. [Bill 168.]

Orders of the Day

British Steel Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

Clause 1

VESTING OF PROPERTY ETC. OF BRITISH STEEL CORPORATION IN A SUCCESSOR COMPANY

3.45 pm

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 2, line 13, at end insert

(7) The Secretary of State shall, after consultation with the appropriate trade unions, nominate to the board of the successor company two directors in the employee interest.'.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) moved two new clauses to ensure the appointment to the board of the new company of directors selected by the trade unions who represent workers in the steel industry. The new clauses tried to obtain a large representation for such directors on the board. I believe that one of the new clauses tried to establish that one fifth of the board should be worker directors or appointed by the trade unions. The new clauses were rejected by the Government, with their Tory majority, one because the Government claimed it was otiose, and the other on a matter of principle.

This amendment is more modest. It does not suggest that the appointment should be made by the trade union movement. It proposes that the Government should appoint two directors to the board of the successor company after consultation with the appropriate trade unions. So in theory, if not necessarily in practice, the directors may not be members of the trade union. They may not work in the steel industry or even be the people suggested by the trade unions. We know that all Governments, and particularly this one, do not necessarily accept the advice of those they consult. To be honest, there is no reason why they should. Consulting does not necessarily mean taking the advice given.

The only clear criterion that we are seeking to lay down for these two directors is that they should be appointed to represent the interests of the employees. Obviously, our amendment had to be different for procedural reasons. If it had been the same as the new clauses I doubt whether it would have been selected for debate. We hope that our more limited proposal will attract the support of the Government. It meets at least some of the objections that the Under-Secretary made during his rebuttal of our new clauses in Committee. He referred, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) to the problems that arose when worker nominees were appointed to the steel board after nationalisation in the 1960s. In this case, however, the Government have the right to veto trade union nominees and to suggest their own names.

During the debate in Committee the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Preston——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): South Ribble.

Mr. Maxton: I apologise.

The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins)—I thought that was a bus company—said:

"I hope seriously that the Committee will not consider my next remark as patronising, but I am aware from experience in my own large and industrial constituency"— the Minister kept claiming that he was a powerful trade unionist—

"that workers do not want to be directors involved on a daily basis with the management of the company. I have spoken to employees in Leyland Vehicles, British Aerospace and BTR. Employees want to make certain that their views can be heard. The complaint has always been about the channels of communication rather than about active participation in the direction of the company."

That is exactly what our amendment seeks to do. It does not seek, as the new clauses sought, to put on the board worker directors appointed by trade unions. It says that we need two directors who will listen to the problems of the workers and will put those problems to the board. It meets exactly the point made by the Minister in Committee and creates a channel of communication between the employees and the board of directors. I hope that the Minister will note that.

I accept that the amendment does not overcome the Minister's more basic objection, that the Government do not wish to put statutory restraints on a new company. That brings us to the basic philosophical divide between the Government and the Opposition. In Committee, the Minister said:

"a director's responsibility is, first and foremost, to the company collectively . . . rather than to a specific electorate". —[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 28 April 1988; c. 815-17.]

He was trying to suggest that all directors would maintain an interest in the employees of the company and that there was no need to appoint special directors for that purpose. I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South who told the Minister that a company is defined in law as the shareholders. Thus the sole responsibility of directors is to the shareholders and not in any way to the employees or to the community in which the company is based.

The Government and their supporters believe that a company must be run to ensure the maximum profit for those who invest in it. They have little or no concern for the work force or for the rest of the community in which a company is based. If profits can be increased by so-called rationalisation, which as we all know is the polite word for closure, or if losses can be minimised by such a move, it is the interests of the shareholders which will be taken into account by the board of directors. They will not take account of the interests of the work force, those who have invested their labour, time and effort in the company. If profits can be increased by keeping down wages or by altering the conditions of employment, the directors have a responsibility and a duty to ensure that that happens. That is because their first responsibility is the profit of the shareholders.

Employees who have perhaps given their whole working life to a company have a much greater investement in it than do some shareholders who have moved money in for profit and will move it out without a thought if that is the best way to get an increased return. They will sell the shares to whomever will give them the biggest price, whatever the nationality of the purchaser or his motives for buying.

The work force has more right to a say than the shareholders, because the very livelihood of workers depends on the success of the company. Directors from the work force may have a great deal more expertise about the running of the company than some non-executive directors. Such directors may be appointed by an insurance company or other institutional shareholders whose only interest is in ensuring profits for the company and who may have no knowledge whatever of the steel industry.

In Committee, the Minister suggested that the right to purchase shares that the Government would give employees would give them the stake in the company that we are seeking, and that would lead to the appointment of worker directors. However, the Government's proposal for shareholdings for employees is so limited that it is highly unlikely that, even if all employee shareholders were to vote en masse, from top management down to labourer, they would have a voting share large enough to ensure a director on the board. I shall have further questions for the Minister about that.

The Labour party does not believe that this modest amendment will give the work force any real power. In Committee, we repeatedly made it clear that we are opposed to privatisation, and that we believe that the steel industry would be best left in public hands, perhaps with changes that would give the work force a greater share and a greater say in how the company is run. Privatisation is bad for the British economy and for those who work in the steel industry. However, given that the Government majority will push it through, as well as opposing the Bill, we have a responsibility to ensure that if it becomes law, the employees in the industry are protected as best we can in difficult circumstances.

Our two directors might be outvoted when the board suggests closure, but at least there would be someone to give the views of the workers and obtain some concessions from the board. Perhaps I am being over-optimistic in thinking that the Government might accept the principle of this proposal, but I live in hope.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): It would be churlish of the Conservative party not to recognise that the amendment is at least much more moderate than that tabled in Committee, and that the Labour party has come a long way from the days of Bullock and worker directors —the direction in which we were heading in the late 1970s. Although it is modest, the amendment is as flawed as the previous one because it assumes that the employees' interest is necessarily distinct and separate from the interest of the shareholders or the interest of the company as a whole.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) gave the game away when he said that the other directors would be interested only in profits. That is a misleading view of the duties, responsibilities and interests of the directors of a public company. A director of a public company is interested not simply in profits but in the success of that company and that enterprise, and that embraces the well-being of those who work for it.

As well as being fundamentally flawed in principle by its reference to "employee interest", the amendment, if it were carried, would be defective in practice. Far from strengthening the channel of communication, as has been suggested, it would cut clean across it. For example, what would be the relationship between the two directors and the local steel union convenors, or the national trade union committee, when it came to putting forward the employee interest? Who would be speaking for the employees—the trade unions or the two worker directors?

Secondly, the amendment is defective in practice because it assumes, through its reference to "employee interest", that different directors have different interests and that there can be a specialist director—not simply one who is in a full-time or part-time capacity or is an executive or non-executive member, but specialist in the view that he takes of the duties of a director. It seems to me that those in the new category of worker director would be placed in the impossible and invidious position of weighing their general duties to the company and their general obligations to the shareholders against the particular interest that they should have in regard to their employees. I believe that that would place them in an impossible position and would be no recipe for the smooth running of an important public company. For those reasons, the amendment should be resisted.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Notwithstanding the cogency of the argument of the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), he will not be surprised when I say that I support my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton), who made a very reasonable case.

I consider that the British Steel Corporation work force, which is highly successful and co-operative, deserves extended rights to information, consultation and representation. I do not consider that any work force should be kept in the dark, especially because individual workers in the steel industry often devote their whole working lives to the industry. My hon. Friend, in proposing the amendment, made a strong case for a channel of communication.

Ordinary working people should be involved at every level—on the shop floor through their trade unions. Certainly, the leadership of the trade unions at BSC Shotton would acknowledge that. The work force has earned the ability to get to the heart of the company now proposed. The steel industry has suffered closures, cuts and almost perpetual demanning. Throughout the 1980s, the work force of BSC has broken records and has given the company exemplary co-operation and immense loyalty. It deserves the facility proposed in the amendment.

The amendment does not ask for a great deal. At a major turning point in the history of the industry in Britain, it will help to dispel suspicion and to promote co-operation. I recollect the worker-director scheme as it operated in the 1970s. At divisional level, the worker director of BSC Shotton, Mr. Jack Leonard, played a heroic role, and was the means of expressing the shop floor's views to the managing director. At main board level, the status of the director in the employee interest was very considerable. He could relate directly to the TUC's iron and steel committee and each union then disseminated information to its membership in each steel works throughout the country.

I urge the Government to accept this modest amendment, given that their proposals represent a turning point in the history of the industry.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): If the Government are serious about involving employees in any industry, they should accept the amendment, which relates to worker directors. We have heard about the valuable role of such a position in steel companies and how it has been a link between the work force, giving their trade unions a direct say on the board.

If we are to make progress with industrial democracy, we should include such measures which have been pioneered by BSC and not go backwards, which is what the Government are doing, by throwing out of the window all the work in industrial democracy that has been done within BSC. The amendment would allow the reformed company to become a modern, progressive company, striving to compete in the steel market, and trying to set a model for industrial democracy and the involvement of its work force.

If the work force is meaningfully involved in decision making, as well as the end product, the company will work better and more efficiently and the work force will have a greater commitment to it if the employees feel part of the company and their views are heard and taken into account.

I have worked in industries where much of the manufacturing plant was designed as a result of suggestions from the work force, the people at the sharp end of production who often see ways of making production more efficient, cheaper and more cost-effective. Such progress is best brought about by direct involvement which does not give people a few pounds as a reward for their suggestions, but gives those who work in the industry a real say in decision-making and genuine involvement.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): In supporting the amendment, I reflect the views of my party, which firmly believes in employee participation as being a vital factor in improving industrial relations. The amendment concerns the steel industry, a vast, complex and significant industry for economic and social life. The vastness and complexity of the industry produces even stronger arguments for ensuring that employee directors are appointed to the new board. That would ensure that no part of the industry was seen in isolation from the rest of the industry and that there were clear channels of communication from the work force to the management, ensuring that full information about decisions is disseminated and fully comprehended by everyone. That would be a sounder basis for progress.

The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) put forward rather a strange argument when he suggested that employee directors would in some way be at odds with other directors. It seems to me that they would have interests very similar to those of other directors. After all, employee directors would be concerned about the success of the steel industry, as they would be only too well aware that on that success hinged the future security and work prospects of a vast number of people. Therefore, they would participate fully, and would make sure that their views were heard and that any decisions would be to the advantage of everyone in the industry.

This modest amendment gives the Government an opportunity to show the work force in British Steel, and those who will be employed in the steel industry after privatisation, that there is genuine concern to ensure that all aspects of the industry are explained and discussed by all those who consider that the industry will have a vital impact on their future. That future surely includes the employees, and the Government have an ideal opportunity to express their commitment to the work force.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said that this was a modest amendment compared with what the Labour party and the Labour movement had in mind in the 1970s with the Bullock report. I well remember the report of Mr. Bullock, which was a great venture to bridge the terrible gap that had existed for a century between capitalism and labour. The ideas in the Bullock report originally came from General de Gaulle, who, from his lofty vision, wanted to find some way of achieving worker participation. He believed that workers ought to participate in the affairs of their companies, other than simply by selling their labour.

In the 1970s, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) pointed out that a working man invests most of his time, apart from his sleeping time, in the factory or the firm in which he works, and that that investment should have some return, other than simply a wage. De Gaulle had the idea of worker participation, which was taken up by Mr. Bullock in the 1970s and for which we had great hopes at that time.

I remember a conversation with Lord Callaghan who was the Prime Minister of the time. We were discussing ways of getting the Bullock report on to the statute book. He pointed out that with no majority in the House it was impossible. Following the election in 1979, events turned away from the concept of involving workers in their factory other than through the sale of their labour.

When General de Gaulle introduced worker participation, he also introduced a system in France with two sets of books. One set was for the workers on the board and one was for the other directors. When the Italians introduced worker participation, they had three sets of books—one for the directors who were not workers, one for the workers and a third for the tax man. That shows how things were done differently in Italy and France from the way we envisaged worker participation in Britain.

I remember an incident in the 1970s when there was a worker participation experiment in Birtley. A trade unionist on the board of a company in Birtley went to a meeting with the management and came back at 5 o'clock with the management proposals. He told the workers that those proposals ought to be accepted by the workers. The workers tied him to a chair an kept him there all night. They said, "That is what we do with those who come here as worker directors with proposals from the management." Therefore, that experiment came to a sorry end and again we failed to convince the work force that there was an interest for them in having proper participation.

As the hon. Member for Darlington said, this is a modest amendment and one which reflects the fact that the Opposition are unable to make progress other than by way of persuasion. We cannot take on the massed battalions of Tory Members in the Division Lobby. Therefore, we are seeking to persuade the Government that it is an appropriate amendment, worthy of consideration and acceptance.

We must bear in mind the long tradition in the steel industry of worker directors. In the 1960s the steel industry pioneered the idea of worker directors. A series of worker directors over many years were successful in linking the work force of BSC with the management in the best interests of the company and the country. Therefore, we have seen successful worker participation in the steel industry and that is why we have tabled the amendment, however modest it may be. We wish to see continued involvement of the work force at board level with BSC or its successor company and prior to privatisation.

I make those comments in the interests of my constituents on Teesside who work within the British Steel Corporation. In 1979 there were some 25,000 workers in the steel industry on Teesside and that has been reduced to about 7,000. Many thousands receive a British Steel Corporation pension and they were rudely surprised to learn that under the new social security measures introduced by the Government they were net losers. Taking into account their BSC pension, they were to lose some of the state benefits to which they had become accustomed prior to the change in legislation. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield said, those men and some women—although not many—invested their working lives in the steel industry and now see their pensions cut by the Government. That is a great disappointment to those people, as it was to others, who had seen the steel industry as a bastion of the economy on Teesside.

We do not wish to see a privatised steel industry without the worker participation that we desire. We do not wish to see the links between workers and management cut so that they are adrift and we return to a society of "them and us".

The 7,000 or so who continue to work in the steel industry on Teesside look forward to the future of British Steel on Teesside in their interests as workers and as part of the local economy. They wish to see their representatives on the board of the company. We do not know whether the massive takeover of BSC will be followed by the setting up of regional boards with regional input, but if that happens there may be directors on those boards. Certainly, the workers want an opportunity to have their voices heard through worker directors. We ask the Government to take the amendment seriously and to consider it in the best interests of co-operation between labour and capital in the future.

Mr. Atkins: The substance of the debate is reminiscent of the "them and us" mentality that has characterised the Labour party's industrial relations policy for many years. In many respects, it harps back to the days when that sort of tokenism caused some difficulties. Labour Members, particularly as the party is presently constituted, always assume that the Government and the Conservative party are somehow anti-union and opposed—[Interruption.] As the House will recall, at the previous election and the election before that a substantial number—in the 1983 election, a majority—of trade union members voted Conservative rather than for the parties represented by Opposition Members. In those circumstances, Opposition Members have to be cautious in making the assumption that the Government are anti-union.

Far be it from me to remind the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) that, like him, I am a member of what was the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs and is now Manufacturing, Science, Finance. I suspect that I have done as much work in my union activities as he has. I also suspect that that work has been more effective, as I am in government and he is not. To that extent, I am not unfamiliar with or unsupportive of trade union activities. The hon. Gentleman will know that, as we discussed the matter in Committee.

The experience of the past, as represented by the difficulties experienced by Sir Charles Villiers and others, with worker directors was that the divisions caused within the trade union movement and with the worker directors was such that they did not want to continue to do the job with which they were faced. I can do no better than repeat what I said in Committee:

"directors have Companies Act responsibilities, as well as moral and industrial responsibilities for their employees' quality of life—for example, concerning pension funds, industrial relations and so on".—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 28 April 1988; c. 819-20.]

The hon. Gentleman will know that Jack Eccles, who is on the board now, does a remarkable job. He does so because of his experience, knowledge and understanding and not simply because he is a trade unionist, albeit a distinguished one.

It is worth recording that the Government and, more especially in this context, the company recognise the important contribution that has been made by the trade unions in the British steel industry over the years, particularly through the trying and difficult times that it has experienced in recent years. They respect trade unions and understand their requirement to represent their members' interests. They wish that to continue after privatisation. I have no reason to suppose that the excellent relationships between the chairman and the various trade unions representatives as well as other members within the company will not continue to be as good as they were in the past.

The directors of the successor company will be appointed by the company in conformity with the provisions of the Companies Act. The Secretary of State will have a role in that process to the extent that he is a shareholder. As I have said, such matters are governed by the Companies Act and it is not our intention that the Secretary of State should have any additional powers of the sort proposed by the amendment. The successor company should not be subject to any more statutory intervention than other Companies Act companies. It will appoint directors on their merits and it would be inappropriate to provide for statutory intervention by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Maxton: As the Minister said, the Secretary of State will be the only shareholder in the company when it is first set up. Does he intend to appoint two trade union representatives to the board at that stage? If the Minister was prepared to say that, it might make some difference to our vote.

Mr. Atkins: The Secretary of State may or may not appoint various people, but he will appoint individuals on their merits, and not because they are trade unionists or anything else.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): It is relevant.

Mr. Atkins: Of course it is relevant; the hon. Gentleman makes the point that he made in Committee. Of course trade unions have a part to play. I speak as a trade unionist myself, and I understand the contribution that trade unions have to make. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) put it so eloquently, we do not believe in tokenism, because we believe that the time for that has passed.

[Mr. Atkins]

The issue of worker directors was discussed at considerable length in Committee, and we had a particularly interesting debate on it. We concluded that there was a philosophical divide. I emphasise that, at least on my part—and I suspect on that of my hon. Friends who served on the Committee—there was no anti-trade union bias. There was simply a difference of attitude. Conservative Members believe that management should manage and trade unions should represent the interests of the employees.

Mr. Gould: As the Minister said, we had an interesting debate in Committee. On that occasion, he appeared to take the view that the fact that a person represented the work force disqualified him from having the objectivity that might be required of a director. Is that still his view?

Mr. Atkins: As I recall, I said that all directors had a Companies Act responsibility for everything that went on in the company, which includes matters related to employees. If a group of people were elected or selected —whatever phrase we use—directors to represent a particular interest, that would, by definition, conflict with their Companies Act responsibility, which is to represent interests wider than those of a specific group. That is why it is vital that directors should be selected on their merits rather than specifically to represent a particular group of people.

Mr. Maxton: I find that slightly surprising. Is the Minister saying that, if one of the banks finishes up with a major shareholding in one of the companies, that bank will not insist on having a nominee on the board to represent its own interests rather than those of the whole company?

Mr. Atkins: Not necessarily. I do not see how the hon. Gentleman's question conflicts with my last point. I emphasised that we select on merit. I have already said that someone like Jack Eccles—[Interruption.] That does not destroy the point. Hon. Members must not make sedentary interventions that disprove their own point. I have emphasised that Jack Eccles, with his experience and expertise, has contributed greatly to the affairs of the board and the company. He was selected on merit and I hope that that policy will continue, rather than the tokenism that Opposition Members persist in advocating merely because they believe that they are the only people who represent the trade union movement, which is clearly not the case.

Mr. Morley: Part of the problem in the past was that on occasions worker directors were used to apologise for hostile company action threatening the work force. However, the amendment could be used to take a new and imaginative direction in industrial relations. For example, in the share offer the total equity given to the work force could be 25 per cent. The Government could hold a 50 per cent. golden share and 25 per cent. could be sold on the open market. The work force would then have a direct involvement and we could have radical and progressive attitudes to industrial democracy rather than what is in the Bill.

Mr. Atkins: I do not agree that the approach is new and imaginative. As I said, I think that it is a very old-fashioned approach, which has been tried in part and did not work. Our belief in employee participation is based largely on the fact that we believe that employees should be owners of their companies in the sense of being shareholders. Many trade unions have already suggested that they believe that they can exert pressure on the direction of the company—guiding the board of directors —by virtue of having a portion of the shares to give them the right to influence events and as shareholders. That is what we would prefer.

I emphasise yet again that it is a mistake for Opposition Members to think that the amendment would protect the interests of trade union representatives and employees. We believe that argument to be fundamentally flawed.

Mr. Morley: The Minister may have missed what I said. Although the share issue has already been announced, the percentage has not been announced. I suggested that the amendment could be linked to giving 25 per cent. of the total share issue to the work force, which force would then have not only a direct involvement through the share issue but a more meaningful involvement through the worker director arrangements.

Mr. Atkins: Employees will have the chance to buy shares under what will be one of the more generous schemes in the privatisation process with which the Government have been associated. I can speak only from personal experience. I have a semi-industrial constituency and I know people in companies such as Leyland, British Aerospace and others who are actively involved in the day-to-day running of large concerns. The view of my constituents—except those whose politics are extreme in either direction—is, broadly speaking, that management is there to manage and trade unions are there to represent employees' interests. That view is also held by many trade unionists.

Communication is the most important aspect of the day-to-day running of a company. Much of the criticism arises not because employees want someone on the board to represent their interests but because they would prefer to know what is going on on a more regular basis so that they can participate through their negotiating procedures and through the structure of the trade union as it is involved in pay bargaining, conditions of employment and so on. Employees would prefer not to be involved as directors in the day-to-day management of the company.

There was a philosophical divide on that between Conservative and Labour Members in Committee. I urge the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) to read the relevant debate. While he is clearly more likely to agree with his hon. Friends, I think that he will find the debate interesting. I return to the point that I have been making all along. The directors are there to look after the interests of all those involved in the company. The Government are not hostile to trade unions, because we believe strongly that they have the right to exist, to negotiate and carry out their day-to-day activities on behalf of their members. However, we believe that tokenism as represented by the amendment is an old-fashioned process rather than a modern one.

Mr. Gould: The Minister is being characteristically generous in giving way. It is important that we should get on record the essential divide between us. As I understand it, the Minister is saying that whoever the shareholders are and however temporary and short-lived their interests, they are entitled to have those interests represented and protected on the board and therefore to have control over the direction of the enterprise. The work force, whose members are so much more closely involved, as their lives and livelihoods depend on the enterprise, are apparently disqualified by that fact alone from representation and from having their interests protected. Is that what the Minister is saying?

Mr. Atkins: We share the desire to ensure that employees are represented in the day-to-day running of the company. However, it is a legal requirement of the Companies Act that a director should have at the centre of his decisions and concern the interests of all those in the company, whatever their involvement. We do not believe that worker directors are necessary, and such arrangements have failed in the past. In those circumstances—as I have tried to indicate on a personal basis if no other—my understanding and experience suggest that most people involved in a company's day-to-day activities prefer to get on with the job in hand. They want to know what the company is about and to understand through communication and a variety of other ways where the company is heading and to know of its successes and problems.

They also want to know what the future holds and how they may best improve their work processes, and so on. However, they do not want to be involved at board level. If the hon. Gentleman asked many people working in industry, he would find that such a view is generally held. Perhaps it is not held by trade union activists, who may wish to become members of the board and are probably prejudiced.

4.30 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): It has been suggested to my hon. Friend that shareholders may have only a short-term interest in the company whereas an employee is likely to have a long-term interest. Will he confirm that a shareholder is just as likely to have a long-term interest as an employee, and that an employee is just as likely to have a short-term interest in the company as a shareholder?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend, who is an authority on these matters, speaks with considerable truthfulness. He represents a steel constituency, and he understands the work force at Corby, albeit residual, better than most. He is in a position to speak knowledgeably. Many trade union pension funds are involved, on a day-to-day basis, in share ownership. Opposition Members may themselves be shareholders in that way.

We have explored this issue at great length. Opposition Members have tried to suggest that the Government are opposed to trade unions and are not prepared to accept the amendment because we want to do trade unions down yet again. I have demonstrated, at least to the satisfaction of my hon. Friends, that such is not the case.

Mr. Gould: What there are of them.

Mr. Atkins: It is an indication that they are unconcerned by the threat which the hon. Gentleman purports to present, as would seem to be the case among Opposition Members, given the paucity of numbers on the hon. Gentleman's own Benches during the passage of what is, by the Opposition's own standards, a highly controversial Bill. This matter was explored at length in Committee, in a debate which was worth hearing and reading. I reject the essence of what is being proposed in the amendment and urge my hon. Friends to do so.

Mr. Maxton: I am not surprised at the Minister's reply. I commented at the end of my opening remarks that I live ever in hope and that I am one of nature's born optimists —or so my wife is always telling me. However, obviously, I was wrong. It was inevitable that the Government would make their argument about token trade unionists. If we are to speak of tokenism, the Minister is clearly the Government's own token trade unionist on the Front Bench—there are not many others. As to his membership of ASTMS, now the MSF, to which we both belong, it actively campaigned to have me elected to the House, but I am not sure that it did the same for the Minister. I am rather convinced that it did the opposite.

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman should be careful in suggesting that I am a token trade unionist. If he examines any of the records of Members' interests, he will discover that many Government Members are trade unionists. More important, an even greater number of Government Members were elected by the majority of trade unionists in their constituencies voting Conservative.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Most of them are directors who are lining their pockets as fast as they can.

Mr. Maxton: I shall not respond to my hon. Friend's sedentary intervention, but I shall sit down if he wishes to speak.

Perhaps those on the Government Front Bench would like to declare their trade union membership—except for the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins). They might be rather pushed to do so—I do not imagine that Lloyd's is a trade union.

The Minister made a smooth reply—I believe that one of my hon. Friends called it a smarmy reply—and made great play of his trade union membership and of the Government's belief in trade unionism and he spoke of the Government's wish to see active unions getting on with the job, yet they accuse us all the time of tokenism. We cannot win this argument. In Committee, we tabled a strong new clause suggesting that one fifth of the board should comprise trade union members appointed by the unions. We were then accused of extremism and of going over the top. When we make a more modest proposal, we are accused by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) of backing off from our commitment to worker participation.

We accept that the Tory party is the Government and that we have to work within their bounds, however much we may dislike them. That is why we made a reasonably modest proposal for trade union participation. Our commitment to involving the work force in company decisions is not token. It is not tokenism to have as members of a board people representing the trade union movement. Far from that being a backward step, it is a step forward. The backward step is that being taken by the Government in suggesting privatisation in the first place. It is the Government who are attempting to return industrial relations and the ownership of companies to the conventions operated in the 19th century, let alone the 1960s or 1970s.

[Mr. Maxton]

It is astonishing that any Conservative Member should say that he supports unions and that the Government have not spent the past seven years attempting to destroy the trade union movement, when that is the Government's aim. The trade union movement is, quite rightly, linked to my own party. The Prime Minister has said that it is one of her prime objectives to destroy Socialism. In my view, that can only be achieved by destroying trade unions as well.

In replying to the amendment, the Minister raised a number of interesting points. It is clear now that, once the Bill is enacted and the new Companies is established under the Companies Acts, there will be only one shareholder, the Secretary of State. Speaking in terms of the present Government, it will be the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster who will be that single shareholder. It will be he who appoints the board of directors. Our view is that at least two of the directors, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster having discussed this matter with the steel unions, ought to represent the industry's workers and all the employees—not just those who work on the shop floor.

The Minister has stated that he will appoint to the board people with appropriate qualifications. We have a right to know—and have not been told this at any stage—what qualifications will be required, who the Minister has in mind, and from what source those directors will be drawn. I presume that British Steel's present chairman, Sir Robert Scholey, and Jake Stewart may be among them, but who else?

Mr. Atkins: Wait and see.

Mr. Maxton: That is the trouble. That was the Minister's answer to almost every question put to him throughout the whole of the Committee stage. This is an enabling Bill designed to give the Government carte blanche to do whatever they damn well like with the steel industry once it has been privatised. That is what is wrong with the Bill. We do not know who will be on the board of directors that is to run the country's steel industry.

What will happen when the flotation takes place? Will the new shareholders necessarily accept the board of directors appointed by the Secretary of State? Perhaps, although I consider it very unlikely. The employee shareholding will be such that the employee shareholders will say, "Hey, we are not accepting this board of directors. You can get rid of him, or her, for a start. We want our director in his place." What would be the Secretary of State's answer to that? Will a new board of directors be appointed immediately after flotation?

I am afraid that the Minister is wrong. It seems highly likely that one of the big institutional investors will gain a large shareholding, as I do not believe that the average punter will buy many shares. If the company is to be sold at all, it will be sold to the big investment companies and share institutions, because that is the nature of the industry. If Barclays bank, the Bank of Scotland, the Royal Bank of Scotland or an insurance company obtains a large bulk of shares, it will probably insist that one of the directors represents it on the board, which is normal, standard practice in business. That person is there not to represent the whole company and look after its interests, but to represent that particular institution and ensure that its shareholding is looked after. He is interested in one of two things: either a high return in profits, or boosting the share price so that he can sell at a good price and get out of the company altogether.

Mr. Atkins: Why do the hon. Gentleman and many of his hon. Friends think that profit is a dirty word? Profit, after all, is the lubricant that makes the company expand, which is to the benefit of all those working in it—particularly the employees.

Mr. Maxton: We do not believe that profit is a dirty word. We do, however, believe that profit generated by an industry should be used properly for the benefit of both the industry and the employees within it. That is not the track record of free-market capitalism, either in the past or in the present. We cannot guarantee that the unbridled profit motive will allow proper attention to be paid to the interests of employees, or the community in which industries are based. The company is interested primarily in making a profit for the shareholders. That is the law as it stands, and the Government have reinforced it continually. The shareholder is the company, and the interests of the shareholder—the profit of the shareholder—are inevitably the major concern of a company once it moves into private hands.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): I have always understood, with my lack of economic knowledge, that in general terms profit is a return to an investor on a capital investment. Given that the thousands of millions of pounds invested over the past 10 years have been invested by the taxpayer, will my hon. Friend ask the Minister when the profit will be returned to them over the next five years, now that British Steel is in a healthy condition?

Mr. Maxton: We asked that question time and again in Committee, and the Minister never gave us an answer. He may yet have an opportunity during the evening, or perhaps the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, as he was not on the Committee, may take the opportunity to answer it on Third Reading.

However modest this proposal, I consider that it is realistic and would serve the interests of the work force. It is not tokenism, but a genuine attempt to ensure proper communications between work force and management, in which we believe. It is not we who believe in the "them and us" view of our industries; it is the Government, who have reinforced that attitude and made it worse over the past eight years. We believe in genuine co-operation, and good management in this country knows that such co-operation is the best way of achieving higher productivity. It is a great pity that the Government do not believe in it as well.

I ask my hon. Friends to support the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 2

Reduction and subsequent extinguishment of Corporation's public dividend capital

Mr. Gould: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 2, line 16, leave out from 'by' to end of line 19 and insert 'an amount equal to the accumulated historical cost losses on vesting day, thereby extinguishing those losses.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 3, in page 2, line 16, after 'amount', insert 'not exceeding 10 per cent. of the total'.

No. 25, in page 2, line 38, at end add—

'(5) The Secretary of State shall direct that a public investment reserve be created of an amount equal to the reduction of public dividend capital under subsection (1) above which—

(a) so long as it exists, ranks for dividends on the same basis as an equivalent nominal amount of share capital in the successor company which is held by the Secretary of State; and

(b) may be extinguished at any time by payment by the successor company to the Secretary of State of the then current market value of the equivalent nominal value of the share capital so extinguished'.

No. 6, in page 5, line 6, leave out '("the statutory reserve")' and insert 'which shall be known as the British Steel Investment Reserve and used exclusively for the purposes of investment in new plant and training.'.

No. 7, in page 5, line 7, leave out subsections (2) to (4).

No. 26, in page 5, line 7, leave out from 'reserve' to end of line 23 and insert 'shall rank for dividends on the same basis as an equivalent nominal amount of share capital in the successor company which is held by the Secretary of State.

(2a) The statutory reserve may be extinguished at any time by payment by the successor company to the Secretary of State of the then current market value of the equivalent nominal value of the share capital so extinguished'.

No. 28, in page 5, line 14, leave out from 'applied' to end of line 16 and insert 'to investment in plant or capacity or to sustain plants threatened with closure.'.

Mr. Gould: The amendments bear upon clauses 2, 3 and 7 which are, in many respects, at the heart of the Bill. The Bill is, of course, principally concerned with the capital restructuring of the British Steel Corporation so that it can be prepared for privatisation and its assets and liabilities vested in the successor company in such a way as to comply with companies legislation.

A way must be found of taking over a corporation that has accumulated considerable losses and has, accordingly, drawn substantially on taxpayers' financial support. That is essentially the problem faced by the Government, and it causes us great concern. We must find a way of taking account of that and of writing off a good deal of the indebtedness and losses so that the assets and liabilities can be put in a proper form to comply with company legislation.

However, the Government appear to be trying to draw a line at the point where the corporation ceased to make losses and moved into profit and to provide that, until that point, those losses were the taxpayers' responsibility, but that after that point, any profits should be available to the new private owners. We are concerned about that aspect and wish to quiz Ministers about it.

We are assured that none of this involves any subsidy of any sort. One understands exactly why that firm protestation should be made. Apart from any anxiety that might arise on this side, it would undoubtedly create slight difficulties with the EEC Commission if there were thought to be any element of subsidy. We are also told that there is no gift to the new private owners and no loss to the taxpayers. Ministers have made this clear on several occasions. Whenever these issues were debated in Committee, they have given us exactly those assurances.

5 pm

The Government have gone further than that in the valuable and welcome notes on clauses. In respect of clause 2, for example, the notes say that this is "solely an accounting transaction". Another passage states that there is "no forgiveness of debt or other liabilities."

The guidance notes on clause 7 say:

"The provision does not have the effect of giving money to the successor company."

In picking out these remarks in the guidance notes, I do not mean to be churlish. They are extremely welcome and valuable, and we are grateful to the Government for providing them. I hope that nothing I say will deter their production in future. But are these statements to be taken exactly at face value?

It is not surprising that some sensitivity on this issue is displayed by the fact that these notes specifically took up these points and tried to give assurances. It is worth trying to unravel exactly what has happened to the financial structure of the British Steel Corporation and what the Bill proposes to do to change it. For reasons that are well understood, BSC traded at a loss over a long period. I would argue that this was for reasons that were at least primarily the responsibility of mistaken economic policies, not least to do with the exchange rate introduced by the Government in the early 1980s. Taxpayers were required, for good reason, to stump up a good deal of money to keep this vital British industry afloat.

It was decided by the Government that the provision of that financial support should not take the form of an ordinary loan or some other form of repayable capital sum on which dividends or interest should be paid, but should be public dividend capital. In principle, even that public dividend capital, as its title suggests, should have produced a dividend for taxpayers. But as we established in Committee, except for an early period, in practical terms no dividend or other payment has ever been made to taxpayers.

Perhaps the Minister would confirm that the public dividend capital totals more than £4 billion. It is worth adverting to a point that I raised on a couple of occasions in Committee, but which the Minister failed to answer. It is that no payment of any sort and no interest or dividend has been paid on that public dividend capital. That has strongly influenced the corporation's profitability over that period and today. When considering the future profitability of the corporation we must take into account the fact that the cost-free public dividend capital will not be available to the private owners.

Does the Minister agree that the benefit to the corporation and the disadvantage to the future operation of the successor company could be quantified? It should be possible to make a calculation according to the then prevailing commercial interest rates—let us set aside the question of dividends and assume that the money was made available on ordinary commercial terms—of how much that dividend capital was worth year by year to the corporation, and its impact on the much touted level of profitability, on the basis of which the industry is now being offered for sale.

We well understand that the level of profitability is the key to the price that the Government think they can achieve on the market. Clearly, they are basing their calculations on a projected level of profitability of about £400 million per annum. If that figure is to be written down to take account of the cost of the capital—the borrowing—which has not been taken into account, that will substantially affect what the Government could expect to receive in the market place. I hope that today the Minister can enlighten us on what that figure might represent, because it tells us a great deal about the price which might be expected.

It is the taxpayers' misfortune that the Government decided that taxpayers should make that £4 billion contribution not in the guise of the ordinary creditor who could expect to be repaid—not only the capital sum but some return on the loan—but as public dividend capital. Because of that, the taxpayer finds himself in a similar position to that of the equity holder. That is the closest analogy that I can draw. It is on that basis that the Government have treated public dividend capital when they have tried to subsume the corporation within the ordinary private sector company.

Under clause 2, about half the sum that taxpayers have paid—we are simply assuming a sum of £4 billion and I hope that the Minister can confirm its general accuracy—is simply to be written off to cover the accumulated losses that have been chalked up. As the guidance notes make clear, that is essential, if the corporation is to be privatised, to meet the Companies Acts requirement that a company cannot be floated if the assets do not match or exceed its capital and undistributable reserve. That may be a good argument from the Government's viewpoint. It would be impossible to privatise the corporation if the write-off did not take place. But that is not of much comfort to taxpayers, half of whose money is written off, and it begs the question whether privatisation is a necessary and desirable step.

The Minister will then say, "Don't get too agitated about this because this is a perfectly normal transaction. It is purely an accounting procedure which a private company can do and it is specifically provided for in section 135 of the Companies Acts." But there are various safeguards for a private sector company operating under section 135. This must be provided for in the articles of association, and there must be a special resolution, and authorisation by the courts. The reason for all those safeguards is that the write-off, at least potentially, prejudices the interests of several people, not least the potential creditors of the company.

Other than introducing this legislation and refusing to go into any detail of by way of explanation, have the Government taken any steps which would be equivalent to the formal and substantial steps which a private sector company would have to take to satisfy a court that this was a proper procedure? What consultations have been held, for example, with potential creditors? Because taxpayers are not technically in the position of creditors, they have the misfortune of not being regarded as creditors. They could well have been so regarded. They find that £2 billion of investment loan has simply disappeared. We want the Minister to answer those questions.

The next step in the proceedings outlined in the Bill is that the remaining public dividend capital, having been reduced by about half, is extinguished. Any liability to the Secretary of State is extinguished. Under clause 3, part of it is converted into securities, which are then offered for sale. Under clause 7, the balance passes to a statutory reserve. The guidance notes are again helpful on the meaning of the procedure. They point out that the statutory reserve provided for by clause 7 is meant to act as a substitute for what, in the case of a private sector company, would be a share premium account. As there is unlikely to be any share premium, the statutory reserve is provided to fulfil that role.

The difficulty for the Government is that the Companies Acts treat the share premium account in a special way—as being available only for certain purposes. That is right, and one understands why that should be so. The money in the share premium account is limited to particular purposes, such as the writing off of unrealised losses. Will the Minister estimate to what extent the money which will pass to the statutory reserve will be devoted to that purpose? Will he also estimate what proportion of the extinguished public dividend capital will end up in the statutory reserve? It is difficult to debate the issues without indications from Ministers as to what figures should be put to the various categories into which the public dividend capital will fall.

Let us go back to the equivalent of the share premium account. If the ordinary company rules were to apply to the share premium account, and if in essence it were regarded as undistributable, this would not meet the Government's book. As we know, the Government are anxious to present the books and the balance sheet of the corporation, and therefore of the successor company, in the most favourable light so as to emphasise the potential profitability of the successor company.

If the money were to be tied up in a statutory reserve and were not distributable, it would dampen the ardour, one assumes, of those who might want to get their hands on it. Therefore, it is provided by clause 7(2)(b)—this is the provision which the Minister has to defend—that the Secretary of State may direct that some part of the statutory reserves "may be applied as if it were profits available for distribution".

I am by no means an expert but, as far as I am aware, the Secretary of State is thereby taking a power which is not available in similar circumstances in a private sector company. Therefore, the argument that this is merely a technical adjustment or an accounting procedure which is exactly equivalent to that of a private sector company falls down at this point.

I do not believe the Government claim that this is normal procedure. They claim that it represents the past profitability of the corporation and argue that if it had been a private company, it could have passed those profits to a reserve which would have been distributable. This merely makes our case that the Government are intent on drawing a line at the point at which the corporation became profitable and that their real purpose is to ensure that the losses are the responsibility of the public sector owner but the profits, as soon as they arise, will be money on which future private owners can get their hands. That is the essence of what the Government propose.

Under clause 7(3), the power of the Secretary of State to make the direction is limited to the period in which the ownership of the successor company remains in the hands of the Crown. It is clear that the provision would not be in the Bill if the Secretary of State did not intend to make such a direction. I want the Minister to confirm that any direction that is thereby made will have consequences for the successor company. The disposition of capital into securities on the one hand and into the statutory reserve on the other, and the direction as to what part of the statutory reserve will be distributed, will be decided before the successor company is floated. Will the Minister confirm that that position will be inherited by the new private owners of the successor company, and that any sums which are declared to be distributable by a direction of the Secretary of State will remain distributable in the hands of the private owners?

If that is so, notwithstanding all the technical arguments, we have a magical process by which a substantial sum of taxpayers' money, totalling over £4 billion, which stands as a debt owed by the corporation to the taxpayer, is converted, at least in part, into profits available to private owners. That is a remarkable procedure whereby debt owed to one group of people is transformed by the stroke of a pen into profits available to another group. It must be a wonderful feeling for people to have the law operating so benevolently and for them to be able to say that there is nothing unusual about it and that it just happens to enable them to get their hands on hundreds of millions of profit. Will the Minister confirm that that is the general effect of what is proposed in the Bill?

5.15 pm

There is a further objection to what is proposed. Not only does it do the taxpayer down and provide, in a sense, false profitability as a bait to private owners, but it is a reversion to the bad old days of private ownership in the steel industry when dividends were paid not out of trading profits but out of capital, and time after time the private owners bled the industry dry, ate the seed corn and paid dividends out of money which was desperately needed for reinvestment.

The Government are laying down the guidelines whereby that process is to be renewed even before private ownership takes effect. Once again we see private ownership in the steel industry being encouraged to take its profits and dividends out of money that has been accumulated as capital and ought to be used for investment. We understand why the Government have been compelled to do this. The unseemly haste with which they tabled the legislation, for reasons which have yet to be properly explained, means that the Government have had to bring the industry to the market without a proper track record of profits. That is why they have had to make the peculiar arrangement whereby there is a built-in substitute for profitability. That substitute is the ability to lay hands on capital which was provided in the past by the taxpayer.

That is unsatisfactory and an unfortunate indicator of the future of the industry under private ownership. Ministers can confirm that the industry requires substantial investment for the foreseeable future if it is to maintain its competitiveness. The best estimate of the required investment is about £300 million per annum. That investment will be required year in, year out, in good times and in bad, in an industry which is essentially cyclical, for all the reasons which we debated at length in Committee.

If the Government are already not only permitting but encouraging private owners to pay themselves dividends out of capital, we can have little confidence that there is any long-term intention on the part of Government or of the new private owners to make the essential investment. Not only is the financial and capital restructuring a fraud on the taxpayer and a hidden gift to the new private owners, but we fear that it points the way to an uncertain future for the industry. That is why we have tabled amendments to clauses 2 and 7, which are designed at least in part to try to curb the excesses that the Government intend to permit.

Our amendments will introduce a greater rigour in the degree to which capital can be written down. As provided by clause 2(1), there is less discretion for the amount by which the public dividend capital can be reduced. We have provided by our amendments Nos. 24 and 3 limits which will at least impose some discipline on the extent to which that writing down will take place. In the case of amendment No. 24, they are limits which will, at least in part, enable the Government, even within the context of privatisation—which we oppose—to meet the requirements of the Companies Acts.

We have a second group of amendments which will retain for the taxpayer some interest in the future profits of the steel industry, if any profits are made, and some possibility of being repaid for the very substantial investment that the taxpayer has made. That is the purpose of amendments Nos. 25 and 26.

The next group of amendments ensures that the capital which passes to the statutory reserve is retained, not to pay dividends from day one to private owners who have not done anything to earn them, but for investment in essential plant and equipment, which are important to the industry's future. That is the purpose of amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 28.

I hope that the Minister will take these amendments seriously and will answer my questions in detail. Further, I hope that he will satisfy us that our fears about the irresponsibility of the Government in these matters are misplaced. I doubt that he can do that, but we shall listen with interest to what he has to say.

In conclusion, our objections are to that essential "short-termism" which characterises all that the Government do for our industrial future. First, it is the Government who take a short-term view. They are so concerned to get shot of an industry at the best possible price that they are prepared to jeopardise its future by the way in which they restructure its capital. By giving this open invitation to the new private owners to rip off what remains of the taxpayer-provided capital, the Government are selling the industry in circumstances which are the least favourable to its proper and secure future.

Secondly, there is the "short-termism" that we have seen before from the private owners in the steel industry and elsewhere. That is the "short-termism" which is now made possible, and indeed encouraged, by the Bill, and will encourage private owners to pay themselves dividends before they consider the investment that is needed to secure employment and output in the interests of the national economy. That is why we regard these amendments as important and the provisions of this bad Bill as unsatisfactory.

Mr. Cryer: I want to speak especially to amendments Nos. 28 and 6. Amendment No. 6 provides for the statutory reserve to be used exclusively for the purposes of investment in new plant and training. Amendment No. 28 says that money may be applied.

"to investment in plant or capacity or to sustain plants threatened with closure."

Those two items are essential, beccause we are talking about privatising an industry which since 1979 has lost 134,000 jobs. Privatisation will be carried out by this Government on the backs of 134,000 people who are walking the streets, having mainly been sacrificed on the altar of the Government's economic policy of selling off our assets at knockdown prices. Those assets have been provided by the taxpayer for unlimited distribution in the way that my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) described.

I want to draw attention to the problems of the steel industry and the way in which these two amendments will provide for training and the sustenance of plants threatened with closure. They are important because of the steel industry's failure to provide training payments. As the Minister may know, I am also a member of the Common Market assembly. Some people call it a parliament, but I never give it much credit. I prefer to use the more accurate description of consultative assembly. In that capacity, I have come across a number of cases where former members of the steel industry are being retrained through a less than adequate scheme. These two amendments will ensure that, however the steel industry develops, it will make provisions for retraining within its own revenue sources rather than relying on external ones. There is a retraining scheme that is designed to train redundant steel workers for new jobs elsewhere.

The Department of Trade and Industry likes to pretend that it is the sole arbiter of the iron and steel employee redundancy benefit scheme, which is called ISERBS for short. However, the truth is that it is not. The decision whether money shall be applied from the Common Market for retraining is not a decision of the Ministers, of the House, or of civil servants. It is a decision for a Commissioner. The Commissioner in this instance is Commissioner Marin.

Nine ex-employees of Eaton and Booth in Sheffield have been waiting for a decision from the commissioner for 12 months. I wrote to the commissioner and begged him to give a decision which was confidently anticipated by the Department of Trade and Industry. I received a reply from the commissioner on 28 March stating:

"The demand for readaptation aid under Art. 56 as a result of accelerated restructuring in both the coal and steel industries of the European Community had by the end of 1987 outstripped the available budget. Since the Council refused to make more funds available and bearing in mind the prospect of even lower budgetary resources in the future the Commission has been obliged to carry out a realignment of its strategy with respect to its readaptation commitments.

The complex process of realignment is being carried out as rapidly as possible and I will shortly be informing the UK government of the allocations to be made in respect of their outstanding readaptation requests."

The people who were the subject of those readaptation requests have been on retraining courses on the promise of readaptation payments being made. At the time of that letter they had been waiting for 10 months. They have now been on the course for over 12 months with the promise of finance. However, that finance is being held up by the commission.

The Minister, who is a Member for one of the Ribble Valley constituencies—he has moved about a bit since he was elected for Preston, so I cannot pinpoint him precisely.

Mr. Atkins: South Ribble.

Mr. Cryer: The Minister said to me in a letter of 11 May:

"I regret that the position has not changed since my letter of 30 April. My officials are still continuing to press the Commission for early decisions on the application for aid being held, but to date no progress has been made. As soon as the Commission do approve the applications for aid ISERB Scheme payments will be authorised."

He concludes with the assurance that the people mentioned in his letter will be paid first. So they should be.

Those amendments would help to deal with the position where civil servants and elected representatives have been entreating the Commission to make the payments, and where Ministers also, as I understand it, have been making representations to the Commission to make those payments, yet no payments have been made. That has gone on month after month. It enrages me because these people have been made redundant from the steel industry, and in good faith have attended courses, yet month after month their home economies are devastated. They have to borrow money to sustain their existence. Meanwhile, some overpaid bureaucrat in Brussels is withholding his decision and keeping these ordinary people in suspense and penury. That is not good enough.

I hope that the Minister can accept the amendments in the belief that it is necessary for the future that the Government have some insulation against the machinations of the Commission. I believe that that Commissioner is using those workers as pawns in the negotiations over the budget. That is a rotten and foul thing to do, but that is the conclusion that one reaches because of the implications of the Commissioner's letter to me.

5.30 pm

If the Minister cannot accept the amendments, I hope that he will say that, if the Commission will not pay, or continues to procrastinate as it has done for over 12 months, his Department will make the funds available to take those workers and their families—the innocent victims—out of the financial doldrums that they are in due to the machinations of that wastrel in the Common Market—Commissioner Marin. If the Minister has any sense, he will consider the amendments carefully because the industry needs better protection than it has obtained so far—both when in the private sector before nationalisation and under the protection that the Common Market is alleged to give it.

Time after time, Commissioners and, indeed, Ministers in this House, cosily claim that the Commission's ISERBS payments protect steel workers when there is readaptation and rationalisation. Those words hide the grim reality of managers making decisions which put people on the dole. It is not adequate simply to rely on the Commission to provide support, because its words mean nothing. The cases that I have mentioned apply not only to Sheffield, but to Rotherham and south Wales. Alpha Steels is a case in point.

The Minister should consider the amendments seriously so that in the future the Government have some right of independent action. The Minister is sitting at the Dispatch Box absolutely powerless. He is a pawn in the hands of the Commission. I regret that, because I would far rather be able to press the Minister for a decision, but at the moment he is powerless to give one. The amendments go some way towards redressing that terrible imbalance that the steel workers face.

Mr. Barry Jones: Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), I rise to speak in support of amendment No. 6. I have recently had the honour of giving fifth-year high school leavers their record of achievement. That is an enlarged report on the last years of their school life. In meeting those excellent and hopeful young men and women, I have been struck by the large number who have opted to join the armed services. In conversation, it has become clear that they are enlisting because they will then have the most thorough apprenticeship grounding. There is no doubt that there is a shortage of apprenticeships locally on Deeside, throughout Wales and, I suspect throughout the United Kingdom. That is partly the reason why those young men and women are seeking to join the armed forces on leaving school.

As the House knows, since 1979 the industrial training boards have, by and large, been swept away and apprenticeships have declined as unemployment has risen. That cannot be good for Britain's prospects for the 21st century. We should invest more and more in training and apprenticeships. The investment reserve that we propose in our amendments could help Britain's economic future.

Clause 7 is the financial heart of the Bill. It is the mechanism whereby the public dividend capital is done away with. In arguing for a British Steel investment reserve, we are urging the Government to recognise that steel is a strategic industry, which is vital for Britain's economic and military future. It is Britain's foundation industry. Without it, we have no reliable manufacturing base and an impaired defence capability.

I want to speak briefly to amendment No. 6 regarding the need to spend more money from our proposed investment reserve on improved and enlarged training. The background is that in the 1980s Britain has lost nearly 2 million manufacturing jobs. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South has said, steel has suffered greatly. We lost as an industry in the great jobs shake-out of the 1980s. At BSC Shotton in my constituency, we lost 8,000 jobs in just three months. We lost our steel-making capability.

The attention given to training and to providing apprenticeships declined, not unnaturally, during what was an industrial emergency. Before the major cuts in steel jobs and the large closure programme, virtually every British steelworks ran large, successful apprentice schools. That was certainly the case in my constituency. The standards of those apprentice schools were high and the places were much sought after. Any young man or young woman in receipt of such an apprenticeship knew that the world was his or her oyster if the course was completed. I want us to attempt to return to that position in at least some degree.

When parents visit my surgeries to seek help in placing their teenage children in work, they always mention apprenticeships. The apprentices' schools in our steelworks at Shotton had a high reputation and there was heavy demand for its many places. Today there is huge competition for apprenticeship places at a steelworks such as Shotton or the nearby Aerospace factory. Hundreds apply for the dozens or for fewer than dozens of places and many young people are disappointed. That is a blow to the morale of young school leavers and to their families.

I fear that, when a sustained upsurge in demand occurs in manufacturing generally, and in steel in particular—I hope that that upsurge is ahead—we shall be short of the required skills. Amendment No. 6 will help Britain's future. I do not want the steel industry to be caught short. I should like the British Steel investment reserve to be set up and its funds directed to training in particular.

In today's world economic climate—in a climate of collapse and speculation and black Mondays—an enlarged and skilled work force in steel will be a priceless asset. The BSC's management and labour have recently been spectacularly successful in productivity and manning. They should now have the reassurance of knowing that they can carry enlarged apprenticeship schools at individual plants. Each steel plant and its surrounding travel-to-work area could then have at its disposal a reservoir of recently trained potential labour. That is what I should like to see in my own area of Deeside.

Quick profits and enlarged dividends can be the enemy of thorough high-class training. That is one of the dangers inherent in these privatisation proposals. Training is not only for school leavers. It can be for the existing work force also.

I should like the Secretary of State for Wales to set up an economic planning council in Wales, which would enable trade unions, employers and Government agencies to work together to establish a strategy for economic recovery. At the top of the agenda for such a council, I should like education and training to be writ large. Perhaps the British Steel investment reserve could play an important part in such a steel industry and in that industry's training opportunities. That is why I support this batch of amendments.

Dr. Reid: I take as my starting point the comment made by the Under-Secretary of State during the debate on the previous group of amendments. It seems that he is suffering from the misapprehension that Opposition Members always regard profit as a dirty word, even when it is applied to the steel industry. Profit, profitability and productivity are not dirty words to us. It is as well to make that clear at the outset.

Opposition Members are pleased that Britain has a healthy, profitable and productive steel industry. We draw strength from and take pride in the fact that in the first two months of 1988 Scotland produced 46,700 tonnes of usable steel, compared with only 32,700 tonnes in the first two months of 1987. We are pleased that the weekly national output in February was in excess of 388,000 tonnes, the highest that has been achieved by the industry in many years. We are pleased that that is not far short, when projected, of the 21·5 million tonnes for which we have argued for Britain. The average weekly output for February would amount to 19·75 million tonnes for the year.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): In a leap year?

Dr. Reid: It would be slightly more in a leap year.

We are pleased that profits and productivity have risen in the British Steel Corporation, and we take this opportunity to express that pleasure and pay tribute to the management and workers who have made the achievement possible.

That leads me to the amendments. All the signs confirm that the taxpayers' sacrifice over many years has been worth while. The signs confirm that the faith of the taxpayers in the industry has been well and truly vindicated. As that faith has been shown and as those sacrifices have been made over so many years, and now that we have a profitable industry, surely this should be the time to repay the taxpayers and to reward their sacrifices.

What do we find instead of repayment and reward for the British people? We find contained in the Bill what my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) has described as a magic formula. My hon. Friend is a man of extensive vocabulary but moderate language. This afternoon he has pushed to the fullest extent both his vocabulary and his moderation in referring to the financial clauses as a magic formula.

In Motherwell we have a simpler word that is picked from a less extensive vocabulary. That word is swindle. The reality is that the sell-off of the corporation is the greatest con trick ever played on the British taxpayer. To paraphrase a cliché, never, even under this Government, have so many been swindled out of so much by so few with such little talent.

Ministers, who have crowed constantly of value for money for taxpayers, have been prepared to write off millions of pounds of taxpayers' money to float the corporation. The Government, who boast constantly of creating a share-owning democracy, have resolved to write down the taxpayers' public dividend capital to less than half its value to sell off the corporation to City institutions. Having written off the losses, the Government, who proclaim their aim to be a policy of fair taxation, will allow the already written-off losses to be offset against future profits in a tax bonanza for the new City shareholders of our steel industry.

5.45 pm

The privatisation of British Steel in its present form is a political scandal and a financial swindle. That is why the Opposition have tabled the amendments. The primary purpose of the amendments is the protection of those whom all of us in this House are supposed primarily to represent—the taxpayers. Secondly, they are aimed at the long-term protection of the steel industry, albeit in private hands.

The amendments tackle the financial heart of the Bill, which contains a mechanism whereby the public dividend capital, as outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham and others—it has financed the corporation since the mid-1970s—is to be extinguished and replaced by a share issue which, together with the new statutory reserve, will have the equivalent value. The mechanism will allow the new company to pay out of the reserve. To be technically correct, the statutory reserve will act as the platform and the justification for the payment of dividends to shareholders in future.

The amendments seek in various ways to preserve the new company's capital and to divert the reserves for use as investment and to finance training and the refurbishment of old plants that will become necessary if recapitalisation and reinvestment is to be commensurate with the demands of a continuing and thriving steel industry.

The amendments seek to protect taxpayers by transferring to the new company some consideration of the financial support that they have provided for many years to the corporation. It is amazing how little interest exists in the Bill for taxpayers, especially when we think of the huge debt that British Steel owes them. We have become familiar since Second Reading and our debates in Committee with the Government's tendency to deny access to the flow of financial information to Committee members and to the public generally. This has been justified under the cloak of commercial confidentiality. For whatever reason, the flow of information on financial matters has, to say the least, been stemmed by the Government. The same can be said of the financial implications for the taxpayer and the write-off of debt.

We have been forced to look slightly further than the Government for academic support for our arguments. One of the best studies—it was referred to in Committee and it appears to have been ignored by the Government—is that which was undertaken by Bell, Findley and Oughton of the department of political economy of Glasgow university. The report states that British Steel's existing debt takes two forms. The first form is public dividend capital, which has been defined as the aggregate of sums paid, or treated as paid, to the corporation under section 18 of the Iron and Steel Act 1982. This debt amounts to £3,980 million. The second form is the corporation's accumulated losses, which amounted by 1987—the last financial year—to £1,023 million.

The Government maintain that the capital restructuring under this Bill involves no writing off of debt. Once again, the old magic formula plucked from the extensive vocabulary of my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham could be applied to the Government's position. The Government insist that there is no writing-off of debt, which may be true according to the letter of the law but which is certainly not true according to the spirit of any possible definition of the writing-off of debt.

We understand why the Government must be economic with the financial truth in these circumstances. We understand why they cannot admit to the House or to institutions outside it—perhaps on the other side of the Channel—that no debt has been written off. However, in economic terms and in the spirit of any reasonable definition of what constitutes the writing off of debt, large resources have been invested in British Steel throughout the 1970s and during the lifetime of the Government, and those resources are not to be returned to those who invested them in the first place.

This leads me to the point that the Minister made about profits. I said during discussion of the previous group of amendments that, unskilled as I am in economic theory, my simple understanding of profit was always that profits were the return to investors on the capital they had invested. We are now left with a generation of profits that will clearly not be returned to the people who made the investment in the first place—the great British public.

To disguise this sleight of hand, the Government argue that no debt will be written off under the Bill. But we contend, as we did on Second Reading and in Committee, that the massive subsidy given to the British Steel Corporation by taxpayers in recent years will not be repaid. Furthermore, we maintain that that subsidy may be written off by the Government's sleight of hand. They may pretend that it has disappeared through a hole in the floor of the stock exchange or of the House, but any ordinary non-skilled non-economist taxpayer will ask why, when profits have been generated after millions were invested, he is receiving no return from the now profitable corporation.

It would help those of my hon. Friends who are as unskilled as I and who cannot countenance discussing these matters with the Minister's advisers if we considered the economic base of the British Steel Corporation as consisting of four shares, each valued at £1 billion. The Bill gives the Government the right to transfer those shares into ordinary equities which can then be traded in the same way as those of any publicly quoted company. The difficulty would arise when the equities were sold and the Government were forced under the Companies Act to set the nominal value of the shares at the sale issue price of the time of flotation.

Let us suppose that the shares were valued by the market, as we have been led to believe they will be, at about £2 billion, which represents a price-earnings ratio of eight, which we believe would be necessary to attract investment from prospective shareholders who were unfamiliar with the industry. There would be a clear discrepancy between the value of the public dividend capital and the sale value of the company.

That would mean that the market value of the taxpayers' investment was expressed at half its worth. That is how the subsidy to the British Steel Corporation will come about—not through the technical writing-off of debt but through the halving of the capital asset paid back to the taxpayers.

This is not a bagatelle or mere financial trifle. We are dealing, if future projections are correct, with about £2 billion of taxpayers' money, which will be written off by this mechanism. It will not be a publicly declared writing-off; it will be a halving of the share capital invested in the company.

One further complication adds salt to the taxpayers' financial wounds. As has been said, the difference between the value of the public dividend capital and the sale value, which we expect to be about half of the public dividend capital, is to be put into what is called a statutory reserve. Subsequently, that statutory reserve could be used either to write off unrealised losses or to be distributed as profits, with the permission of the Treasury, to pay up unissued shares of the company. Not only is the public dividend of the company halved, therefore, but once halved, the half that mysteriously disappears is then used as the justification to pay out profits in future, not to the taxpayer who has invested and already lost, but to the new shareholders who have already purchased and reaped the benefits of the write-down in the dividend capital.

If someone with even the most extensive vocabulary could find a phrase other than "financial scandal" to describe this, I should be grateful to hear it. The company will be compensated; the taxpayer will not. That is the first reason why we tabled the amendments. The accumulated losses of the company have been met by the taxpayer but they still exist on the corporation's balance sheet. They are to be treated as a one-off reduction in the capital base of the company or as an equivalent reduction in the public dividend capital.

It is argued that the amount of capital shown on the balance sheet will more truly reflect the net assets of the company. Let us suppose that the value of that company is £2 billion and that the public dividend capital is reduced to £3 billion after the accumulated losses are deducted. That would leave £1 billion to be entered into the statutory reserve, which could be used subsequently to generate liquidity for the company or to justify the pay-out of profits.

This outline shows the need for the amendments. Such a scheme, in any other circumstances, would be regarded as nothing less than a rip-off of the taxpayer. Is it fair? Would it be fair under any circumstances? Would it be fair in this context? Would it be fair in the context of a political world that increasingly demands attention for the small investor? Why should we raise a hue and cry when some City slicker gets involved in a massive fraud, but refuse to raise one because the slicker happens to sit around the Cabinet table?

We have spent some time considering how this rip-off —let us give Cabinet Ministers the benefit of the doubt and say it is an unconscious rip-off—of the taxpayer will take place. Now it is worth reminding ourselves of the extent of the burden that the taxpayer has borne under this Government since 1979. It is evident from all the figures available in the published material that until relatively recently the taxpayer has gone without dividends. The corporation has not paid one since 1975. The taxpayer has borne the heavy losses since the Conservatives came to office in 1979. Even allowing for the £400 million profit, about which we are all pleased and constantly told in the new advertisements that have appeared on television, which feature a shareholder working out in the morning and gloating over the prospect of increasing his BSC shares in the afternoon, there has been a loss to the taxpayer of almost £4.5 billion since 1979-80.

The Prime Minister constantly speaks about taxpayers, and the Chancellor directs his attention to them—yet on this occasion they are to be cast aside, willingly and knowingly, because that suits the Government's purpose of channelling money from BSC into City investors. Those who bore the brunt of the subsidy to the BSC during the downturn in the market and the brunt of rationalisation in the steel industry are to receive nothing.

We have always supported investment in the British steel industry on the precondition that, if taxpayers pay for investment, capitalisation and rationalisation, bear the brunt of redundancy payments and support losses during the lean years, when the fat years arrive they will receive some of the fat. That is the least that any reasonable Government should do. The Bill ensures that taxpayers will be cast aside just as the fat years are beginning to arrive.

The Government cannot abandon their responsibility. They must maintain a degree of fairness. They used to argue that taxpayers wanted rid of the responsibility of the steel industry, but it is noticeable that that argument is no longer employed. The argument apparently applies only when the taxpayers suffer a loss. Ministers claim until they are blue in the face that when the British steel industry was making a loss taxpayers wanted to lose the British Steel Corporation and get rid of the need to subsidise it. Nowadays no one believes a Minister who says that the British taxpayer wants rid of a healthy, profitable steel industry and does not want in any circumstances to receive some repayment for his investment.

Taxpayers deserve something better in return for their commitment and investment. The British Steel Corporation would have gone bankrupt twice, once in the mid-70s and once in 1979-80, if it had not been for taxpayers' support at a time when the demand for steel in a notoriously cyclical industry fell by about 50 per cent. For years, taxpayers have subsidised the industry and will receive no return on their investment. Common sense, public interest, decency and fairness demand that they do. The purpose of the amendments is to rectify the Bill and they should be supported by any hon. Member who shares that feeling of common sense, public interest and fairness to the taxpayer.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): My hon. Friends have spoken about the massive giveaway in this privatisation. Such giveaways took place in previous privatisations and will take place in the biggest jumbo of them all—the privatisation of the electricity supply industry. It is a scandal of such outrageous proportions that it will go down in history as financial swindling by the Government of the British people and will for ever blight the name of the Conservative party.

The country's assets are being sold at knockdown prices and that will obviously create problems for future Governments. People have been given wealth—assets for which they have not paid the proper price. They have acquired taxable capacity and the only possible course for future Governments is to tax those people and take that wealth away from them. The Government are ensuring higher future levels of taxation, not only under Labour Governments but under Conservative Governments. Income tax will be higher and there will certainly be a wealth tax, because to create a reasonable balance, future Governments—even a Conservative Government—will have to make good the swindling that has taken place under this Government.

Another problem involves the viability of the financial structure that the Government are creating in the Bill for the British Steel Corporation. The treatment of past losses and the window dressing that has been carried out in recent years and which will continue to be carried out to prepare for privatisation have been well covered by my hon. Friends. How will the corporation survive with the financial structure that it is to be given?

One would normally look at current cost accounts in order to assess prospects. Page 43 of the BSC accounts contains the notes to the current cost accounts and, contrary to normal accounting practice, the assets are valued at historic cost. That means that, if plant built a long time ago cost £1 million at that time, it would cost £2 million or £3 million to build today because we have to allow for inflation. Assets are valued at current cost to make sure that the value of the business is being preserved and that future depreciation is directly provided for.

The figure of £1,928 million used for tangible fixed assets and recorded in the historic cost accounts is the same as that in the current accounts. Had the assets been revalued in accordance with proper accounting practice the figure would have been £3,294 million—higher by £1,366 million. Additional depreciation of £132 million a year should be charged on that in the current cost accounts. That means that, effectively, the current cost profits are being overstated by £132 million.

That was picked up by the auditors and used to qualify the accounts. On page 23, the auditors say that in their opinion the historic cost accounts give a true and fair view of the state of affairs of the corporation, and that the accounts have been prepared to comply with the requirements of the Iron and Steel Act 1982 and the directions of the Secretary of State. On pages 42 and 43, the auditors, speaking about the current cost accounts that give the present picture, merely record that the accounts have been properly prepared in accordance with the policies and methods described in the notes thereto. The accounts do not purport to be true and fair or to have been prepared by any accounting standards other than those described in the notes.

To justify that, the corporation says that its utilisation continues to be significantly below the installed capacity. That means that it has left out of the current cost valuation of its fixed assets items such as the big blast furnace at Llanwern, the unused BOS vessel capacity at Port Talbot and so on. Effectively, the BSC has been stashing away plant for future use, and that plant has not been fully reported in the accounts. That may be a smart thing to do and it may kid the investors when they read about the levels of recorded profits and apply the appropriate ratios. But the chickens will come home to roost in the long term when it becomes evident that the corporation has not been investing and will not in future invest adequately to maintain the value of its business.

The consequence of that will not be immediately evident. For some years, the continuation of such policies will enable the corporation to report artificially high profits. That will only store up trouble for the future when the corporation begins to be seen to have failed to invest at the levels required to maintain the value of the business, the security of employment of the steel workers and an adequate supply of steel for British industry. It is not a very smart move by the corporation or Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry and it will be added to the other squalid moves by which the Government have applied their industrial and economic policies.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): We have had an interesting debate. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who is not in his place but no doubt may return, approached these issues in a more realistic, balanced and comprehending way than did some of his colleagues. I agree that clauses 2, 3 and 7 go to the heart of the Bill. I do not accept his suggestion that the Government are drawing a line from the time of profitability and that profits made thereafter will be made available to the new owners. That is not what we are about. We are preparing BSC for privatisation and are doing so against the background of a dramatic improvement in its results, leading to its move into profitability, without which privatisation would not have been easy to contemplate.

I welcome the recognition from the hon. Member for Dagenham, if not from some of his hon. Friends, that what we are proposing does not include any writing off of debt or any measure of subsidy. I welcome the hon. Member back to his place. He will be glad to know that I have been agreeing with some of the things he has said.

The debate has covered ground that will be familiar to members of the Standing Committee. The issues raised were discussed at great length in Committee on a number of occasions, but it might be helpful if I start by outlining briefly the operation of those parts of the Bill to which the amendments relate. I shall try to deal with most of the points that have been raised.

Clause 1 provides that all the property rights and liabilities of the corporation will be vested in a successor company. The successor company will inherit all the corporation's undertakings, both assets and liabilities. After vesting has taken place, on a day appointed by order by the Secretary of State—that is, "appointed day"—British Steel will be a plc that is wholly owned by the Government. The successor company will require a capital structure compatible with the requirements of the Companies Act 1985, and clauses 2, 3 and 7 provide for that capital structure.

The hon. Member for Dagenham identified as the starting point for our structural provisions the public dividend capital, and asked me to confirm the figure. As he will know, it is in BSC's accounts, and is shown as £3·98 billion at the end of the year 1986-87. He implied that the development of public dividend capital was a recent phenomenon, but it has its antecedents in the 1978 White Paper of the Labour Government.

The hon. Gentleman asked a question that he had already asked in Committee. I know that he had difficulties in Committee because he tended to ask a question and then leave the room because he was busy not so much in restructuring the steel industry as in restructuring his party's nationalisation policy—or rather, renaming it. At one time it was known as social ownership, which I characterised as being an upwardly mobile form of nationalisation or yuppie nationalisation, but I understand that that, too, has been dropped and the hon. Gentleman has had to go back to the drawing board.

The hon. Gentleman asked me a hypothetical question about the extent to which BSC might have paid dividends or interest on its capital in the past. Althought it is possible to make theoretical calculations, it is not helpful to do so, and it does not enhance the discussion about the successor company structure. The BSC did not pay dividends because it had no retained earnings with which to do so. It did not pay interest on its capital because it was not interest-bearing.

It is self-evident that, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, if interest or dividends had been paid, BSC's losses would have been correspondingly greater. One might speculate on what might have flowed from that; the return to profitability that we are seeing might have been that much more dramatic. The Labour Government recognised that had BSC been interest and dividend-bearing, its losses would have been correspondingly greater, and they did so in 1969, when they allowed BSC to convert £700 million into equity; and again in 1978, with the change from the national loans fund to the Exchequer capital funding and section 18 capital. We do not achieve very much by jobbing backwards in this way.

Mr. Gould: If the Minister is unwilling to give the House such information, does he at least foresee that he may be required to meet an obligation to potential private investors? Presumably, he, or someone on his behalf, will have to make some statement on the subject in the prospectus when it is eventually published.

Mr. Lang: Potential investors will be presented with a prospectus and with all the appropriate and necessary details, but I do not see it as part of the compilation of a prospectus to answer questions relating to events that did not occur and speculating what might have happened if they had occurred.

Under clause 2(1), BSC's captial will be reduced, by an amount directed by the Secretary of State, to extinguish an amount of accumulated realised losses. The purpose of the capital reduction is to eliminate the deficit on its profit and loss account. The deficit is not a debt. I cannot stress that strongly enough. The corporation does not owe this money to anyone—it is simply a record of past trading losses. It reflects the erosion of the original capital base of the company through those trading losses. It is open to any Companies Act company to go to court and apply for a reduction of its capital to eliminate its accumulated losses. The BSC is unable to do this because of its status as a corporation. Therefore, we propose to proceed through the Bill. It is not going to the court as a private company, but we are enabling it to happen through the High Court of Parliament.

The amount of the capital shown in the balance sheet, will, following the capital reduction, better reflect the value of the net assets. It will not change the value—there is no subsidy involved. Under clause 2(3), the capital remaining after the reduction will be extinguished and replaced by shares or other securities issued to the Secretary of State or the Treasury under clause 3. No loss of taxpayers' money is involved in this process. The Secretary of State remains the sole owner of British Steel, which will be worth the same as a plc as it was a corporation.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) raised an issue that he and I have already debated in Committee. He suggested that the reduction in capital would create benefits for the company, but not for the taxpayer. Even on the basis on which he puts that case, he seems to forget that the taxpayer owns the company. If he were right about the value accruing from the reduction in capital, it would accrue to the taxpayer at the time of the sale. As I have explained to him, the value of the company is unaffected by the restructuring exercise because the reduction is on both sides of the balance sheet. The reduction in public dividend capital is matched by an equal reduction in accumulated losses, so the net value is unchanged.

Dr. Reid: I know that I have raised this point before, but does not the Minister recognise that it is not as easy as saying that this is just like a restructuring which can be carried out under the Companies Act? The difference is that, when a restructuring is carried out under the Companies Act, those who owned the company before the restructuring are almost always those who own it after the restructuring. Therefore, they gain any benefit. In this case, the people who own the company before the restructuring—the taxpayers—will not be those who own the company after the restructuring. It will be owned by the private investors. Therefore, the people who gain the benefits of the restructuring are different from the people who subsidised the losses before restructuring.

Mr. Lang: No, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. The taxpayer owns the BSC and the taxpayer will own the public limited company that will be created by the restructuring. It is at the time of flotation that investors will place a value on the company and they will bid for it. The value that they place on it will take account of the condition of the company's balance sheet.

The statutory reserve that is provided for under clause 7 will be the balancing item between the total nominal value of the shares and other securities issued to the Secretary of State or the Treasury, and the amount of the public capital extinguished. It is common practice in these circumstances for the sale price of shares to be greater than their nominal value, and the reserve partly reflects that difference, but it is essentially required to ensure that the balance sheet balances.

Private sector companies generally have a mixture of share and loan capital and reserves. The process of restructuring the balance sheet of the corporation is complementary to the vesting provisions of the Bill. Instead of a nationalised corporation funded by public dividend capital, the successor company will be a Companies Act company with capital and reserves, like other Companies Act companies.

Amendments Nos. 3 and 24 seek to limit the capital reduction under clause 2 to a particular amount. That would not be acceptable to the Government, because, as I have explained, a limited company may, by a special resolution of its shareholders confirmed by the court, reduce its capital in any way, including a reduction to eliminate its trading losses. The provisions of clause 2(1) are equivalent to that procedure, which is not open to the BSC because it is not a limited company.

The reduction will result in the writing off of an equal amount of accumulated realised losses from the balance sheet so that the capital more accurately represents the net assets. I must stress that there is no magic formula or mystery in that arrangement. It corresponds fully with the Companies Act 1985 and is purely a balance sheet transaction. It is required to ensure that the successor company can be registered as a plc and be able to pay dividends.

We have not yet decided the capital structure of the successor company, and it would be premature to seek to take such decisions until the issues can be fully considered in the light of the BSC's audited accounts for the present year. The principle and purpose of the capital reduction are, however, clear and will be carried out entirely within the scope of existing company law.

Amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 28 are concerned with the statutory reserve created under clause 7. I am sorry to say that amendments Nos. 6 and 28 are based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of the statutory reserve that I explained. It was debated fully in Committee, and I hope that I have clarified it in this debate. A normal private sector company's balance sheet contains a mix of capital and reserves.

Clause 7 provides for the creation of a reserve, called the statutory reserve. It will be equal to the difference between the nominal value of the securities issued to the Secretary of State under clause 3, and the amount of public dividend capital extinguished under clause 2. The nominal value of the securities issued under clause 3 will necessarily be less than the amount of capital extinguished—that is, the amount of capital after its reduction under clause 2(1). That is because a company cannot issue shares at a discount and, therefore, in order to have the ability to raise new capital at any future time, the market price of its shares needs to exceed their nominal value.

The statutory reserve is similar to a share premium account, in that it may be applied in issuing fully paid bonus shares to its members. It may also be applied, however, to the extent that the Secretary of State directs, in writing off unrealised losses arising from a revaluation of the successor company's fixed assets, and as a distributable reserve. As I said in Committee, it has not yet been decided whether any revaluation will be undertaken, but if it is, it is not expected that there will be any material change to the basis on which British Steel's fixed assets are recorded.

I was asked about the proportion and the amount of a revaluation. It is unlikely that the revaluation would have any material effect on BSC's total asset values. Any revaluation will have to be conducted by professional valuers and assess the value of all the company's fixed assets to conform with section 275 of the Companies Act 1985 if it is to lead to an unrealised loss that subsequently can be written off against the statutory reserve.

Dr. Bray: There is a note in the accounts to which I referred, saying

"As their utilisation" of assets

"continues to be significantly below installed capacity, the Corporation considers that it would be premature to anticipate that more than this value will be so recovered."

In view of the very big increase in capacity utilisation during the past year, is the Minister saying that that will not be taken into account in the annual report this year?

Mr. Lang: It has not yet been decided whether there will be a revaluation, but if there were to be a revaluation, it would not materially change the figures that are recorded in the balance sheet.

Dr. Bray: In that case, is the Minister saying that he does not expect the huge increase in capacity utilisation that has taken place in the past year, which has brought extra capacity into use and has not been included in the accounts, to be taken into account? Is he saying that the accounts will not take account of that? If so, he is saying that the books have been rigged.

Mr. Lang: I am not saying that; nor am I suggesting that the books have been rigged. I take this opportunity to correct the hon. Gentleman, who seemed to imply, if I understood him correctly—I shall read his words tomorrow—that the auditors have qualified the accounts of the BSC. That is not the case. The note that he read out was a clear and unqualified assessment of the company's account on an historic cost basis. In addition, a separate supplementary note within the accounts gave an historic cost basis.

It is normal for private sector companies to have both distributable—revenue—and undistributable—capital—reserves. Any revenue reserve authorised under clause 7 will reflect the profits that the corporation has earned in recent years, with the result that the successor company's balance sheet is a more accurate depiction of the present position of the business. I should stress that the creation of reserves has no effect on the cash position of the company; the company receives no money from the Government. It is simply a matter of bringing the historical financial record, as shown in the balance sheet, up to date.

Amendment No. 7 would delete subsections (2) to (4) of clause 7. These subsections define the uses to which the statutory reserve may be put, and which I have just described. It is normal practice for the functions of a statutory reserve to be defined by statute, so the subsections are necessary.

The provision that the Secretary of State may direct, under subsection 2(b), that a specified amount of the reserve may be treated as if it were profits available for distribution is not the same as giving cash to British Steel. Most companies have a revenue reserve, which is a book-keeping record of accumulated realised profits. British Steel is now profitable and would have been able to credit its profit to a revenue reserve had it been able to apply to the court before now—as a private sector company certainly would have done—to reduce its capital, thereby eliminating its accumulated realised losses.

The BSC has not been able to do that because of its status as a public corporation. Its recent profits have therefore been set off against its accumulated realised losses. The Bill provides that the Secretary of State may direct that a part of the statutory reserve may be applied as if it were profits available for distribution. The successor company may thus be provided with a revenue reserve which reflects the company's recent profitability and therefore its true trading position. This is not a cash transaction; no money is being given to the company and no subsidy is involved.

Amendments Nos. 6 and 28, to which the hon. Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) referred, provide for the statutory reserve to be used for investing in new capacity and training or to prevent plant closures. As I have said, the amendments are based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of the statutory reserve. It is simply an accounting entry. It is not a pool of cash or a treasure trove that can be used in the ways that the hon. Gentlemen suggested. The successor company will have to generate profits to invest in new plant and equipment, as I am sure it will, and as the BSC does now. The investment policy of the privatised company must, in any case, be a matter for the company and not for the Government.

Mr. Cryer: I was making the point that there are now problems through the non-payment of ISERBS payments by the Commission, and that it would be desirable for any new venture to be insulated against that. Will the Minister turn his mind to that and assure the House that he and his ministerial colleagues—one of them has had correspondence with me—will continue to press the Commission and bear in mind the desirability of that contingency being avoided in future?

Mr. Lang: Although the hon. Gentleman's comments did not relate directly to the purpose of the statutory reserve, I intended to say that I have noted what he said about the need for help from the Commission for training and retraining purposes. One need only think back to earlier steel closures in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) to reflect on what can be achieved and what has been achieved. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Industry is taking a close interest in this matter and will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said.

On amendments Nos. 25 and 26, it is clearly incorrect for Opposition Members to state that the public money paid to the BSC should be regarded as some form of debt to the taxpayer. The provisions in the Bill lead to no loss of taxpayers' money. The amendments are thus based on a complete misinterpretation of the position. It is wrong to assume that the BSC can somehow be valued solely in relation to the capital shown in its balance sheet. That is a book-keeping figure. A company's worth is a matter not of balance sheet arithmetic, but rather of its performance and prospects. I suggest that privatisation will provide a better return to the taxpayer than many years of dividend payments.

The amendments are also unworkable. The hon. Member for Dagenham accused the Government of being too concerned with dividends and not enough with investments, but the amendments would land the successor company with such a potentially crippling dividend burden that it would be unable to invest adequately in new plant and equipment for its future.

What we have in mind in the proposals in the Bill is not, to use the phrase of the hon. Member for Dagenham, short-termism. The restructuring is not, as the hon. Member said, a fraud on the taxpayer; still less is it, as the hon. Member for Motherwell, North suggested, a swindle. It is a proposal to put the corporation on all fours with a Companies Act company. It reflects the recent trading position of the British Steel Corporation. It enables it to have a fair chance of a successful future, which I believe is in the best interests of the taxpayer and the industry. I urge the House to reject the amendments.

6.30 pm

Mr. Gould: When I moved the amendment, I posed a number of questions to the Minister about the capital restructuring provided for in the Bill. I asked him how much, in his estimation, had been saved by the non-payment of any dividend or interest on public dividend capital. He declined to answer that. I then asked how much of the public dividend capital would be written down. I asked what safeguards would be provided in the absence of the proceeding, on which he places great reliance, that would have been followed in the case of a private sector company where application to the court would be necessary. I asked him how much of the extinguished public dividend capital would be passed to the statutory reserve. I asked how much of that sum would be directed under clause 7(2)(b) to be deemed to be distributable. I asked whether that direction would apply to the successor company.

We did not receive an answer to any of those questions, except, by implication, to the last, and there it was made clear—it is clear in the Bill—that any direction that the Secretary of State makes under that provision—it is intended to make such a direction—will inure to the benefit of the new private owners.

In the light of the absence of answers and of the suspicions that we have about the purpose and effect of the capital restructuring, we are satisfied that what is proposed is not fair to the taxpayer and does not point the successor company in the appropriate direction. In other words, it encourages emphasis to be placed on the payment of dividends as a priority over and above the need for investment. We believe that that is the wrong direction for the British steel industry to take. For those reasons, we are extremely disappointed that the Government have not moved in the direction of the amendments and we intend to vote in support of them.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 3

Initial Government holding in the successor company

6.45 pm

Mr. Maxton: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 3, line 13, at end insert—

'(4A) One third of all Securities issued under this section shall be designated "employee shares" and held in trust for employees in the form of an Employee Share Ownership Plan with power to appoint directors'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this we may take amendment No. 11, in page 3, line 13, at end insert—

'(4B) One tenth of all securities issued under this section shall be designated "pension shares" and shall be made available to former employees of the British Steel Corporation.'

Mr. Maxton: The two amendments together deal with employee share ownership. It is nice to see the Secretary of State for Scotland here for this important debate, although if he is to be present, I hope that he will listen and not talk. He has not shown a great deal of interest in the Scottish steel industry so far—[Interruption.] He obviously does not intend to stay; I wonder whether he is going to Hampden.

In an earlier debate, we raised the question of the involvement of the work force in the new company. The amendment represents a different way of ensuring such involvement, and the Under-Secretary of State for Industry, who replied to the debate, suggested himself that share ownership was the best way of involving the work force.

I hope that we shall be able to debate a second matter. We shall, of course, be debating the amendment, but I hope that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will give us some leeway and allow us some debate on the written answer yesterday in which the Government laid down their proposals for share ownership by employees. The House should know what the Government have in mind, and perhaps they will answer some questions——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that we can deal only with the amendments on the Order Paper. We cannot deal with answers to questions unless they relate directly to these amendments.

Mr. Maxton: I am sure that they do, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Government's proposals deal with employee share ownership, which is what this debate is about.

The Government's proposals and ours are very different. We propose that one third of the shares should be designated as employee shares and held in trust for the employees in the form of an employee share ownership plan with the right to appoint directors to the board. That seems to us to be the best way of ensuring that the employees have a stake in the company, without the risks of direct personal ownership. They would have the right to make decisions and have a say in the future of the company in which they have already invested their labour, time and effort, without the possibility of losing their hard-earned money by investing directly in shares.

I should have thought that that would allow exactly the sort of developments about which the Under-Secretary talked. That certainly cannot be called "tokenism"—the word used by Conservative Members to describe our plans for appointing two directors to the board. It cannot be called a "retreat"—the term used earlier by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon)—from our plans to involve workers directly in industry.

Incidentally, it is surprising—for once, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster may agree—that in both the earlier debate on union representation on the board and again now, when debating share ownership, representatives of the Social and Liberal Democratic party, which has always been an exponent of worker participation and share ownership, have not bothered to be present and to participate in the debate.

We propose an innovative, imaginative and exciting way of ensuring the workers' involvement, even though that is not something the Government would like to see. We assume that those who will run the employees' share ownership plan will come, at least in part, from the trade union movement and will be nominated by employees through their trade unions. That would be the best way of involving the work force in share ownership and in directorships.

It is worth comparing the Government's scheme with our own. In a written answer, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster explained exactly what will happen:

"(i) employees will each be offered £70 worth of free shares plus a further £2 of shares for every year of service with the corporation. An employee with 15 years' service could therefore be eligible to receive, free of charge, £100 worth of shares;".

One of the interesting points arising from the previous debate was that the Minister of State, Scottish Office said that the Government had no idea what would be the capital valuation of the new company. However, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster stated in his written answer:

"All these arrangements will be subject to an overall limit of 10 per cent. of the shares on offer in the flotation."

There are 52,000 employees in British Steel. If one takes the minimum £70 giveaway, its value will total about £3·5 million. If that sum represents 10 per cent. of the shares on offer, the minimum flotation value will be £35 million. I hope that the Chancellor intends that the figure should be higher than that. [Interruption.] He is prepared to concede £35 million, but the overall picture adds more to that. It appears to give some idea that, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman did his sums in terms of employee share ownership, he had some idea of what the final flotation structure and value would be. How could he arrive at his 10 per cent. limit otherwise?

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's written answer continued:

"(ii) employees will also be offered 2 free shares for each one bought at the full share price on a matching basis, up to a maximum value in free shares of £330. An employee buying £165 worth of shares would thus receive shares worth in total £495;

(iii) employees will be able to buy shares, up to a maximum value of £2,200, at a discount of 10 per cent. on the full share price;

(iv) employees and BSC pensioners applying for shares at the full share price, will be treated on a priority basis over the general public, up to a limit of £10,000 worth of shares"—presumably at the full share price—"per individual."—[Official Report, 17 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 383.]

I do not believe that many employees at Ravenscraig will take up more than their £70-worth of free shares plus £2 of shares for each year of service.

The Government will have considerable difficulty in floating the British Steel Corporation, anyway. It will not be attractive to many investors in the market place and there is no reason why employees should risk their money by investing in it. The advantage of our scheme is that it would not put employees' money at risk. They would enjoy a shareholding through the plan, but their personal savings would not be at risk.

[Mr. Maxton]

I know some members of the senior management of Ravenscraig, and I do not imagine that any of them have £10,000, or the maximum of £12,200, to spare for an investment that is as risky as the British Steel Corporation, unless it is for a short-term return—buying shares at the time of the flotation in the hope that there will be an upward movement in their price, with a view to making a quick profit by selling them shortly thereafter. It is not likely that large numbers of employees will invest in the company in the way that the Minister suggests.

How many employees does the Minister expect will take up the various categories of share ownership? When he did his sums, he must have had some idea of the number of employees taking up even the £70 worth of free shares. Does the Minister expect them all to do so or only a certain percentage? How many employees does he expect will buy shares and then claim their entitlement to a further £2-worth of shares? How many employees does he expect will buy shares to the maximum value of £12,200 or £10,000?

When the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster prepared his written answer, he must have had some idea of the numbers involved. Otherwise how did he arrive at those figures? What was the premise of his information?

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Astrology.

Mr. Maxton: I thought that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doone Valley (Mr. Foulkes), and not my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Robertson), who was into astrology. However, judging by some of the answers we have received, astrology appears to have been the way by which the Government arrived at them. Perhaps this is another example of it.

Having made all those calculations and arrived at an overall limit of 10 per cent. of the shares on offer, the Minister must have worked out what he considers should be the corporation's flotation value. If not, what will happen if, at the end of the year when he wishes to float the company, there is a slump in the share market? The share value may not be that which he anticipated but there may be the level of take-up which he expected from the employees. What will he do then? Will he downgrade the value of their shares? I am not sure whether the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster nodded or whether it was only an involuntary movement of his head, but he appeared to nod, so it appears that, again, the offer he has made to the employees is not worth the paper it is written on. If there is a downward evaluation, the figures that he has produced will not materialise.

I am sure that the House is more interested to hear what the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has to say about his scheme than in listening to me talking about our own, which we know the Minister will not accept.

7 pm

Mr. Fallon: Some pretty curious amendments have been tabled by the Opposition, but amendment No. 9 is the most extraordinary so far. It is probably symptomatic of the Opposition's confusion about the whole concept of share ownership. For some years now they have been telling us that there is no demand for share ownership, either in the wider population or among those who work for nationalised companies that have been privatised. That is what the Labour party has been telling us, and some of its members are still doing so. That is what the trade union leaders have been telling us.

Mr. Maxton: As the hon. Gentleman accuses us of saying that there is no interest in share ownership, perhaps he would like to say who said it and when.

Mr. Fallon: I do not think that I need to detail exactly who said it. [Interruption.] Every time that my hon. Friends have come to the House and proposed a piece of privatisation legislation, it has been the Opposition's view that the privatisation should not proceed and, in particular, that shares in the previously nationalised industries should not be offered. Yet what happens? We have found time and again—with British Telecom, and with British Gas—that employees respond in overwhelming numbers.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): My hon. Friend is absolutely right. To illustrate the point that he has made about previous privatisation measures that have been brought before the House, the Opposition have reminded anyone who is thinking of becoming a shareholder that the shares would be confiscated, perhaps for very little value in return. Perhaps my hon. Friend would like to press the Opposition on what they will do to these shareholdings.

Mr. Fallon: My hon. Friend must not tempt me too far along that line. Suffice it to say that thousands of individual shareholders in every constituency in the country now hold popular shares in formerly nationalised companies that have been privatised. That is probably why there are slightly more representatives on the Tory side of the House than there are on the Opposition side.

The Opposition cannot have it both ways. They cannot say that there is no demand for share ownership, and then say that, if there is, the employees should have a third of the shares. That is nonsense. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I can hear only one hon. Member at a time.

Mr. Fallon: This suggests to me that some Opposition Members have learnt from the success of our privatisation programme, having seen the huge take-up by British Telecom and British Gas employees of the shares made available to them. They have had to cobble together this policy so that they can go back and say to those who work for British Steel, "We would have allocated you even more shares than the Government are proposing."

We are bound to ask where that leaves the Opposition's share ownership policy. Will they revise the arrangements for British Telecom and British Gas to ensure that the work forces in those industries now have a third of the shares, as those in British Steel would have if the amendment were accepted? Will they revise the arrangements that the House has already put through, take shares from the public—indeed, from other trade unionists—and cobble them together in this extraordinary share ownership portfolio?

The second reason I believe that Conservative Members should reject the amendment wholeheartedly is that the shares are not being offered to those who work for British Steel; they are being placed inside a trust. The employees will have no rights. They may in name have some claim to a third of the share capital, but they will not have the right to buy more shares, to sell any of them, to hold them or to dispose of them as they wish. It is a very patronising approach to share ownership to say that the employees should have a third of the shares but that they should not be able to do anything with them—that the ownership and management of the shareholding should be confined to trustees.

Who will those trustees be? We heard that the trade union barons would be the trustees of the scheme. That is not real share ownership. It is treating shareholders like children with pocket money—saying that they can have a third of the shares, but cannot do anything with them, and cannot have any rights. These will not be free shares in any real sense. In fact, they will be fake shares.

Mr. Maxton: I wonder how the hon. Gentleman differentiates between that sort of share and unit trusts or investment accounts in banks? In those instances, people put in their money and then own shares as a result of investment made by the bank. But they have no direct say. The employees of British Steel will have considerably more say.

Mr. Fallon: A unit trust is not controlled by the trade union leaders involved in the industry. It is perfectly possible for any individual to acquire more units in the trust or to dispose of them, as the case may be. The individual has some rights. But under amendment No. 9 the British Steel employee would have no rights whatever.

This is a bogus amendment. It cannot be confused with any real extension of wider share ownership; nor can it be called "exciting", which was how the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) described it. He said that the whole point of the share ownership proposal that he was advocating was to take out the risk so that not only would the shares not go down, but they would not go up. Those who work for British Steel would have no opportunity to benefit from their investment and their commitment to this new dynamic private company. They would have no real interest.

In relation to an earlier amendment, the hon. Gentleman specifically spoke about employee interests. The employees would have no interest in these paper shares. They would not be able to benefit from increased productivity or the better performance of the company as a whole, nor would they be able to sell their shares, or acquire more, if they wanted to do so.

This is a bogus share ownership proposal, and as such it should be treated with the contempt that it deserves.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) displays the Tory party's attitude to share ownership, and demonstrates the original idea of what share ownership was all about. The original idea was to invest capital in a firm to help that firm to prosper, and to take a return from the profits in the form of dividends. But what is happening now, in Mrs. Thatcher's Britain——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Morley: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker.

What is happening now is that shares are being used as some kind of casino economy. The City is becoming an up-market bookie: people are making money on the actual transaction of shares without having the slightest interest in the investment in the company or in the company itself. The amendment gives a direct interest to those who have earned their rights to share ownership by the efforts that they have put into the company over the years, and the help that they have given it.

We also feel that 10 per cent. should go to the pensioners who have worked all their lives in the industry. It is a shame that those who deal in shares are held in higher esteem than, for instance, steel workers who have spent all their working lives in often appalling conditions and back-breaking work. They do not seem to receive the same esteem as people who sit in an office, press a button and transfer huge sums in shares in companies in which they have no interest and of which they have no knowledge. The amendment gives the people who have earned that stake some direct control of the company—a say in it, and a share and involvement in it. I am surprised that the Government should argue against that if they genuinely believe in any kind of shareholding democracy.

We talk about the desire of people to buy shares, and the so-called success of the Government's policy in selling them. If people are offered a deal whereby they give £5 and are given back £10, of course they will jump at the chance. But the number of small shareholders in British Telecom and British Gas is not increasing; it is decreasing rapidly, as people take their profits and get out.

Although many small investors had their fingers burnt in the October crash, it is worth remembering that the large institutions will still make money whether the stock market is booming or declining. Many of the small punters who were encouraged by the Government into the shareholding market have lost a great deal of money as a result. I do not see the Government shedding many tears about that. That is why it is right that the shares should be given to the steel workers. They have earned those shares through their labour, productivity and commitment to the industry.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute my sixpen'orth to the debate because the amendments concern some important issues about which there are strong feelings among the steel workers as to who should own what share of the industry.

I listened aghast to the ignorance displayed by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) about share ownership after privatisation. He appears to believe that the Government's privatisation programme completely excludes employee share ownership plans. He should be made aware that such plans have played a significant role over the past few years in privatisation involving parts of the bus and motor car industry.

The two largest employee share ownership schemes in Britain have both followed privatisation. The first is operated by the Portsmouth bus company, which, I understand, has about 4,000 employees and was privatised through a management and worker buy-out with the workers' part of that buy-out being operated through a employee share ownership scheme. The second scheme is operated by Llanelli Radiators, which employs about 1,500 workers and was privatised as part of the sell-off of the fringe parts of the British Leyland and, later, Austin Rover empire. Those workers found themselves faced with the choice of closure or having to assist in funding a buy-out and chose to opt for an employee share ownership scheme.

That was an extremely large company in manufacturing terms, certainly in Wales, and was privatised with no more than one quarter of the employees taking part. Nevertheless, it is still a new concept that has not been immediately embraced by everyone. An employee share ownership plan, such as we are proposing here, was adopted and helped to save 1,500 jobs, which are like gold in the Llanelli area as they are elsewhere in south Wales.

If the hon. Member for Darlington wants to exclude employee share ownership plans from privatisations, he has a considerable amount of retrospective work to do as a result of the Government's policy over the past four years. If he wants to defend the exclusion of the steel industry from such a scheme, he must explain why it is acceptable for the motor car components manufacturing industry and the bus industry to have such a scheme. Some extremely substantial privatisations have taken place in those industries with the assistance of employee buy-outs through employee share ownership plans.

Our proposals are no different, although they are on a larger scale. Although it is true to say that scale can sometimes be a killer argument, as it is not always easy to scale up to a firm with 52,000 employees, the position with British Steel does not differ greatly from that of the National Freight Consortium management and worker buy-out. The employees were very much in the driving seat in that company, with about two thirds of the shares owned by one third of the employees. That firm is halfway between the Portsmouth bus company or Llanelli Radiators and the British Steel Corporation and has well over 20,000 employees, of whom one third participate in share ownership. That buy-out took place through a scheme similar to an employee share ownership plan.

The Government must explain their reasons for rejecting the amendment, if they decide to do so, in spite of our best efforts to persuade them to support us. Why cannot such a scheme be set up in the steel industry when similar schemes have been set up in industries that are almost as large?

7.15 pm

Mr. Fallon: The hon. Gentleman referred to the example of the National Freight Consortium. The key difference between that share ownership scheme and the proposal that we are discussing is that the employees of the National Freight Consortium were free to buy as many shares as they wanted. As I understand the wording of amendment No. 9, the employees of British Steel will not have the freedom to buy as many or as few shares as they wish.

Mr. Morgan: The hon. Gentleman introduces the philosophical and dogmatic flavour that characterises his contributions to our debates. He is in favour of a proposal, if someone is economically free to implement it, but, if there is an element of planning, he is against it, regardless of whether it helps to achieve wider share ownership and greater employee involvement.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we accept that the Government have gone too far down the road towards the flotation of the successor company to involve the employees in majority share ownership in National Freight style. When the company had a low value, about a third of the employees would have come into the scheme and seen the value of their shares appreciate twentyfold, as has happened in the five-year period since the National Freight Consortium was bought out by management and workers. That is not possible as the BSC is now a profitable company. The NFC was a highly unprofitable company when the arrangement was made and the shares bought by workers were therefore extremely cheap. Only they and the management had the faith, with a small number of venture capitalists backing them, to buy in cheap and watch the company appreciate. As the BSC has now returned to profit, that option is no longer available and an employee share ownership plan is more logical.

It is a minor objection to claim that the Government could reject the proposal because it involves only one third of the shares or because it is compulsory to specify a figure of one third. If the Government wish to incorporate a flexible element in the scheme, we would be willing to discuss it with them. We want to ensure that, as far as possible, the firm's employees, including senior and middle management was well as shop-floor employees, should be in the driving seat.

One of the primary reasons why the employees of the BSC and of Allied Steel and Wire are extremely interested in acquiring shares in the industry is the fear of being ripped off by speculators. They see employee share ownership as one way of warding off control by speculators and the financial community. They want to ensure that they have the maximum amount of elbow in the industry after privatisation to ensure that the industry is not taken over by speculators, companies which are primarily interested in shrinkage and sell-off of spare assets or foreign companies interested in further rationalisation.

Some of those fears may be dealt with by the Government's announcement regarding a golden share. Following the experience with Britoil, the Government must accept that many employees of industries that were protected by golden shares do not have the same confidence in the golden share as a method of warding off takeovers as they did before the curious handling of the BP-Britoil takeover saga, in which the golden share was finally negotiated away by the Treasury.

Obviously, there will be the attractions of a dividend. It is difficult for Opposition Members to recommend the prospect of capital growth, because it is greatly influenced by currency patterns. Within the past month the senior management of the next largest steel company to the BSC, United Engineering Steels, warned that the rising pound was already hitting its profits and performance. One imagines that, if the flotation were not in the offing, the management of BSC and Allied Steel and Wire would have said exactly the same. The steel industry by its nature is highly sensitive to the changing relationship between the pound, the deutschmark and the dollar.

Those are all reasons why an employee share ownership plan is of great importance and why its structure is convenient to the industry, suspended as it is in a state of profitability, but with that profitability likely to be severely affected by currency changes, which are already upon us, and possibly by the changes which could occur on 30 June if quotas are not renewed and if dumping steel in the back gardens of other steel producers in Europe sets in as a way of removing surplus capacity, since that does not seem to be possible by negotiation.

Employee share ownership plans have the great advantage that they achieve a greater measure of control. I hope that the hon. Member for Darlington agrees that a curious feature of share ownership is that, despite the massive number of share owners in British Telecom, for example—I understand that the employees own no more than 1 per cent.—they have no control over the company. They have the ability to buy or sell, but that is not a measure of control, nor is it what we are seeking for BSC employees. We are seeking a measure of control and I implore the hon. Gentleman to understand that that is what BSC employees are looking for. We intend to help them to achieve that.

The Government have offered conventional share ownership on slightly preferential terms in this absolutely repellent form of tokenism, which might result in as many as 3 or 4 per cent. of the shares landing up in the hands of employees. That is three times what BT employees have, but it is still nowhere near what we are trying to achieve. That does not achieve control. If British Steel has 52,000 employees, of whom 10,000 buy shares because they can afford to, and if they are backed up by a certain number of steel industry pensioners—the BSC is one of those curious industries which we now have in Britain in which there are twice as many pensioners as workers—how do they get together to exert any influence over the broad strategy that management is pursuing? They cannot.

An employee share ownership plan with the shareholders' power being exercised through proxy votes vested in trustees, who could be from trade unions—obviously those chosen to exercise proxy votes could be changed—means that a considerable amount of power is hands of employee or pensioner shareholders. That is the advantage.

Shareholders in British industry simply act as sleeping shareholders and in the end their only power is to sell shares and move on. That is not an option which employees would ever want. They invest their careers in the industry and their families depend on it. There is no way that they can share that in-out attitude towards the industry in which they work. They want to exercise some sort of control and influence over the management, and they can do that only through and ESOP-type structure.

That is how they will get together. Some will live in Scunthorpe and some on Teesside. The steel industry operates in the outer circle of the United Kingdom—in Wales, Scotland, the north-east and the east midlands. It is not all grouped together in one convenient region, so it is difficult for 10,000 shareholder employees to influence management's strategic decisions or to change the management if they think that its policy has deteriorated severely. Under the amendment, that can be done through proxy voting through the structure of an ESOP. That is why we commend it strongly as the best available option for maximising, not just share ownership but property control.

How does the provision of an ESOP relate to the golden share aspects that the Government announced in their proposals for preferential access to share purchase and to the temporary five-year anti-takeover provision? A company with an anti-takeover clause is attractive to its employees. They would be worried about buying shares in a company which might be taken over. Therefore, an employee share option plan goes along with an anti-takeover provision.

The Government have offered us temporarily a golden share of the classic kind. We are asking them also to consider the advantages of an ESOP proposal, such as we have here, which can incorporate not just the golden share for a temporary period, but a poison pill mechanism against the devices which in recent years the shadier end of the finance capital industry has developed in both Wall street and the City of London. A poison pill defends, not so much against takeover as against the dawn raids which are of doubful virtue, but which have not yet been made illegal.

Under the poison pill mechanism, additional shares will immediately be created if a dawn raid is carried out. If a dawn raid or concert party results in 15 per cent. of shares landing up in one pair of hands, it would be possible instantaneously, by articles of association and the relationship between the ESOP and the overall share of the company, to create an additional number of shares equal to that which landed up in the hands of the predator.

I understand that the alternative to the poison pill defence against dawn raids is called the Pac-Man alternative. In that, additional voting rights can be conferred on the shares in the proposed ESOP. In the event of any owner acting on his own or through a concert party and landing up with 15 per cent. or more of the shares, instantly additional voting rights are temporarily conferred until the takeover bid is warded off. They last simply while the crisis lasts. That is made much easier by the ESOP proposal. I hope that the Government will realise how much more attractive employee share ownership is to the employees of an industry such as British Steel if it can incorporate one of those two variants.

In that way, when the Government's golden share proposal expires, the ESOP can be used to achieve anti-takeover protection or semi-legal anti-takeover protection, against the dawn raid or concert party which we have seen so much of engendered by the wilder fringes of the financial community. That is simply not the kind of world in which potential employee share owners want to become involved. The ESOP proposal can be used constructively to maximise, not just employee share ownership, but long-term employee share ownership and an appropriate degree of control, so that if employees finish up with one third of the shares, they can wield one third of the power in the corporation. That is how it should be.

It is no good simply saying, "If you wish to dispose of your shares you should be free to do so." That is not what employee share ownership is about. It is an expression of the fact that employees have given their life's blood to the industry and wish to remain committed to it so long as they are employed there.

7.30 pm

Yesterday we made an unsuccessful attempt to encourage employee share ownership in Allied Steel and Wire. We asked that an employee trust fund, similar to an employee share ownership proposal, should be set up. According to my information, the Minister, no doubt inadvertently, misled the House. I am sure that he would like to take this opportunity to correct what he said yesterday in reference to my speech:

> "I am attracted by the idea that the employees of Allied Steel and Wire Ltd. should have a stake in the company. Once again, the hon. Gentleman's chosen method, contained in amendment No. 32 . . . is generous but it goes over the top somewhat. Most of the employees already have a stake in the company".—[Official Report, 17 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 834.]

My information, from the trade union representing the employees, is that they do not have a stake in the company. What they took out last October was a £1 option which could be converted into shares when the flotation was announced. That option cost them a nominal amount. The workers may or may not exercise the option.

I offer amendments Nos. 9 and 11 to the House in the same spirit as I proposed the amendment yesterday. I am sure the Minister will take the opportunity later to correct the misinformation he gave the House yesterday, according to what I have heard from Cardiff, where Allied Steel and Wire has its headquarters. We are keen to encourage employee share ownership which does not exist yet in Allied Steel and Wire, although the Minister said yesterday that it did. We believe that employees require further encouragement towards share ownership. Amendment Nos. 9 and 11 would achieve that.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I accept that the hon. Gentleman may be more up to date and more closely informed about Allied Steel and Wire than I was yesterday. I will check what he has said. The workers' shareholding in the company may take the form of options to be exercised in the flotation. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing that out to the House.

The amendments ought not to lead to too great a divide between us. It appears that we start roughly at the same place. We are now all in favour of the employees of companies that are being privatised having shares in those companies. Certainly the Government have never had any doubts about the desirability of encouraging employee share ownership in major companies. We have demonstrated that over and over again, because employee share ownership schemes have been a standard feature of almost every privatisation that the Government have carried out, although the exact terms have varied from case to case.

We are also clear about why we put forward these offers to employees. We think that it is important that people should be rewarded for the contribution that they have made, in the case of British Steel by turning the corporation around from being a chronic loss maker to a profitable company that is ready for the market place again.

It is right that, as far as possible, people's rewards in industry should be linked to the performance of the industry. Therefore, we are impressed when people take a stake in the industry and are prepared to look forward to gaining personally out of whatever improvement in performance they can contribute to. Obviously, it tends to reduce the divisions in industry if employees feel that they have a direct financial stake in the company for which they work.

Over the last seven or eight years of our economic revival, we have seen a change of opinion. Most people realise that their interest as employees is identical with the interest of the company for which they work and that anything that underlines that is to be welcomed. For that reason, we have always made it clear that we proposed to make special arrangements for employees of the British Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries to take shares in the flotation that we are planning.

Yesterday, in response to a parliamentary question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page), I gave details of what we propose. Employees will each be offered £70-worth of free shares, plus a further £2 of shares for every year of service with the corporation. That means that an employee with 15 years' service could be eligible to receive free of charge £100-worth of shares. Employees will also be offered two free shares for each one that they buy at the full share price on a matching basis, up to a maximum value in free shares of £330. So an employee buying £165 worth of shares would receive shares worth in total £495.

Employees will also be able to buy shares up to a maximum value of £2,200 at a discount of 10 per cent. of the full share price. Finally, employees and British Steel Corporation pensioners applying for shares at the full share price will be treated on a priority basis over the general public up to a limit of £10,000-worth of shares per individual. That is one of the most generous arrangements that we have proposed in a privatisation flotation. I hope that many employees will take advantage of it.

So far, so good. While I am grateful to receive the support of the Opposition for the principle of share ownership, I find, as my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said, that they still have not sorted out exactly what form of share ownership they favour. The bland assertion of the Labour party that it has always been in favour of workers' shares is an assertion which I greet with the same incredulity as my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington.

I think I remember correctly—but I have not checked it—that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) went to the last Labour party conference in a spirit of revisionism to lead the party back from the abyss into which it had fallen in June. He made a speech in which he was unwise enough to point out to fellow members of his party that he had found that many workers in industry were attracted by the idea of workers' shares. He was repulsed; he was rebuffed.

It is all very well for Labour spokesmen to say how much they favour employee shares, but the attendance of Opposition Members is not much better than the attendance on the Government side for the debate. If some of the hon. Member for Dagenham's hon. Friends from below the Gangway were to hear these ringing remarks about the desirability of encouraging workers to take shares, I think that the hon. Gentleman would be in trouble again. I think he would find that his party has a long way to be led on the issue.

Mr. Maxton: If my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) was repulsed, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman suggests, how was it that the constituency section of the Labour party elected my hon. Friend to the national executive of the Labour party so overwhelmingly?

Mr. Clarke: I note that the constituency section also elected the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to the national executive. It seems that he does not intend to give us the benefit of his views on workers' shares this evening, but I suspect that they are dramatically different.

Given that I am addressing the revisionists in the Labour party, having heard their amendment and the case which they put for it, I fear that they have not yet got the point of workers' shares. I have explained why we favour employee shares; we want to give employees a share of the reward that arises from the improved performance of the company and to lessen the divisions within industry.

The Opposition have suddenly thought that workers' shares give the opportunity of worker control; at least, that is what I thought they were in favour of. The hon.

Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) said that they would not give the workers influence over the company, but that the trade unions would act as the workers' trustees and would ensure that the workers' interests were looked after by the route of worker share ownership. That explains the generosity of their amendment.

So enthusiastic are the Opposition about workers' shares that when we come forward with our reasonable proposals they outbid us; they try to steal our clothing. They say that we should give a third of the entire equity to the workers. That is curious coming from hon. Members who have complained about that hard deal which the taxpayer is getting. Now they say that the taxpayer should see a third of the equity given to the workers. However, it would not actually be given to the workers because they would not be allowed to sell their shares. They would not be allowed to behave as shareholders because the shares would be held in trust by the trade union, which would make sure on their behalf that suitable influence was exercised over the management of the company to put the new democracy in place.

Mr. Gould: I find that passage of the Minister's speech encouraging. After a long journey of incomprehension, he has at last grasped the point. Even he has been able to put in his own words, not quite accurately but just about right, the essential distinction which I and my hon. Friends have always maintained between the tokenism which he is offering to individual share owners and the rather doubtful investment which he is encouraging British Steel employees to make. There is a difference between that proposition and the idea, which has a long Socialist history, that worker share ownership held collectively is a means by which workers can exercise some control over their own destiny as workers in that enterprise. I am delighted that at long last the Minister has grasped that point.

Mr. Clarke: I think that I have always grasped the point. We are both defining carefully the distinction that still lies between us. The Government favour wider share ownership among the general public and employees. We see it as a way of distributing wealth and rewarding performance in industry. We believe in a property-owning democracy and that employees who have shares should be entitled to get the same benefit and have the same influence over them as any other investor and use them as they wish.

The Labour party, having discovered that it has been defeated in the general public argument of privatisation, employee shares and wider share ownership, has decided to return to all the old nostrums of worker control. I thought that workers' control was a very Left-wing part of the Labour party, but it seems to be winning new recruits tonight. The Labour party is not interested in every man being a capitalist and employees entering the property-owning democracy. If the Labour party cannot have state-owned nationalised industries, it is interested in having trade union-dominated industries by "giving" a third of the equity to the work force so that the trade unions can exercise control over it.

It may be that it is not in the amendment and this is not the occasion to go into further detail but, if that is the Labour party's intention, I am not completely against the idea of ESOPs and workers' co-operatives even, if they operate in the market economy and on a sensible basis. I do not think that using them as a cloak for trade unionism control or as an anti-takeover device is one of their attractions. I am familiar with ESOPs. Russell Long was the chap who started ESOPs in the United States. I have corresponded with and met Russell Long. We have looked at the possibilities of extending ESOPs in this country.

I agree with the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) that the Portsmouth bus company is a good example of an experiment with an ESOP. As a Minister, I was involved in the privatisation of the National Freight Corporation, which was a successful example of employees taking shares. As my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington said, that privatisation led to an extremely successful company being formed. I might say that it was formed in the teeth of the opposition of the Labour party which, I recall, fought it night after night in Committee, because it did not want the employees to have shares. It wanted the company to be nationalised and loss-making and to stay as it was. Nevertheless, there is not need for us to have a deep divide over all these areas—increased worker involvement in industry, workers' ownership of shares and so on.

There is a fundamental difference between us. We believe that our proposal is an attractive offer to the employees of British Steel to participate as shareholders in the future success of the company. What is being offered by the Opposition is an apparently generous offer of trade union control.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Minister is obviously enjoying himself, but he should realise that we are entitled to ask the Government to be consistent. Some of the shares that have accrued to workers in past privatisations have been given without voting rights. That does not tally with the suggestion that the Government are being generous to the steelworkers. When British Gas was privatised, the value of the free shares given to the employees was less than the cost incurred by the Government in promoting its privatisation in the United States of America. We are perhaps seeing inconsistency in the Government's approach tonight.

Mr. Clarke: The precise offers that we have made have varied from case to case. I am not sure, but I think the proposal that we announced yesterday for employees of British Steel is the most generous offer of shares that we have made so far. It is certainly one of the most generous and there is no question of non-voting shares or anything of that kind.

We have made offers to the workers in every privatisation that the Opposition have fought. These offers have become increasingly popular with the employees. That is why Labour Members no longer get up during these discussions and flatly attack the idea of employees owning shares. Instead, they come up with alternatives of their own which are not quite the gift-wrapped presents that they seem to be.

A third of the equity to be given to the workers is not an option which I or my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington find acceptable. The Government have met the underlying desire—apparently of both sides of the House—to give the employees a stake in this company. I ask the House to accept our proposals and to reject the amendments.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): I had no intention of intervening, but as the Minister is not prepared to give way, I must put this important point quickly. As far as I know, the Chancellor of the Duchy has no objection to institutional ownership of shares. I do not think that he will say that he objects to pension funds and insurance companies buying shares in the BSC. If that is the case, why cannot he be consistent enough to accept that an institution which represents the employees should also be entitled to hold shares? It is a simple point which I would like the Minister to answer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have no objection to trade unions owning shares; many of them do. I expect that trade union pension funds will take a substantial stake in this privatisation, as they have in others. That will be after the Opposition, to which many unions are affiliated, have fought the privatisation tooth and nail. I do not mind the trade union institutions holding shares as investors, but I dislike the idea that the workers will be given a large number of shares and that the power over the management —which is what interests the Opposition—will be exercised by the trade unions on their behalf.

Mr. Maxton: The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins)—in whose constituency is that famous bus company—attacked the Opposition earlier for tokenism. I have heard of tokenism, but, by God, the Chancellor of the Duchy's speech was the best piece of tokenism that I have heard from any Minister. [HON. MEMBERS: "It was robust tokenism."] I accept that it was robust tokenism, but it was still tokenism.

The way that the Minister made his scheme out to be the most generous ever is quite remarkable. He did not answer any of my questions about what percentage of the total share ownership he expects to be owned by employees or how many employees he expects to take up the various aspects of the scheme. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) was right when he said that all these figures were down to astrology and have little to do with realism.

It is a generous offer of share ownership for employees, because the Chancellor of the Duchy knows that nobody else will take the shares. Of course he will try to get rid of as many of them as possible to the employees. That will get the shares on the market and enable him to say that the Government are getting rid of some of the shares. That is why, on the surface, the offer is so generous. However, many employees will not take up the share offer. He knows that the steel industry employees, like ordinary people and institutions buying shares, will not consider it to be a particularly worthwhile investment.

One reason why our scheme is designed to give power and responsibility to workers in the industry, as opposed to giving individual workers a small stake in the industry, is that people—especially those who live and work at Ravenscraig—know that privatisation puts their jobs at risk. However, if they own one third of the company, they will have a say in whether Ravenscraig should close. Under the Government's proposals they will have no say in the matter even if they buy the shares.

In fact, far from having a say, an employee at Ravenscraig who takes up his allotted number, or perhaps buys more than his allotted number, of shares under the Minister's scheme will be declared redundant, either because of a partial rundown at Ravenscraig or its closure. Then the DHSS will expect him to make a profit of 20 per cent. on each of those shares and will take that profit into consideration before it pays the redundant worker any income support that he may be entitled to. I do not know whether the Minister expects British Steel to pay a dividend of 20 per cent. on its shares. I think that that is rather unlikely, but perhaps he will tell us whether that is the case.

People will not buy the shares, because they will not give them any protection against the threat of unemployment. Therefore, there is a major difference between the Opposition and the Government. The individual share ownership tokenism in which the Minister is indulging does not give the workers any directors, or any power, and gives them only a small bonus. The Minister has said that workers are entitled to some return for the hard work that they have put in to help turn the British Steel Corporation round. However, if a man has worked for 30 years in that company, his bonus for doing all that work to turn it round and make it a profitable organisation is the princely sum of £130. What a bonus to offer the employees.

As there are other debates to come and although the Government are indulging in tokenism, as we accept that they will not take on board our genuine and imaginative approach to share ownership in the company, and as there comes a point at which it ceases to be enjoyable to bang one's head against a brick wall, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 16

CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS, REPEALS AND TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

Mr. Atkins: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 9, line 39 after 'make', insert—

'(a)'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 16.

Mr. Atkins: Although we are dealing only with amendments Nos. 15 and 16, those amendments, together with amendments Nos. 17, 18 and 20 are consequential on the detailed investigations that have been carried out by my officials to ensure that no necessary provisions have been overlooked in terms of maintaining the status quo when the changes take place. Therefore, they are technical amendments.

The small extension to clause 16(2)—provided in amendments Nos. 15 and 16—seeks to ensure that the subsection provides a comprehensive safeguard, in case we have omitted or overlooked some necessary provisions in relation to one of the very many pieces of subordinate legislation that affect the corporation.

Mr. Gould: The Minister spoke, in effect, to all five of the Government amendments. He will want to move the second group formally when the time comes, but I can say straight away that we do not have a problem with that. However, there is a small question mark in our minds about the first group of amendments.

The addition to clause 16 seems a widely drawn provision. For that reason, I should like to ask the Minister what precedents there are for such a provision.

For example, I notice that in clause 83 of the Airports Act 1986, which is often prayed in aid by the Government as establishing the precedent for various provisions in the Bill, follows more or less the structure of clause 16 and that there is no equivalent provision to the addition that is proposed in the Government amendments. Perhaps the Minister owes us a slight explanation of why the amendment is required, given that, as I have said, it is drafted so widely.

We should also like to know the limitations on the ability that the Secretary of State would be given by that provision. For example, does the Secretary of State's ability extend to the ability to amend primary legislation or is the omission of any reference to that point deliberate? What is the time limit? One assumes that the purpose of the provision is to provide for the possibility of exercising that power after the appointed day—and that power goes on for ever. It is certainly true that the provision, as drafted, speaks in terms of saving or transitional amendments. However, that may not be a substantial safeguard against what appears to be a widely drawn power.

Therefore, while we do not believe that any great issue of principle is at stake, we should like a slightly fuller explanation of why the additional provision was thought necessary.

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman has asked several specific questions. At this juncture, I can only tell him that this follows the precedent of a number of other Acts. I shall endeavour to find out the detail of all the Acts to which he refers, but, as he will understand, there are probably many.

Mr. Maxton: That means, "Wait and see."

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) makes a sedentary intervention. He should recognise the amount of technical work done by officials to review all the possible loopholes. He is making suggestions, conveniently while he is not in a position to know exactly what his hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is asking, let alone what I am about to reply. That does not help us to get to the point.

The simple answer to the question is that this provision follows the precedent of other Acts. My officials have spent considerable time combing through all the legislation on which orders are made and which protects the position——

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): It is coming—the information is coming.

Mr. Atkins: Yes, all the officials have been working extremely hard to ensure that every possible loophole is filled. It is amazing what one can do if one tries. The relevant legislation is section 58(4) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1988, section 34(4) of the Dentists Act 1983 and section 13(5) of the Anatomy Act 1984. Those are the precedents for this provision. I hope that that will reassure the hon. Member for Dagenham.

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to the Minister for his recital of that largely meaningless list of precedents. Can he now tell us what the provision is about? What is it meant to achieve?

Mr. Atkins: I can answer those questions. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that under most Acts there are provisions for statutory instruments. We have to ensure that in the event of something being missed—I do not anticipate that anything will have been missed, judging by the amount of work that officials have put in, as they always do, in combing through all the legislation that is affected by enabling legislation such as this—we can save a statutory instrument that has been repealed inadvertently by virtue of an Act being amended, consequent upon this legislation. That is the precedent that we have followed previously and we shall endeavour to do so here.

The hon. Member for Dagenham was right to spot that there is nothing particularly exotic about the amendment. It is a technical amendment. As ever, he has bowled a quick one, I have flashed and, I hope, not snicked the ball.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 16, in page 9, line 44, at end insert—

'(b) such transitional or saving provision as appears to him to be necessary or expedient in connection with the coming into force of any provision of this Act; and any provision of an order made under this subsection after the appointed day may be made so as to have effect as from that or any later day.'.—[Mr. Atkins.]

Schedule 1

PROVISIONS SUPPLEMENTARY TO S.1

Mr. Atkins: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 11, line 41, leave out 'and' and insert'(2)'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 17 and 18.

Mr. Atkins: Opposition Members will be pleased to know that these amendments bring about a small improvement in the Bill. They ensure that where, for pension purposes, a period of employment with another company is to be deemed as a period of employment with the corporation, that arrangement is not disturbed by the vesting under clause 1, but continues to apply with the successor company substituted for the corporation. This may be relevant, for example, for the purpose of calculating the pension entitlement of a corporation employee who was, prior to 1967, employed by a private sector steel company that was subsequently nationalised.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 17, in page 11, line 42, after 'day', insert—

'(a)'.

No. 18, in page 11, line 43, after second 'Corporation', insert

', and

(b) any period of employment which would, immediately before that day, have been treated as such employment for the purposes of any such agreement or arrangement,'.—[Mr. Atkins.]

8 pm

Mr. Maxton: I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 11, line 45, at end insert—

'3A. There shall be no reduction in the value in real terms of the pensions, allowances and gratuities which the successor company becomes liable to pay under section 1 above.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 21.

Mr. Maxton: I reiterate that the Opposition remain adamantly opposed to the concept of the privatisation of

[Mr. Maxton]

British Steel. We believe it to be bad for the economy and bad for the employees. However, as well as opposing, we have a responsibility to ensure that the best protection is available to employees if the privatisation goes ahead.

Existing employees and past employees now retired are concerned about what will happen to their pensions. Those who are already retired want to ensure that the pensions that they are receiving will continue to be paid to them and will continue to be meaningful in real terms. Those who are paying into the scheme, with the employer paying in as well, want to know that the value of their contributions will remain the same under privatisation.

We have tabled the amendment in an attempt to draw from the Government the exact nature of their plans. Since then, the Government have tabled amendment No. 21, which is considerably more detailed than our amendment No. 8. The Government have hard-working advisers who can give them help which, unfortunately, we do not have.

I am happy to keep my remarks brief and invite the Minister to explain the Government's amendment.

Mr. Morley: I appreciate that the Government have tabled an amendment that in some respects strengthens the protection of the pension fund. However, many British Steel workers in my constituency are worried about the future of the pension fund. In other companies there have been attempts to use pension funds as part of investment programmes. In some instances there has been a great deal of discontent and disagreement about the way in which the pension fund should be used.

When the BSC is floated, the Government will have no involvement or control. I appreciate that the Government have responded to some of the fears that have been expressed for some time about the future of the pension fund, but I hope that the Minister will give some reassurances that I can pass on to my constituents to the effect that the value of the fund will be protected. I seek also some safeguards on the way in which the fund will be used in future.

Mr. Atkins: Amendment No. 21 fulfils the promise that I made in Committee. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that the repeal of schedule 3 to the Iron and Steel Act 1982 does not affect the continuation in force of any pension scheme, or any person's rights or liabilities in relation to any pension scheme, or the rights of any dependants, that derive from regulations that have effect as if made under that schedule. As I said in Committee, the amendment safeguards the continuity of the pension scheme after the appointed day, when schedule 3 to the 1982 Act is repealed.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) placed great weight in Committee on the power in paragraph 2 of schedule 3 to the 1982 Act to enable regulations to amend or repeal pension schemes provided that persons affected are not placed in any worse position. That provision does not, however, provide the general guarantee that he suggested. The BSC's present pension scheme is the responsibility of the corporation and the trustee, within the terms of the trust deed. I can assure the House that the corporation's firm intention, as I think I predicted in Committee, is that its present pension scheme will go forward unchanged into the private sector. Pensions should therefore continue to be provided subject to, and in accordance with, the present trust deed, at least as far as present employees and pensioners are concerned. I understand that the corporation will shortly be making the position clear to all its employees.

The imposition of a statutory requirement on the successor company and the trustees of the pension scheme of the sort proposed by amendment No. 8 is unacceptable to the Government. There is no such statutory constraint on the corporation at present. It is the terms of the trust deed that govern the corporation's pension scheme at present, and should continue, in our view, to apply to the successor company. That provides a very substantial assurance to all British Steel's pensioners and employees that their rights will be looked after.

As I said in Committee, there are 28 directors of the trustee committee, of whom 14 represent the work force. The trustees are bound both by the provisions of the trust deed and by a substantial body of trustee legislation to act at all times in the interests of the trust's beneficiaries. That is the overriding consideration affecting the activities of all trustees. The ability of British Steel plc to alter its pension scheme will therefore be heavily circumscribed.

British Steel's pensioners and employees have the assurance that all their present pension rights will pass unchanged to the successor company, and British Steel's clear intention is that they will continue unchanged into the private sector. Of course, I cannot offer absolute guarantees about the future any more than I could if British Steel were to remain a nationalised industry, but both the Government and British Steel are very well aware of the importance of this issue and fully understand the concerns that have been expressed.

Mr. Morgan: The Minister has said that 14 of the 28 trustees of the corporation's pension fund represent the work force. I take it that he means that the 14 were appointed through the representative trade unions of the work force, as is common in nationalised industries. Given the remarks of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster about employee share ownership schemes—the right hon. and learned Gentleman poured much derision on the idea that trade unions might represent the work force in terms of proxy voting through their shareholdings—does the right hon. and learned Gentleman envisage any changes in the rights of the work force to have 50 per cent. trustee representation on the pension fund? Is that to be altered in any way so that trade unions will not be permitted to act through their general secretaries or other officers as the trade union half of the trustees of the successor company's pension fund?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman makes as convoluted a point now as he made in Committee when we discussed this issue at length. I promised in Committee that we would seek to persuade British Steel—British Steel seemed to have been persuaded—to maintain the same trust and pension fund when it became a privatised company as that which had applied in the past. The detailed arrangements of the constitution of the trust and the alterations to the trust are doubtless familiar both to the trade unions and the board of British Steel as it is now and as it will be. If there are to be amendments, they will be discussed through the normal channels within the company. If alterations have to be made, they will follow.

The position will be the same in future, as near as we can guarantee, as it is now. We cannot give absolute guarantees, because the position under a privatised company or a nationalised company cannot be guaranteed absolutely. For example, I cannot predict whether the world will end tomorrow.

All the signs are that, while the position of the pension fund is being reviewed, the liabilities will be adequately provided for. I understand the reasons that led to the tabling of amendment No. 8, but given the detailed spelling out of the meaning of amendment No. 21, which confirms the position as was and as will be, I hope that the Opposition will withdraw their amendment and support amendment No. 21.

Mr. Maxton: I think that we would all like a slightly fuller explanation of the scheme. I understand that the Minister cannot give absolute assurances on the future of the pension scheme, and I am grateful to him for putting into the Bill some form of control over the new private company, but I should like to know whether the corporation is saying that, if someone joins the privatised company, he or she will be offered the pension scheme that we are discussing along with existing employees who will continue with it. Will someone who joins the company get the same pension scheme? I am not entirely clear about the relationship between British Steel's pension scheme and other public sector pension schemes. Will it have the same transferability rights as other pension schemes? Will people be able to pay into it and take out of it as they move?

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Member knows that there is considerable precedent for this in other privatisations. I said, when I served on my first Standing Committee discussing British Aerospace, that pensions were one of the most important elements in any privatisation, and they still are. I undertook to bring forward on Report—as I have done—the Government's view on what the future pension scheme would be in relation to the past one, and I have explained that.

It is for the company to make a detailed statement to employees in the near future—I am not sure exactly when. The future pension scheme for new employees will be spelt out, but I cannot say at this stage exactly what its terms will be, largely because it is still being worked out. It would be folly to suggest what might be in it.

Pensioners and employees in the company will have a pension scheme that is, to all intents and purposes, exactly the same as the present one—except that I cannot give a guarantee about it, for the reasons I have given.

Mr. Maxton: I suppose that it is pleasant to end the Report stage on a note of amicable accord, because we welcome the Minister's guarantee, although it is not as absolute as we would have hoped. We wish that privatisation was not taking place and that the employees could remain in the public sector. Given that they cannot, this is about as good an assurance from the Government as we are likely to get, and I welcome it as such.

Accordingly, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 3

Transitional Provisions and Savings

Mr. Atkins: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 16, line 18 at end insert

'any sum by virtue of paragraph 3 above or'.

The amendment puts right a minor omission in the Bill and ensures that the Secretary of State remains under a duty to account for any outstanding Government loans made to the corporation before the appointed day that vest in the successor company.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 21, in page 16, line 19 at end insert—

'Pensions and compensation payments

7A.—(1) The repeal by this Act of Schedule 3 to the 1982 Act (pension rights of employees shall not affect—

(a) the continuation in force of any pension scheme subsisting immediately before the appointed day in accordance with any regulations which then had effect as if made under that Schedule, or

(b) any person's rights or liabilities then subsisting in relation to any pension scheme by virtue of any such regulations.

(2) In sub-paragraph (1) above "pension scheme" means a pension scheme within the meaning of Schedule 3 to the 1982 Act.

7B.—(1) Any provisions of the Iron and Steel (Pensions) (Dependants) Regulations 1969 having effect immediately before the appointed day as if made under Schedule 3 to the 1982 Act shall continue in force (subject to the following provisions of this paragraph) notwithstanding the repeal by this Act of that Schedule.

(2) Any reference to the Corporation in those provisions shall have effect, as respects anything falling to be done or occurring on or after the appointed day, as if it were a reference to the successor company.

(3) Those provisions may be amended or revoked in like manner as if Schedule 3 to the 1982 Act had not been repealed (but the reference to the Corporation in paragraph 4(2) of that Schedule shall be construed as a reference to the successor company).

7C.—(1) Where—

(a) any regulations made under section 24 of the Iron and Steel Act 1953 (compensation to employees of certain nationalised companies or of the Iron and Steel Corporation), or

(b) any regulations having effect as if made under paragraph 2 of Schedule 4 to the Iron and Steel Act 1975 (compensation to employees of certain nationalised companies or of the Iron and Steel Board).

are in force immediately before the appointed day, any such regulations shall continue in force (subject to the following provisions of this paragraph) notwithstanding the repeal by this Act of paragraphs 7 and 8 of Schedule 6 to the 1982 Act (saving for compensation regulations etc.)

(2) Any reference to the corporation (including any reference which fell to be construed as such a reference immediately before the appointed day) in any regulations continued in force by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above shall have effect, as respects anything falling to be done or occurring on or after that day, as if it were a reference to the successor company.

(3) Any regulations continued in force by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above may be amended or revoked in like manner as if the provision mentioned in paragraph (a), or (as the case may be) paragraph (b), of that sub-paragraph had not been repealed (but any reference in that provision to the Iron and Steel Holding and Realisation Agency or to the Corporation shall, unless the context otherwise requires, be construed as a reference to the successor company).'.—[Mr. Atkins.]

Mr. Atkins: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 16, line 19, at end insert—

'Savings in connection with transfers to the Corporation

7D. The repeals made by this Act shall not affect—

[Mr. Atkins]

(a) any document or other thing which has effect immediately before the appointed day subject to any modifications prescribed by the Steel Companies (Vesting) Order 1970, or

(b) anything not falling within sub-paragraph (a) above (other than an enactment) which then has effect or is continuing subject to, or to modifications in consequence of, the substitution of the Corporation for any other person or body;

but, as from the appointed day, anything falling within sub-paragraph (a) or (b) above shall be further subject to such of the provisions of paragraphs 1 to 3 of Schedule 1 to this Act as are applicable.'.

This amendment is a technical provision designed merely to ensure that the statutory vesting under clause 1 and the subsequent repeal of the 1982 Act do not disrupt existing arrangements or entitlements.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Atkins: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 16, line 30, leave out 'during that period, shall' and insert 'which is relevant to the making of that distribution, shall accordingly'.

This is a technical amendment that follows precedence in earlier Acts. If the hon. Member for Glasgow, Carthcart (Mr. Maxton) wants me to spell it all out again I shall have to seek advice.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

8.14 pm

Mr. Crowther: No one in the steel industry, whether employed directly by the BSC or working for a firm in which it has a substantial shareholding, can view the future with anything but great trepidation. Throughout the debates on this Bill, my hon. Friends have tried to introduce changes which would have improved the security of the industry and its work force in various ways. We welcome the minor provisions on pensions, but it seems unfortunate that the Opposition had to press the Government to make even those small concessions. The Government should have thought of them themselves.

Otherwise, the Government have conceded nothing. They are throwing the BSC naked back into the private sector jungle from which it had to be rescued in 1967. The Bill is ideological—nothing else: so much is clear at the end of all these debates. Not the slightest commercial justification for the privatisation of British Steel has been advanced throughout the debates. The Government say only that it belongs in the private sector. Why does it belong there? No one has given us a good reason.

If the BSC belongs in the private sector, why did not the Conservative Government who were returned to power in 1970 put it back there? Why did not this Government put it back in 1979, or in any of the eight subsequent years? We, and they, know the answer. They knew that the industry needed investment on a scale that the private sector could not or would not provide. So they brought in Mr. MacGregor to preside over the destruction of 111,000 jobs, the financial costs of which had to be met by the taxpayers and the social costs of which are still being suffered in steelmaking areas such as mine, where massive unemployment is still the order of the day.

Now, because of these measures and because BSC now has modern plant—thanks to public investment—a greatly reduced work force and a high level of productivity, it is making a bit of profit—but not a lot. So the BSC has to go back to the private sector, which was so disastrous for the industry in the past. It is returning to that sector with no assurance that adequate resources will be available for new investment or that all its present plant will remain open. It returns with no assurance that it will continue to be profitable under the burden of increased electricity charges and the adverse exchange rates that are now beginning to affect it; and with no assurance that it will not be gobbled up by its ruthless foreign competitors. So, an industry which has been brought back to a state of high productivity and efficiency because by public ownership is being thrown back into the jungle. This is a sad day for the British steel industry and all who are associated with it.

8.17 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) for starting the debate. I am not sure whether he moved the Third Reading—it is unlikely in the light of his comments——

Mr. Crowther: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will recall that no one appeared anxious to make a contribution until I got on my feet. If the Minister had been present, he could have moved the Third Reading.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I confirm that the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) was the only one who rose at that time.

Mr. Clarke: We all wait for the words of the hon. Member for Rotherham about the steel industry, and I am glad to have conceded the first word to him.

I agree with the hon. Member for Rotherham that the issue we are debating is whether the British Steel Corporation should be owned by the state and remain in the public sector. This is an enabling Bill, to enable the corporation to be turned into a Companies Act company in which the Government will own all the shares for a short time before we proceed to flotation at the end of this year, at the earliest—or as soon thereafter as possible, if that does not prove possible.

The Opposition remain opposed to the whole principle and we have one last opportunity to talk about whether a giant and important manufacturing company such as British Steel will do best as a state-owned company or whether it should be returned to the private sector. The hon. Member for Rotherham said that the company belongs in the state sector. I assume from the gist of most of the Opposition comments during the hours of debate on the Bill that they will restate their preference for state ownership. I have listened to the nuances of the debate during the course of protracted exchanges, and questions arise in my mind about exactly what ground now stands between us and the Opposition.

I am not quite sure why the Labour party continues to prefer state ownership. I am no longer at all clear what form of state ownership the present day Labour party wants. I have listened to the debates but I still do not know what alternative future the Opposition propose for the industry. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) vehemently refuses to say what any future Labour Administration would do if we proceed to privatisation and return the company to the private sector.

Mr. Gould rose—

Mr. Clarke: At this late stage, the hon. Member for Dagenham is about to tell us whether the steel industry would be renationalised by a future Labour Government.

Mr. Gould: It may be a late stage for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, because he was not a member of the Committee and was not present at any of the Committee sittings. If he had attended, and certainly if he had taken any interest in the proceedings, he would have discovered that, repeatedly, day in and day out, we made very clear our preference for public ownership. We also made clear our view that the status quo has served the British steel industry extremely well. Any mystery that remains in his mind could have been dispelled if he had bothered to listen to or read the many speeches that I and my hon. Friends made in Committee.

Mr. Clarke: Once again, the hon. Gentleman has evaded the question that I put to him. Of course I understand that he has consistently stated a preference for public ownership. By its vote later tonight, the Labour party will be expressing its preference for the status quo. Whether that means that the Morrisonian corporation is in the opinion of the Opposition a desirable and permanent future status for the steel industry is very doubtful.

The Opposition are not clear what form of state ownership they want, and the question that the hon. Gentleman rose to answer is one that he has consistently declined to answer. Given that he and all his hon. Friends know that we will return the corporation to the private sector, will he tell the House whether the Labour party would renationalise it? The Opposition have declined to answer that question. There are considerable difficulties in understanding what the Labour party means by a state-owned industry, and we do not know whether it is still wedded to the Morrisonian corporation, which, by their vote, the Opposition will appear to defend at the end of this debate.

As the hon. Gentleman said, I was not a member of the Committee, but I studied its proceedings. I noted in particular that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) who has been very active throughout proceedings on the Bill, although he is not in the Chamber at the moment, said in Committee when discussing a new form of public ownership:

"Perhaps we should have thought of it earlier, because I concede that there are disadvantages to the Morrisonian corporation which has been the traditional form of nationalisation. The Labour party is thinking actively and strenuously about new varieties of ownership, involving the workers and making commercial returns and imperatives available to nationalised industries."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 14 April 1988; c. 524.]

That sits oddly alongside the commitment to vote for the retention of the Morrisonian corporation whose existence the Government are about to bring to an end.

I shall try again from another quote. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby said that the amendments that the Committee was discussing "propose that British Steel should demonstrate a track record before privatisation.

We are not standing in the Government's way and saying, 'Thou shalt not privatise'. We are saying that we should privatise taking into account all the sense and virtues that the Government tell us are to be found in the Conservative party—the feeling of financial markets, financial rectitude and financial responsibility—by establishing a track record before this important national asset is launched on an uncertain sea."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 10 March 1988; c. 59-60.]

Both those quotations might leave the thought in some people's minds that the meaning is not altogether clear. Given that we are debating the principle of state ownership, the opportunity should be taken to make the meaning clear about the Labour party's position and the vote that it intends to cast.

These curious excursions by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby match some of the statements by the Labour party's allies in the trade union movement. Mr. Roy Evans, the general secretary of the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation, said in the ISTC journal of February 1988:

"In a highly competitive industry, the most efficient companies will survive and prosper. The industrial relations structure in steel must be rationalised to avoid any possibility of obstacles in the way of efficiency . . . The road to privatisation is not going to be easy, but we cannot prevent it without closing down the industry and putting all our jobs at risk. So we should use the opportunity to play a constructive role in creating a modern, profitable and humane industry able to provide guarantees of well-paid jobs for ourselves and our children."

That leads us to the problem of the Labour party telling the House only that it prefers public ownership. All it will do is vote against the Bill in an attempt to retain the status quo. We know that that is not an alternative to the policy contained in the Bill and it leads us to a great problem. The Government say that this company will flourish and will be managed better, will perform better and will give a better future to its employees and certainly to its customers in the commercial arena as a private sector company. What is the Labour party saying? It is a listening party and will not have an industrial policy for a couple of years after the next election. The Opposition are in no position to cast a calculated vote for anything.

Dr. Reid: Such is the Minister's grasp of the flexibility with which the Opposition are approaching the whole question of social ownership that I would be tempted to vouch for him as a future Minister in a Labour Government, except that in my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) we have a better candidate.

The Minister finds it difficult to understand how we can oppose the principle of privatisation while in Committee we suggested ways in which it could be carried out in a better form than the way in which the Government propose to carry it out. May I quote to the Minister the parable that he has not read in Hansard and which I had to give to the Under-Secretary? We are opposed to violence but would rather be slapped in the face than shot through the head. The manner in which the Government are privatising the industry is a shot through the head for the industry, its workers and the taxpayer. We are suggesting within the privatisation format ways in which the Government could improve their approach to privatisation if they are intent on sticking to it.

Mr. Clarke: With respect to the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) that is all very well for amendments when the Opposition can claim that they accept privatisation because it is forced upon them and they are seeking to improve it. At the end of the debate, they will vote on the principle of the Bill and will vote for public ownership. I am talking about the flexibility of the hon. Member for Dagenham and wondering where this flexible reasoning is leading the Labour party.

[Mr. Clarke]

These questions are crucial to Motherwell and elsewhere. What is the future of the steel industry and what do the Labour party propose? The Opposition defend nationalised industry, but what kind of nationalisation do they contemplate? The hon. Member for Dagenham is nodding and I am sure that he will speak on Third Reading. This is my best opportunity so far to discuss the matter with him, and where better than across the Dispatch Box? I thought that I would be discussing it with him on "Newsnight" on 9 May.

The hon. Gentleman emerged as the author of a Labour party document on the future of public ownership and he and I were invited to have a discussion. However, the hon. Member for Dagenham made representations to the BBC and would not discuss the matter with me.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are all fascinated by the fantasies of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but is it not a convention of the House, preceding even the presence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in high office, that Third Readings should be devoted to discussing what is in the Bill? It is very different even from Second Reading. When does the right hon. and learned Gentleman intend to come to order?

Mr. Clarke rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). I have only just come to the Chair and I am getting the distinct impression that both Front Benches are probably not keeping to the straight and narrow. May I remind the House that Third Reading speeches must be confined to the contents of the Bill?

Mr. Gould: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Opposition Front Bench has not yet risen to take part in the Third Reading debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was going by my impression of the atmosphere of the House, and I am looking to both Front Benches to set a good example to assist the Chair.

Mr. Clarke: I accept your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have the greatest respect for the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), so if I talk about his seniority, it is not out of disrespect. The old Labour party has risen to the rescue of the new. It may be—I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker—that protracted discussion about the position of the Labour party is as impossible on this occasion as it proved to be on "Newsnight". Nevertheless, it is relevant to the content of the Bill and to whether or not the Bill will receive the support of the House that we should know what is the Labour party's view of public ownership.

I am sure that it is not beyond the ingenuity of the hon. Member for Dagenham to help us, although I know that he and his hon. Friends have avoided this question for at least 80 hours in Committee and many more on the Floor of the House. The Labour party has the opportunity—I am sure that it can slip it in within the rules of order—to give us some enlightenment about what kind of nationalised industries it now favours and what kind of nationalised industry it is seeking to defend.

I shall revert to order. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent wishes to know about the Bill. It is an enabling Bill, which will enable the Government to transfer the status of British Steel from a public corporation to a Companies Act company in which the Government will own all the shares. The Government intend to sell the shares at an appropriate time, thus returning British Steel to the private sector—the right and proper place for it. The Bill does not dictate the timing or manner of privatisation, but as I have told the House, it is our intention to privatise British Steel as soon as is practical and as a single entity in its present configuration.

The essence of the Bill is that all the property, rights and liabilities of the corporation will vest in a successor company. That company will be a Companies Act company, limited by shares that will be wholly owned by the Government. Therefore, while there will be a change in the legal status of British Steel, from corporation to plc, there will be no material change in its commercial activity or the extent of its assets and liabilities.

The successor company will require a capital structure compatible with the requirements of the Companies Act. Therefore, the Bill makes provision for the necessary financial restructuring of the corporation. These provisions constitute simply a rearrangement of the balance sheet and are not a write-off of liabilities or a subsidy. We discussed this at length on Report. No money changed hands at any stage. The first step is to reduce the corporation's public dividend capital in order to write off past trading losses so that the capital shown in the balance sheet will accurately represent the value of the assets. This process is not a write-off of debts. Past trading losses are not debts—they are a record of past losses which have been incurred, accounted for at the appropriate time, and recorded in the balance sheet. They represent public money that is lost and gone for ever, during the record of the company as a nationalised company.

It is not true to say, as Labour Members, including the hon. Member for Rotherham, have tried to imply throughout our debates, that the taxpayer will receive a raw deal either from the capital reduction or from the privatisation. It is a completely unrealistic estimate of what the taxpayer ought to receive to say that he should receive back all the money that he has put into the corporation in the past. That money has been used to fund past trading losses. It represents the cost of keeping uneconomic capacity going for too long and it also met the costs of rationalisation. That money is lost and gone. It represents in large measure the cost of imposing decisions on the business that often did not accord with commercial realities, and it is unrealistic to suggest that the money should be repaid.

If the Opposition were to win the vote this evening, that money would never, and could never, be repaid. The corporation has not paid a dividend since 1975. Even with the payment of a large and regular dividend from now on, the corporation could never repay to the state what it has received from it, and it is unrealistic to think otherwise. The taxpayer will get the best available terms through privatisation, because whatever value is realised from the proceeds of the sale would be considerably greater than whatever is realised in many years of dividend payments.

That is the essence of the Bill, and that is in order. The House is riveted by a speech that is in order on Third Reading, but I hope that my minor excursion earlier will arouse a somewhat wider response from the hon. Member for Dagenham. He shares with me the view that this is a vital industry, and we wish British Steel and those who work in it great success in the future. When the hon. Member was talking about the importance of such utilities on the programme to which I inadvertently returned earlier, he said:

"When you see the document you will see we set out our broad approach, which certainly talks about the general and unique importance of the major utilities as servants of the economy, as deliverers of services to consumers, as providers of essential facilities to the national economy. And that leads us to certain conclusions. But we don't, by any means, rule out, indeed we specifically recognise that in some instances some form of ownership, or control, in addition to the regulation that we initially refer to, that some form of ownership or control may well be required."

He then set out some options. He continued:

"But we have yet to do the work which will enable us to decide exactly what form that should take, and in what instances."

That is his policy. Ours is the one that I have described and that is embodied in the Bill, and ours is a tribute to the success of the corporation and its work force.

We recognise the enthusiasm and commitment of the management and the work force, which have turned around the performance of the corporation. That is why the package of benefits that I have described will be available to the employees on flotation. We anticipate that, on its return to the private sector, BSC will continue to thrive. It will be better able to respond quickly and flexibly to the market conditions. It will not be subject to the control of the Treasury or Ministers. It will not, thank heavens, be subject to the trade union control that the Opposition were urging upon us as an improved form of private sector ownership.

The BSC is now one of the most profitable steel producers in the world. Its record of achievement in recent years is impressive and the results are plain for all to see. It has continued to invest in its business and to improve efficiency and productivity. We believe that British Steel's future is best assured in the private sector, subject to no more and no less a degree of Government regulation than any other private sector company.

The Bill enables the Government to set in motion the transformation from nationalised corporation to private sector plc. We know what we want. We have an extremely clear policy. We believe that this policy is backing the BSC and all who work in it, and offering them a better future. I do not believe for one moment that the Opposition have the slightest idea of what they propose to do with the steel industry or any other major industry, yet they are about to cast a vote that clings to the old Morrisonian corporation because they cannot think of anything better and they certainly cannot agree among themselves on anything better. As we have a clear policy, taking forward the logic of our position, I commend the Third Reading of the Bill to the House.

8.37 pm

Mr. Gould: I suppose I should find it flattering that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster tried so hard, even though it meant that he strayed out of order, to deal with remarks that I have made on television rather than trying to explain the Bill. However, I will not follow him in that course because I propose to stay in order and devote my brief remarks to the Bill. After all, the Government have introduced this Bill and we must respond to it. I hope that the Chancellor will be satisfied by the end of my speech, and that he will realise that our position is clear.

The Bill began with the statement that the right hon. and learned Gentleman made on 3 December, but it began with a mystery. We tried to unravel that mystery in Committee, in a process that took many hours, during which we had to do without the help and assistance of the Chancellor. Despite our hard work, we got nowhere near unravelling the mystery of why the Bill was introduced at this time. We learned a little more about the Bill, but not much. Ministers were not very forthcoming about the reasons for its introduction and were extremely shy about answering one specific question. It may be that, now we have the Chancellor here, I will be able to do what he could not, and ask a question that is in order. Why was the Bill suddenly introduced when it had not been presaged by any reference to it either in the Conservative party manifesto or in the Queen's Speech?

We found that puzzling. Rather fruitless efforts were made by some Ministers in Committee to assure us that all sorts of footling little measures might be slipped through without being mentioned in the Queen's Speech, but that is not a good answer. We thought that that answer did not attach sufficient importance to this measure. If, as we suspect, the Government regard it as an important measure, it would have been reasonable to expect some reference to be made to it in the Queen's Speech.

Of course, as the Chancellor knows, reference was there none. We are interested to know why, between drawing up the Queen's Speech and the Conservative party manifesto and the statement on 3 December, there was some sudden change of heart and some reason was considered to be sufficiently pressing to induce the Chancellor and his Department to bring forward the Bill. We received no answer in Committee, but I hope that the Minister will now offer us an explanation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will recall that statements from Conservative Ministers that the aim of the policy of this Government was to return the British Steel Corporation to the private sector as soon as it was practicable and reasonable to do so go back to well before the last election. It is true that there was no specific reference to it in the manifesto, but there was in speeches, and there certainly was in the campaign guide produced by the Conservative party, which I am sure is consulted as regularly by those at the headquarters of the Labour party as it is by those at the headquarters of the Conservative party.

In the course of the year, British Steel's recovery became so fast and so strong that it was quite obvious —certainly when we received the half-yearly results—that its performance had reached a stage at which it was ready to return to the private sector, and therefore we proceeded. It was trailed in the Gracious Speech by the words

"Other measures will be laid before you."—[Official Report, 25 June 1987; Vol. 118, c. 40.]

Other measures were.

Mr. Fallon: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: If the Government can move so steadily and purposefully towards our stated intentions, why does it take the Labour party so long to decide whether it will renationalise the company once we have returned it to the private sector?

Mr. Gould: I am surprised that the Chancellor should follow the faltering footsteps of his junior ministerial colleague, as that is exactly what he told us in Committee. We found it pretty unconvincing; the whole Committee found it pretty unconvincing. Judging by the attempt of the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) to intervene in the Minister's intervention, I suspect that he too found it pretty unconvincing.

Mr. Fallon: I intervened to help not the hon. Gentleman but my right hon. and learned Friend. There is a much clearer and more obvious text than that rather dubious phrase from the Queen's Speech. If the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) will look closely at the 1987 Conservative manifesto, he will find a sentence reiterating the Government's commitment to returning all state industries to the private sector. The British Steel Corporation is a state industry; therefore, it is being returned to the private sector.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that we shall not spend too long on manifestos. We should be discussing the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Gould: I am very happy to do so, in the comfortable knowledge that the hon. Member for Darlington has agreed that the reason advanced by the Chancellor is pretty dubious. We are all agreed on that.

The origins of the Bill go back not just the few years to which the Chancellor referred, but perhaps 25 years. That is as long as Conservative Ministers have promised to privatise the steel industry. The very generality of the commitment, as the hon. Member for Darlington explained, and its long history lead us still to be puzzled about why the Bill was brought forward with so little fanfare and so little notice. That mystery remains unresolved.

A possible explanation which, to some degree, is borne out by what the Chancellor has just said is that it suddenly occurred to the Chancellor, the Secretary of State and his Department, that a window of opportunity had opened. That window of opportunity was based entirely on the current, but possibly short-lived, profitablity of the British Steel Corporation. With their very sensitive regard for the competitiveness and profitability of British industry, they knew that that window of opportunity would close very shortly. Perhaps they knew last year that the Prime Minister would win the famous battle over the exchange rate, and that the pound would rise to the dizzy heights of DM3·18, or whatever it stands at today, and that that would place a very large question mark over the prospects of the steel industry and the corporation.

For all those reasons—one can picture the scene—those very wise and clever people who sat with us throughout the passage of the Bill in Committee and who are present in the box today said to the Minister and to the Secretary of State, "It looks good for the moment, but if you want to privatise it and get some sort of price from the market, you had better do it in a hurry." That is why the Bill was suddenly rushed forward.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) made clear, once one has unravelled the mystery, the Bill is clearly born of ideology. There is all the familiar rhetoric of liberalisation, competition and the drive for efficiency, but none of that hangs together. The hon. Member for Darlington and I probably agree that yesterday we established that none of that could apply, since privatisation had nothing to do with liberalisation. In this instance, it was the very careful preservation of monopoly. Therefore, there is no reason to expect a privatised British Steel Corporation suddenly to feel the full force of market pressures because nothing will change, except that this time, instead of being publicly accountable, the industry and the corporation will be answerable only to those who want to make an immediate profit.

Throughout the Committee, and again yesterday, the astonishing doctrine was advanced that we need not worry too much about the monopoly which was being enshrined in this form of private ownership because British Steel, even in its new privatised form, would be kept under control by the market pressures exercised by imports. By implication, we were asked to conclude that the level of imports and the penetration of imports in the British market—no doubt that applies across the board to cars, ships and manufactured goods—is nothing to worry about. Indeed, it is to be applauded as a great success of Government policy.

As the tide of imports washes over British industry, closes down British firms and throws British workers on the dole, as the level of import penetration rises for virtually every manufacturing industry, it is to be regarded as a great triumph as part of the Government's much touted but extremely elusive competition policy. They do not have much else by way of a competition policy. We look in vain for the criteria which they might wish to apply. Ever-rising imports are the Government's competition policy. That is an extraordinary doctrine, which certainly is rejected by the Opposition.

Stripped of all the rhetoric and dogma about competition, efficiency and liberalisation, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman made clear in his speech, there is the simple belief, unsustained by any evidence—a gut feeling, no doubt—that it is right for the industry to be in private hands and that the concept of private ownership and the search for private profit, whether it produces better or worse performance, or whether it increases efficiency, do not matter; the mere fact of private ownership and private profit is ipso facto a good thing.

The Minister and his right hon. and hon. Friends are entitled to that view, but we are entitled to ask for a little more evidence. We are not convinced by that simple assertion of faith by Ministers, because we are prepared to look at the experience of the ownership of the industry. We know, and Ministers know, that, historically, the private ownership of the industry has been a disaster. Time and again, private owners have not been prepared to make the long-term commitment and investment in an industry which is essentially cyclical.

It is in the nature of private ownership and private owners and the drive for private profit which is so admired by Ministers, it is in the nature of that attitude towards industrial ownership, that when the going gets rough one bails out, closes down capacity, and abandons the industry. That pays no attention whatsoever to the national economic interest, to the rest of the industry or to the work force whose livelihoods depend on that industry. That is in the nature of private ownership. Because there is no match between the short-term interests of private owners and the long-term need of the industry for a commitment and an investment pattern to carry on through the troughs as well as the peaks, private ownership has consistently failed the steel industry. That is why we are in no doubt that the Bill must be opposed. We believe that it jeopardises the future viability of an essential British industry.

If the industry were placed at risk, as we believe that it is by this measure, it would matter considerably to the British economy. The Minister recognises—at least, he mentioned it in his speech—the importance of the industry. There were occasions in Committee—we had long debates on this sort of issue—when Ministers and others suggested that the industry has a certain importance but that they can take it or leave it. They seem to think that it is no different from any other industry and that if it went down a little it would not matter. We do not take that view. We believe that it is a strategically important industry. It is perhaps not at the commanding height that it once was because we recognise that new technology and new production methods have introduced new materials and so on. However, it is still an industry of major strategic importance.

There was some debate in Committee as to what was meant by the word "strategic". Effort was made to limit its meaning to its military sense. Of course there is a military sense in which steel is strategically important; I accept that. However, it is strategically important in a wider sense. It is one of the foundations and sinews of our industrial economy. If we were to have a substantially weakened steel industry by virtue of the failures of private ownership, I am certain that we would be dealing a mortal blow to much of our industrial economy.

The Government may be willing to get shot of the industry on almost any terms for reasons of their own ideology. They may be prepared to take that sort of risk with our industrial future. We do not believe that that risk is justified. For the avoidance of doubt—there have been occasions during the passage of the Bill when doubts have been expressed by Conservative Members—let me make it clear—I have the authority to speak on behalf of the trade unions as well—that we are opposed to privatisation. That is why we will vote against the Bill.

It is true that, while repeatedly and firmly making our opposition to privatisation clear, we have also been realistic enough—when we are not realistic enough we are criticised, and quite rightly—to recognise that, with the Government's present majority, it is likely that the Bill will reach the statute book. As well as expressing firmly our reasons for opposing the principle of the Bill, our duty and obligation has been to try to ameliorate its bad effects as best we can. I am sorry to say that we have had little success in doing that, partly because the Bill concentrates on the relatively narrow objective of restructuring the British Steel Corporation, but partly because Ministers simply rejected any argument on the basis of a simple ideology which we reject.

We have tried to ameliorate the short-termism built into the Bill. We object to the emphasis on private profit, the emphasis on profitability now and in the immediate future. We object to the fact that that means that attention is diverted from the investment that is so badly required. We have tried repeatedly in various ways to ensure that investment is recognised as an obligation of the new owners, whoever they may be. The Minister and the Government have resolutely resisted those attempts.

We have been extremely concerned for employee representation in varying ways. The concept of worker directors, which has worked extremely well in the British Steel Corporation until now, is to be lost. Ministers have expressed little concern about that. We believe that that is important and would have been an important amelioration of the Bill.

We are extremely concerned about the inadequate protection against takeovers, particularly foreign takeovers. It is true that the Government brought forward a limited provision on a special share. However, they found themselves constrainted by the requirements of the EEC Commission, and the protection offered is extremely limited and is time-limited as well. Therefore, we do not believe that that is adequate.

Virtually no attention is paid to the pressing and specific problem of Ravenscraig. We have taken the opportunity at every stage during the passage of the Bill to express our concern for the future of that great steel plant. Nothing in the Bill enables us to tell our constituents and those in Scotland who voted for us that Ravenscraig's future is assured. All the evidence and logic is that privatisation is simply a means of shuffling off responsibility for the decision as to Ravenscraig's future and that that decision will be disowned by the Government, when and if the time comes.

There is much to object to in the Bill. As I have said, our attempts to ameliorate it have been largely unsuccessful and that is why we return to the principle. The Government simply do not recognise the obligations of this great industry to the national economy. The Government, for ideological reasons, are blind to the evident risks that are run by handing it over to private owners who have so often failed the industry in the past. We believe that the best future for the industry is in public ownership and that is why we oppose the Bill and will vote against Third Reading.

8.56 pm

Mr. William Powell: I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary on successfully piloting the Bill through Second Reading, the Standing Committee, of which I was privileged to be a member, Report and Third Reading. The Bill is of considerable importance to the country and will enable the British Steel Corporation to operate without the shackles that the state has so often imposed upon it.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) talked about private ownership being a disaster for the steel companies in the old days. Those of us who served on the Standing Committee will never forget the speech of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) in moving the first of his amendments. I am delighted to see that he is in the Chamber. The hon. Member moved a number of amendments and always made interesting contributions to our proceedings. However, none of his contributions was more interesting than the speech he made on the first set of amendments he proposed. The hon. Gentleman has experience in such matters and he talked about the relationship that existed between the chairman of the British Steel Corporation and Labour Governments of which he was a member or with which he was closely associated.

[Mr. William Powell]

I invite all hon. Members and members of the public to read our proceedings and I should like them to refer particularly to the proceedings in Committee. They should look closely at the speech of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South because it was a seminal speech. It set out the reasons why nationalisation and the relationship between Ministers and the BSC was so disastrous both for Ministers and the corporation. It explained why it is necessary that Parliament should pass a measure that will mean that such things will never occur again. I am fully aware that the hon. Gentleman thought that he was advancing a case in favour of public ownership, but no Conservative Member who heard his remarks will have identified them as anything other than a classic illustration of the reasons why nationalisation has been a disaster for the British Steel Corporation. The Bill will end that once and for all.

I have the privilege to represent a constituency which still has a residual steel interest. My constituents remember with nostalgia the days of Stewart and Lloyd, whose operations in Corby made a profit every year. They are less impressed by the fact that British Steel's operations in Corby have made a loss every year since nationalisation. They recall—how could they ever forget?—that the coupling of Stewart and Lloyd's tube works with the British Steel Corporation led to industrial catastrophe in the late 1970s.

Lest Opposition Members feel that restructuring in the steel industry occurred under a wicked Conservative Government, I remind them that the important day for Corby was 3 March 1979—some two months before the general election that brought this Government to power. It was on 3 March 1979 that British Steel announced that it would close the Corby steelworks. Restructuring has taken place under Conservative and Labour Governments alike.

I do not accept Opposition Members' contention that private ownership has been a disaster for the steel industry —far from it. Private ownership worked, and worked well, in Corby and in many other places. I am certain that when British Steel is privatised, its work force—in Corby or elsewhere—and its shareholders will find that it works much more successfully than it has with the intervention and interference that have been such disfiguring features of nationalisation.

I welcome the Bill, and my constituents will welcome it. I have listened with interest to the Opposition's case against privatisation. I have fought two general elections in a steel constituency—one of them less than a year ago. I never sought to hide the fact that I was in favour of privatisation. Privatisation was not a great issue between my Labour opponent and myself a year ago, although my opponent was a distinguished and popular official of the ISTC. We did not argue about the merits of privatisation. There was considerable discussion of the terms for British Steel pensioners after privatisation—and quite right too. There was considerable concern to ensure that those who work in the industry are given the best possible opportunity to acquire a stake in the industry—and quite right too. However, the fundamental question whether the industry should be in the public or the private sector was not a matter of great party political controversy in my constituency.

I respect the fact that Opposition Members, the ISTC and other unions would prefer the industry to remain in state hands. Nevertheless, I am in no doubt that under the Bill the future prosperity of those who work in the industry will be more assured than it could ever be in the state sector where it would be dependent on all the factors that govern state financing and the public purse.

As I said, I welcome the Bill and I wish it fair speed. I hope that it will receive substantial approbation in another place. All being well, it will reach the statute book before the summer recess and in a few months the steel industry will be returned to the private sector, like so many other industries and with the same success. There is nothing to fear and everything to look forward to in that prospect. The industry can continue to build on the restructuring on which Ministers have insisted in the past few years. With a tried and trusted leadership and an experienced work force, knowing that it has a good future, the prospects for British Steel have never been better.

9.3 pm

Mr. Foot: I may have caused the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster some inconvenience by intervening on a point of order in his speech. I do not necessarily apologise for that, but I should like him to appreciate my excellent reasons for doing so, it seemed to me that he thought that he was appearing on the "Newsnight" programme rather than in the House of Commons, and I thought it courteous to draw his attention to that misapprehension. It is not because I dislike him in any sense, either in the House of Commons or on television. I prefer him to some of his colleagues—particularly the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit). I do not want to pay the right hon. and learned Member any reckless compliments, but I much prefer him to his right hon. Friend.

I return to that part of the Chancellor of the Duchy's speech that was in order. He referred to the achievement of the steel industry, and he was right to do so. It was one of the factors that led to the presentation of the Bill. On the figures given in recent months, there have been considerable achievements at the British Steel Corporation. Sir Robert Scholey deserves considerable credit for that; he should have been appointed to his current position some time ago, because he was doing most of the real work. He has had the assistance of those who have been prepared to confront the industry's appallingly difficult transformation, which has imposed huge burdens upon the communities involved, such as my own. It is because we in the steel communities know the difference between public and private ownership that we are so bitterly opposed to the Bill, despite the industry's achievements over recent months.

Those considerable achievements would not have been possible, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) so skilfully underlined in his speech, had it not been for the different forms of investment, the greater foresight and the long-term planning which public ownership offers an industry such as steel. I can cite my own constituency by way of illustration. Had it not been for the £70 million or £80 million invested in the tin plate and finishing plant in Ebbw Vale in 1978 and 1979, it would not have had the slightest chance of surviving into the late 1980s as it has done. I hope that it will carry on for the next 10 or 20 years.

That investment would not have been made—I am certain that the same applies to Ravenscraig and to other places—and carried through, partly under a Labour Government and partly under their successors, at a time when many European steel industries were being knocked out altogether, had it been in private ownership. Yet that investment allowed it to survive and has enabled the Chancellor of the Duchy to talk about a prosperous steel industry.

It was not only that long-term investment which was important to the steel industry. There was all the accompanying investment necessary to carry through the change from the older industries to the new. It is false to make the charge sometimes made against the Labour party, that it was not in favour of those changes. We understood that they were needed in many areas, such as Corby and Ebbw Vale. However, we said that the pace of that change should be one that the communities involved could absorb, and that the rundown should be accompanied by the introduction of new industries in a planned way. I will not say that we carried out that philosophy perfectly, but we undertook it on an intelligent and planned basis, whereby the steel industry itself provided special investment in many of the new industries introduced into those areas.

The Labour Government invented the British industries enterprise scheme. We introduced it as part of the effort to ensure that the rundown of the steel industry should go forward only as we were bringing in new industries. It was all part of our scheme to ensure that the balance was kept and that we should not be thrust through such a change with 25 per cent. unemployment, which is what we have had since 1979-80. It is bad enough to have to try to carry through a change on that scale with the 5, 7 and even 12 per cent. unemployment that existed before 1980, but there is a considerable difference between carrying out such a process on the basis of 12 per cent. unemployment and doing so on the basis of 20 or 25 per cent. unemployment, which is what we have had ever since 1979-80.

We had a much better idea of how the change should be carried through. Part of it was that the money allocated to the steel industry, and part of the investment programme, should be accorded to the planning. I remember Mr. MacGregor coming in with all his brilliance and foresight and saying, "We cannot have anything to do with this. It is not the Government's business to provide the other industries. We must concentrate solely on the market." That was the only test that he was able to provide. We stopped him doing it then, and even the present Government stopped him applying the same doctrines to the coal industry a little later. He did enough damage in many other directions, but we checked much of the damage at that time.

If the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had studied these matters a little more carefully, he would never have brought forward a Bill which does not take into account all the other aspects of the effect on the steel communities and the communities that still have to carry through many of these changes. We will oppose the Bill bitterly and will vote against it, which will not surprise the right hon. and learned Gentleman. When a new Labour Government come in—which I trust will happen very soon—one of their major objectives will be, I am sure, to restore to our communities which have been so ravaged by the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his friends the compassionate, intelligent, long-term planning that only public ownership can provide in such great industries.

9.12 pm

Mr. Fallon: First, let me clear up the misapprehension on the Opposition Benches that the contents of the Bill were not foreshadowed in the Conservative manifesto. The quotation from the manifesto—I am trying to help my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy—runs as follows:

> "We will privatise more state industries in ways that increase share-ownership, both for the employees and for the public at large."

Let there be no doubt on Conservative Benches that the Bill is fully consistent with the aims of our manifesto. I know that my right hon. and learned Friend prides himself on being on the more radical wing of our party, and he may think that he is in advance of that manifesto, but the plain fact is that the proposals to privatise British Steel are fully consistent with our manifesto and do not result from any last-minute decision during the autumn.

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to the hon. Minister—[Laughter.] I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman—he may well become a Minister. As he seems so much more familiar with the hidden meaning of the opaque words that he has just read out, perhaps he could enlighten us on what other specific industries not yet mentioned in any Queen's Speech, or figuring in any legislation, that form of words now covers. Clearly, he can enlighten his right hon. and hon. Friends on his own Front Bench as well as the rest of the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have allowed every hon. Member a preamble, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman, if he is going to respond, will do so briefly.

Mr. Fallon: The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) will have observed—certainly, he will have done so by 10 pm—that the number of state industries is diminishing. All that I will say is that it ought to be further diminished.

We are now reaching the end of Report and Third Reading, and I feel that we are entitled to wonder yet again at the generosity of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House in allocating two full days to the Report stage. I appreciate that there may have been some embarrassment on the Opposition Benches about the meagre part played by Opposition Members in Committee, as a result of which we have had to stretch out the proceedings over two days. Barely half a dozen Opposition Members have been present and they have presented a string of muddled and inconsistent amendments.

Opposition Members said, first, that they opposed privatisation. Then they tabled an amendment calling for a Celtic steel company comprising the Ravenscraig and Welsh plants. They then complained that the British Steel Corporation would be a monopoly, yet, a few hours later, they moved an amendment requesting that it be protected from competition and takeover. They then said that there was no demand for shares, yet, a few hours ago, they moved an amendment suggesting that one third of all the shares should be given, in trust, to the work force. That is a wholly inconsistent and muddled approach.

[Mr. Fallon]

I do not want to labour the Labour party policy, because that would stretch the rules of order on Third Reading. This is not simply a debate between the Front and Back Benches. The steel workers in my constituency will study the Bill carefully when it is passed. The first question that will occur to them is what will happen to the Act if a Labour Government ever come to power again. Will it be repealed? What will be the policy of an incoming Labour Government? I appreciate the difficulties of the hon. Member for Dagenham in completing his series of speeches, listening to the New Zealand Minister for Finance and working on his economic review, but he owes it to the steel workers in my constituency to leave them in no doubt that the industry will not be renationalised if a Labour Government come to power.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) well illustrated, the BSC work force is now in much better shape than Her Majesty's Opposition. The work force understands the requirements and is looking forward to being a great private British company.

There will be no greater welcome for the change than on Teesside. It should not be forgotten that many of the steel plants are in areas of high unemployment and assisted areas in Scotland, Wales and the north. For far too long, those areas have depended on the decisions taken by politicians in London which have then been overruled by Treasury Ministers or civil servants. Why should not people in those areas and working in those industries have the same freedom and opportunities to progress, to manage their businesses and to make a success of those industries, free from bureaucracy and control?

The Bill is part of that process, and clauses 1 and 10 have implications for a company in my constituency, which is a perfect illustration of why the corporation should now pass into private ownership. Darlington and Simpson rolling mills is a major company, half owned by British Steel and half owned by Norcros, a company that enjoys the benevolent chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood).

That half-and-half ownership means that all the key decisions on investment, management, exploring new markets and developing new technologies have to be referred to two different owners and two different managements. It is impossible for the management and work force of that company to be in charge of their own destiny. When the Bill is enacted, that company will be free to build up its own sales, to explore new markets and to develop new technologies without being partly answerable to state bureaucrats in London.

The Bill is important for the regions and, above all, for our economy and for those who work in the steel industry. Had I been told even in 1983 that within five years the BSC would be passing on to the open market I might have had my doubts. It is an enormous achievement. It is a testimony to the strength of the economy, the strength of our commitment to free enterprise, and above all, to the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department for enterprise, that in a single parliamentary Session, with the passage of the Bill, the BSC will join parts of British Shipbuilders and the Rover Group in the market sector. Places that we thought were trapped for ever in the dependency culture—Longbridge, Govan and Ravenscraig—will now be free-standing parts of successful companies.

It is an achievement not only for Ministers, but, above all, for the work force. The BSC work force made the transformation possible. The improvements that it has succeeded in making in productivity and performance, the necessary job losses that it had to accept and its commitment and enthusiasm are the best possible guarantee of the success of the sale of this corporation.

Conservative Members salute that achievement in passing the Bill. It is a crying shame that Opposition Members cannot likewise salute our British steelworkers.

9.20 pm

Mr. Hardy: The Treasury Bench will be grateful to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), but I do not know whether the steel workers of Darlington will be. The hon. Gentleman told the House what he would say to them, and he asked us what we would say to our constituents who may be adversely affected by this measure.

I wonder whether he will tell his steelworkers—I shall certainly tell mine—that the Bill offers serious disadvantages to them and perhaps to Britain. For example, the Bill's horizon is five years and there is no certainty beyond that. There is no certainty about investment, or the future of research and development or ownership. The hon. Gentleman may be happy to see others come and buy his steelworks and make his workers dependent on those who may not have this country's interests at heart, but we are certainly not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) and I are anxious about the future of United Engineering Steels' Rotherham works. I recall, as my hon. Friend, who was then the mayor, will recall, the considerable demonstration of co-operation between management and workers when we set up the Thrybergh bar mill and broke world records, which are still held, for production and the speed of commissioning. That was not achieved because we had some peculiar owner who was not even identifiable. It was done because workers and management together recognised that they could make a substantial contribution to the national interest. Where will that motivation be when this Bill becomes law and the BSC has been privatised?

The hon. Gentleman may feel that he is doing the workers a favour by offering them £70-worth of shares free. My workers in the Thrybergh bar mill in Aldwarke and those working in Concast in my hon. Friend's constituency would prefer to know that investment would continue and be aware that management would be responsible to them and the nation rather than to some foreign interest which may not even want the British steel industry to survive. That fear may well not be compensated for by £70 of free shares.

Ministers have sought to distract our attention by asking what the Labour party policy is. I hope that it will continue to be a commitment to ensure that the United Kingdom creates wealth. That must be the priority of my party. That aim has been sadly neglected throughout the 1980s. The Government and the Conservative party have been eager not to give priority to the creation of wealth, but to give rewards and recognition to those who shift money about. In my area, we do not have much money to shift about.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), who was smiling a moment ago when I referred to the need to create wealth, may be seeking in his way to undermine the capacity of areas like mine to maintain their wealth. I notice that he removed himself rapidly from a steel constituency at the general election. His footwork may be admirable, like that of many other practising politicians on the Conservative Benches, but the commitment and wisdom which they have revealed, and continue to reveal in the Bill, will ensure that the steelworkers in their constituencies, or in his case in the constituencies nearby, will realise that the Government have no commitment to Britain, to wealth, to markets, to research and development or to ownership and very little commitment to anything which we regard as a necessary long-term consideration of this essential industry.

9.25 pm

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), I served as a member of the Standing Committee and I add my congratulations to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and to the Under-Secretary of State for guiding the Bill through Second Reading, Committee and now Third Reading.

It was an interesting Committee to take part in, not just because there were many occasions on which a new Member like myself could observe how Opposition Members tested the Chairman's patience as to how far they could extend the elasticity of the remit of the matter under debate.

Another interesting aspect was that a high proportion, if not 100 per cent., of the New Zealand contingent of the British parliamentary Labour party were members of the Committee. In the light of the recent speech of the Finance Minister for New Zealand, and because of the general drift of the policies of the Labour Government of New Zealand over the past few years, throughout the Committee we hoped that part of the enlightenment which has got through to the Socialist Administration in New Zealand would reach the heads of the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen. Alas, we still wait.

Mr. Michael Brown: I can give my hon. Friend some help. There is a rumour that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who entertained us well in Committee, is about to go to New Zealand. Perhaps he will find out how things should be done and come back with the correct solution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Every hon. Member has been allowed a little preamble, but I remind the House that we are dealing with the Third Reading of the British Steel Bill in the United Kingdom, not with anything in New Zealand.

Mr. Janman: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) for his intervention. I hope that when the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) comes back he will reflect on the statement which he made in the House last night, that the Opposition remained totally opposed to denationalisation of the British steel industry. If the Opposition are honest with themselves, with us and with the country, they should continue to make it clear that in their gut they are still totally committed to nationalisation of the key core industries. Because they know that the vast majority of the electorate understand that nationalisation has been a recipe for complete economic failure, they dress it up with fancy terminology to try to hide from the electorate the fundamentals of their industrial policies.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing rose——

Mr. Janman: I will not give way, because time is short and other hon. Members wish to speak.

It is not the Government who are ideological. We believe in the natural way of doing things. The use of economic resources should be dictated by customers, investors, shareholders and the people who manage industry in recognition of the competitive forces and the profit motive that guide them. We are not the party that is ideological. We do not believe that these key industries should be run by politicians and bureaucrats, with decisions being made for short-term political gain rather than long-term economic considerations and prosperity.

The point has often been made in this debate that in some ways the steel industry is different: it is a large industry; it is too big for the private sector to run it efficiently and effectively. What drivel. Many industries throughout the world have major private companies within them and they are being run very successfully—for example, the aircraft, motor vehicle, and computer industries. There are British examples in all those industries.

I welcome the Bill and add my support to it. It will enable the British Steel Corporation to be added to the long list of privatisation successes that this Government have to their name. The quicker that privatisation takes place, the better.

9.30 pm

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on Third Reading. I apologise to the House for the fact that I was not able yesterday to attend the first day of the Report stage as I was recovering from an illness. I have listened with interest to some of the comments made on Third Reading. I am concerned that there appears to have been little movement by the Government on the future of the steel industry since Second Reading.

The Government claim that they are listening to the views of the population, but it seems that in this case they have not listened very carefully, and certainly have not been seen to act. There is little recognition of the significance of the steel industry, not just in Scotland, but throughout the United Kingdom economy. Although I speak from a Scottish perspective, I understand the significance of the steel industry to many hon. Members' constituencies in England and Wales. I have listened to their views with respect.

There is a symbolism about the steel industry which is perhaps difficult for many people to take on board. Symbolism may be something which many people do not accept should be argued in the House. However, the symbolism of British Steel is something that we should understand. If the Prime Minister talks of particular items of legislation as being flagships, she is talking in symbolic terms. When we talk about this industry, why cannot we place a similar emphasis on the symbolism of it to many parts of the United Kingdom?

[Mrs. Margaret Ewing]

I do not speak as a sycophantic follower of the idea of public ownership. My party has always stood for a combination of private and public ownership. Over the years, when there has been nationalisation and centralisation of various public assets within the United Kingdom, too often they have been at the expense of places such as Scotland, Wales or the north of England.

We are seeing almost the reverse of that coin in the privatisation of the steel industry, when I believe we shall see a continuation of centralisation. There is little doubt in my mind that privatisation will mean that the steel industry will fall into the hands of the people with money in this country—the people in the south-east of England. After all, that is the money centre of the economic world. The Government are more concerned with profits than with people. But we are talking about the future of the people employed in the steel industry.

I have not heard throughout the Second Reading, Committee, Report or Third Reading stages anything from the Government that convinces me that the interests of the people working in the steel industry are being taken to their heart. We are almost playing a Monopoly game, where the Government are saying to the workers in the steel industry, "This is a Monopoly game. Do not pass go; do not collect your shares; go directly to the unemployment benefits office." That is not the sort of message that should come from this House. Many people who work in the steel industry fear that the privatisation of the industry will mean further unemployment. We heard earlier that 134,000 people have been made redundant in the steel industry since 1979. How many more people's jobs will be lost as a result of this legislation?

In all seriousness, I advise Conservative Members to remember what happened in the wake of the closure of Gartcosh in Lanarkshire. One of the more senior members of their party, a former chairman of their parliamentary candidates committee, resigned. He was also the proponent of the idea that Conservative policies should be expounded more seriously and effectively in Scotland. However, he resigned because of the closure of the Gartcosh steel works. That man was Iain Lawson who, together with the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and many other people, walked to Downing street to argue against the closure of Gartcosh.

The kind of arguments that have been put forward by Conservative Members during the passage of this legislation will ensure not only that people of the calibre of Iain Lawson will resign from the Conservative party and join the Scottish National party, but that the Conservative party will not revive in Scotland. I am sure that the hon. Members for Motherwell, North and for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), who have spoken so eloquently in all the stages of this legislation, have echoed the sentiments of many people in Scotland that the Conservative Government are not holding out any hope for the steel industry in Scotland.

As I have said, I am not taking a sycophantic approach to the idea of public ownership. However, I believe that the steel industry in Scotland did have a future in public ownership and that, by putting it into private ownership, the Government are tolling its death knell. For that reason, my colleagues and I will vote against the privatisation of the industry and against the Bill because we have heard nothing in the last few months to give us any confidence that the Government are holding out hope for people in the Scottish steel industry.

9.37 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): It is important that hon. Members remind themselves that before the Conservative Government came to power there was no hope for the continuation of the British steel industry. The industry was uncompetitive. It took about seven man days for every tonne of steel produced, compared with three man days for South Korea and Japan. People who sought to win competitive orders from around the world sought to buy their steel from British Steel. They asked British Steel to sharpen its pencils and get the price right so that they could buy from it, only to find that British Steel could never match the prices that could be obtained abroad.

British Steel was on a slippery slope. The taxpayers were, if I remember correctly, putting about £600 million a year into the steel industry in subsidies. That was unfair to the private steel industry, which was having to compete against the subsidised national steel industry.

As a commercial director, I have personal experience of trying to buy many thousands of tonnes of steel from British Steel. I wished to place my orders with British Steel, but I found that it could not match foreign prices. I had to win international contracts abroad against fierce international bids. We won those contracts, but we had to get the steel at the right price to meet the bid price with which we had won the contract. Until Mr. MacGregor was appointed and sorted out the steel industry, British Steel had no hope of survival.

I remember the day when we voted £75 million to help soften the blow of redundancies and to enable proper entitlements and rewards to be given to those who had lost their jobs. We could not afford to have overmanning and restrictive practices, because they would not allow us to compete with the rest of the world.

Opposition Members have short memories. When I first became a Member of this place I remember that the Chamber was packed when there was a steel debate. On those occasions the Opposition Benches were full. Since then the credit of Opposition Members has been lowered and we have only a handful of Opposition Members in their places for this important debate.

I want to be fair to the Opposition because they have the next business and I am aware that if I detain the House I shall be losing them precious time. I wish to be brief, but the clear message must be issued that if it had not been for a Conservative Government there would have been no hope for our steel industry. The industry now has a rosy future. There is staff security, and steel is being delivered at the right quality and standard and at the right price. That is accompanied by a good after-sales service. All these elements are now right because a Conservative Government came to power and had the guts to ensure that the industry was sorted out. It has been sorted out to such advantage that it is ready for privatisation. Let there be some entrepreneurs and risk takers moving into British Steel. Let us give the workers a better future, along with the industry and the country, by voting for the Third Reading.

9.42 pm

Mr. Bell: It is always a pleasure to be called to speak after the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), a future Prime Minister, has spoken. I shall follow with great interest the hon. Gentleman's career over the next few years.

It is right that the authentic voice of Teesside should be heard this evening. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) represents the authentic voice of Durham. I want the authentic voice of Teesside and Middlesbrough to be heard so as to echo the roar from Ayresome park as the play-off takes place for the first division. As extra time is being played in Middlesbrough, so we come to the final in our debates on the Bill.

We have had an interesting debate, but it seems that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Conservative Back Benchers wish to speak about Opposition policies and how the Opposition will run the economy when we come to power rather than direct attention to the real reason behind the Bill. Although we have not had it explained to us by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster or Conservative Back Benchers, the Bill is before us so that the Government can secure another £2,000 million to assist the British economy and to keep the public sector borrowing requirement in credit rather than deficit. The Government have announced tonight that the PSBR is £925 million in credit, and their rush to get the Bill on the statute book reflects their desire to obtain another £2,000 million next year so that the books can be balanced.

I am reminded of the occasion when ICI's Sir John Harvey-Jones came to Middlesbrough when a local bank opened a new branch. When I asked, "What are you doing here?" he said, "I am here for the same reason as you, except that my overdraft is bigger." The British Government run no overdraft and ICI has an overdraft of about £5,000 million. A successful company is prepared to borrow to invest in its future, but the Government sell their assets and the shares of the British people to make money for those in the City, not for those who invest in industry on Teesside.

People on Teesside are interested in the Bill. The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) said that during the last election there was no discussion about the privatisation of the steel industry except for pension rights, but there is deep concern and anxiety on Teesside about the consequences of privatisation.

I remember going to the United States many years ago and seeing what had happened to the steel town of Birmingham, Alabama and the steel towns of Pennsylvania. There was no investment by the state, and the steel industry was left to run its own affairs as a private industry. Japanese competition came in and laid low those steel towns, decimating the industry and making thousands unemployed.

The hon. Member for Darlington referred to the possibility of greater private sector participation in steel in Darlington, but my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) asked what would happen if the growth did not come about. Steel is a cyclical industry, and there would certainly be more redundancies. What will happen if a multinational firm buys this global outpost in Darlington and decides to close it down when the next recession arrives?

It is not true that people in the steel industry are asking what a future Labour Government will do; they are asking how they will fare under privatisation. What will happen when the investment does not come? What will happen to their jobs, their investment in their work and their future? Those are the questions being asked on Teesside and such concerns were never alleviated in Committee, when we never had a straight answer to a straight question from a Minister. Ministers read the briefs that had been prepared for them but made no positive statements to explain, highlight or illuminate the contents of the Bill.

I associate myself with the Opposition Front Bench. We shall oppose the Bill and bring forward our own common ownership proposals at the next general election. We shall see how our industries should be governed and run when the European single market arrives. We shall examine the future with some reflection and certitude and put people in the industry first, not the City slickers who are waiting for the shares to come on the market.

9.47 pm

Mr. Morley: Tonight we have heard no justification for selling British Steel, because British Steel stands wholly justified as it is. If it is compared with any private steel company in Europe or the rest of the world, it can be seen to be out-performing them. It is making more profit and is more productive than any of its rivals. How can Conservative Members argue that public ownership has been a failure, when the BSC is a monument to the success of public ownership? It is so because it was given the investment that it needed.

The reward for people who work in the BSC is a patronising pat on the head to show them how well they have done and a tip of £70 as they are shown the door to an uncertain future. While it remains in public ownership, the BSC has a guaranteed future, and so do the people who work in it. The supply of steel to our industry is guaranteed, as is long-term planning for industry. Now we are faced with uncertainty.

No Conservative Member can give any guarantee that the BSC will prosper as a privatised company. That is the BSC's reward for reaching profitability. Why throw it all away? It is wrong for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to dismiss the £5 billion that have gone into British Steel as money that is to be forgotten and cannot be recovered. While the BSC remained in public ownership, that money would have been recovered because the taxpayers would have received the return on their investment that has been wiped out by the Government.

The case for public ownership has been proved and the Government have failed to make their case for throwing the industry into uncertainty. I point out to the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) that the argument about privatisation was very much an issue in my election. That is why Scunthorpe has a Labour Member of Parliament after eight years of Tory control. The people of Scunthorpe saw a Labour Member of Parliament as more likely to protect their interests and their future. They are not wrong and I am glad to be here arguing to protect their long-term interests because the Government do not care.

9.50 pm

Mr. Morgan: Conservative Members have presented us with a series of wondrous paradoxes. There has been an almost obsessive interest not in the purpose of the Bill but in what the response of the Opposition will be at the next election. Conservative Members seem to have invented a new principle. They seem to say that, since they did not put this measure in their manifesto, they have a right to claim that we must put some measure about steel in our next manifesto.

The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said that in the steelworks in his constituency, the Darlington and Simpson rolling mills, one of the consequences of privatisation will be that his steelworkers will be able to govern themselves up north and will no longer have to refer to an overweight corporate bureaucracy in London. He told us that a 50 per cent. share in the Darlington and Simpson rolling mills was owned by Norcros. He also told us with great pride that the chairman of Norcros is the hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood). When his steelworking employees want to see their chairman and do not want to see anybody from an overweight bureaucracy down south, they will merely have to come to London. In between his demanding duties as an hon. Member and his duties for Rothschilds, the hon. Member for Wokingham may be able to spare five minutes of his time. That is a wonderful example of UDI for the north of England.

We had a wonderful last-minute intervention by the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens). He was not seen in the earlier part of the debate and was not in the Committee, but he wanted to demonstrate his expertise in how to make corporate bodies lean and hungry. His eagerness to do that was more than I am prepared to speculate.

Mr. Dickens: I have a great affection for the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), particularly as he gave way. The hon. Gentleman mentioned his hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) but I think that he meant my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) I would not like to steer the hon. Gentleman in the wrong direction.

Mr. Morgan: The right hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) sits on the Government side and my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) normally sits behind me and I was perfectly clear on identity.

The Chancellor's speech was the most paradoxical of all the speeches about the purpose of the Bill. He said that its purpose is to stop politicians interfering incompetently in the industry. We realise what he meant and it was perfectly clear from his speech that he takes no interest in this industry. The Fe content of his speech was about 30 per cent. He attempted, as all good lawyers do when they have a lousy case, to use the ad hominem argument. He simply attacked the Opposition and attempted to demonstrate his new-found desire to be the Vinny Jones of the Government Front Bench.

The Minister spoke about the steel industry for about one third of the time. It is obvious from that that the Government are not interested in the steel industry. They are saying that they will be happy to get rid of it now and that it bores them. They do not want to know about it and if they can get any kind of return for it they will get shot of it. They say that, even though it was not in the Queen's Speech or in the manifesto, they want to get rid of it now. They are saying that the industry does not interest them in the long, short or medium term.

Dr. Reid: As my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) has said, we have seen some extraordinary spectacles in the debate. When the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) rose I assumed that a witches' coven had been formed at Ravenscraig, because I do not remember him making a contribution or showing an interest at any earlier stages in the steel debate.

An even greater revelation was the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), who attempted to shroud his support for the Bill in calls for decentralisation, devolution and at one stage workers' participation. He stopped just short of all power to the Soviets. None of those reasons will be accepted by the Opposition as the real reason for the Bill. No reason at all for it was to be found in the Minister's speech. I was looking for a word to describe the Minister's speech. "Vacuous" sprung to mind, but I thought it was a little too substantial. There was nothing in that speech to justify privatisation of steel, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West said, the Minister spent three quarters of his speech searching for solutions to the future problems of the industry by demanding answers from my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould).

The Minister claimed that the Bill was well thought out, despite the fact that he did not know how the company was to be floated, when it was to be floated, what price would be asked or to whom it was to be sold. The process of the enabling Bill was described by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham as a mystery. That was a gross understatement. The Bill fulfils every criterion of Churchill's definition of the Soviet Union. It is a mystery within an enigma, wrapped up in a riddle. That applies to both the reasons and the process for the sale of British Steel.

The Minister told us that there was no write-off of debt, but a trading loss; but no write-down of the taxpayers' capital, but a restructuring. I thank the Minister for his advice. Tomorrow morning, I will phone up the hire purchase company to say that I do not have a debt, I merely have a continuing trading loss and I shall discuss with my bank manager the fact that I would like a restructuring of my mortgage to ensure that it is written off.

A more simple and straightforward word was used earlier. The Bill is a swindle. It represents half the public dividend capital value, a write-off of debts and a snub to the taxpayer. It is the product of prejudice and dogma, not of good, long-term policy thinking. It was not in the manifesto or in the Queen's Speech. The only justification for it was the Minister quoting a colleague saying, "At some stage, somebody once said it."

We also had the offer that one phrase in the Queen's Speech refers to "other measures". As far as we can make out, that would justify the declaration of war tomorrow by the Government, on the basis that it was in the Queen's Speech. The Bill is the Government's responsibility. They have refused every amendment. Should the predictions about Ravenscraig or the steelworks in Lanarkshire come true, the responsibility will rest fairly and squarely on the Government.

9.57 pm

Dr. Bray: In their different ways, both sides of the House want to be rid of the Bill, but it has some lessons for us. We need to give more attention to monopoly and competition policy and their effect on jobs and output as well as on profit. For the industry, the lessons are that it needs to give continuing attention to the rapid changes that are still taking place in the market, technology and the national and international economic environment and, above all, to give more attention to its people and the communities in which it lives.

The Minister and the House need to give more attention to our relations generally with the industry. It is a misapprehension to suppose that the mere act of privatisation discontinues that relationship. It is like supposing that a floating exchange rate abolishes foreigners. Even if the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster shuts his door, his eyes and his ears, he will find that the chairman of BSC and his successors will come along to knock on his door about a dozen issues. This will not be the last steel Bill that comes to the House. Whatever the results of the next election, if only to win another 22 years before the next major steel Bill, I urge the House to reject the Bill.

9.58 pm

Mr. Atkins: We have had an interesting debate, and I suspect that the House will not wish me to detain it for long. I am rather sad that one of the Opposition Members who participated at some length in our Committee debates —the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)— cannot be here today. I am sure that he has a good reason for that. He would have enlivened the Third Reading debate in the way that he enlivened the Committee debates, largely by the number of fairy stories with which he regaled us. Members of the Committee may recall and the House may be interested to know about Godzilla and about the bardic steamroller to which he referred. That just about sums up the quality of the debate offered by the Opposition.

We have heard from the Motherwell mafia, the hon. Members for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) and for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), the harbingers of doom who last night, finding themselves pushed to a Division by the SNP, had to abstain on their own amendment. Such is the commitment and the concern about the so-called controversial issue. We heard about capitalism and labour from the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell)—

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That at this day's sitting, the British Steel Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Ryder.]

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Mr. Atkins: We also heard from the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) about the designer Socialism which he is seeking to create for the Labour party. In the context of the debate on the enabling Bill for the British Steel Corporation, he did not tell us exactly what the Labour party will do for the future. We have had to admire him, because he has talked about everything except the issue. We have not heard whether the Labour party will renationalise the BSC, and the House is aware of that fact. [HON. MEMBERS: "Long speech."] If Opposition Members seek to provoke me, I could refer to a great deal more. Since they well know that their prayer follows this debate and that Scottish Labour Members have delayed my winding up, they had better be very careful.

There were interventions from my hon. Friends the Members for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) and for Corby (Mr. Powell), both of whom know what they are talking about —one was a member of the Committee, and the other represents a constituency which contains a steel-processing plant. Conservative Members will agree that their contributions were a succinct summary of why we believe that the Bill is the right way to go.

Above all, the speech that sums up the Opposition was from the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), an extremely distinguished Member. At least we know where we stand with him. The traditional view of old-fashioned Socialism rules supreme. Nothing changes; steel must always be nationalised and must be in public ownership. However, as hon. Members will remember, steel had its problems in his day. Does the right hon. Gentleman not remember the closures at Ebbw Vale when he was Secretary of State for Employment which made him somewhat unpopular because of the difficulties faced by the steel industry at that time?

Steel has had its difficulties in public ownership and doubtless will in future. However, we have brought the Bill to the House, we have been through Committee and have reached Third Reading, because we believe that the future is very bright indeed.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Just before my hon. Friend finishes, does he agree that the Bill will be extremely good for regions such as mine in the north-east, because it will give the competitive management on Teesside a great deal more scope for its imagination in the years to come, and provide wider share ownership in a region which needs further encouragement for enterprise and weaning from the bosom of the state?

Mr. Atkins: Like my other hon. Friends, my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) makes his point extremely well.

We look to the future and seek to give British Steel the means to secure lasting success for itself, for employees and for shareholders, and in so doing to contribute to the national interest. The company must have the freedom to make rapid decisions and to adapt to a changing market. I am confident that, as a private sector company, British Steel will do the nation proud. The Bill marks the first step in the privatisation process, and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Community Charge (Students)

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the prayer on community charges in Scotland. I remind the House before we start that the debate must end at 11.30 pm, and there is great pressure to take part. May I ask for brief contributions from both the Back Benches and the Front Benches.

10.19 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Personal Community Charge (Students) (Scotland) Regulations 1988 (S.I., 1988, No. 632), dated 28th March 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 30th March, be annulled.

These are deceptively simple regulations, which define the categories of students who will qualify for a poll tax rebate. They do, however, raise many questions and problems which I believe will haunt those collecting the tax for many a long year.

First, there is the problem of how to define students. The regulations set out to try. We are told that a student is someone who is studying at an educational establishment and attends it for 24 weeks or more during the year, or someone who is studying at a further education or teacher training college and working there for 21 hours in the week, again for a minimum period of 24 weeks.

The first general question that I must ask the Minister is whether he is satisfied that those definitions are precise and comprehensive. Perhaps, when he is addressing himself to that, he will tell us whether students on sandwich courses are likely to be treated differently. After all, many students on this kind of course meet the requisite number of weeks, but only if we include the practical placements which are an integral part of their qualification, and many of those are not within the normal academic year. That seems to raise substantial problems of definition.

Then is the problem of foundation courses. I have experience of this in my own family. People go for two years to an institution, but the only qualification that they obtain is the right to enter a degree course. They do not get any qualification per se. It is not clear to me, at least, that they will be entitled to the rebate.

There is also the problem of bridging courses. There may be a relatively short course when someone is converting from one discipline to another. When that is completed, there is an automatic right to proceed to the second course. It is not clear whether that is taken as a complete entity, and whether the person will be covered by the definition.

I should also like the Minister to say a word or two about non-degree courses. We are told very precisely in regulation 3(a)(iii) that those people will have to undertake a period of study averaging at least 21 hours a week. I stress the words "of study". I should like to know whether that includes placements which are part of, for example, a social work or teacher training course, or indeed a sandwich course. How is it compatible with 3(c), which seems to contradict and run counter to it?

Having looked at the schedule, I believe that there may be difficulties, particularly in regard to further education, for people following, for instance, hairdressing or secretarial courses. I am not entirely satisfied—perhaps the Minister can reassure me—that they are all covered. He might also deal with the question of nursery nurses and English courses for overseas students. Overseas students will have to pay the poll tax even if they are not on the present electoral register. There is a ragged fringe around the edge of the definitions which may well cause problems.

I also ask the Minister to calculate, or give an estimate of, how many students in Scotland are likely to qualify for a rebate. A parliamentary question some time ago suggested around 70,000.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): At this early stage in the debate it might be helpful to point out that we are not talking about rebates; we are talking about exemptions.

Mr. Dewar: That is a nice semantic point. As I understood it, we are talking about the 80 per cent.——

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): It is automatic rebate.

Mr. Dewar: I called it a rebate. I take the point. I mean the reduction in the poll tax charge to 70 per cent. I am asking the Minister how many students in Scotland are likely to qualify. Is the figure 70,000—which I think was mentioned earlier—or 100,000, as the National Union of Students has suggested?

I also ask the Minister to say a word or two about the impact on local government. Obviously, if a local authority is losing 80 per cent. of the poll tax that would normally be paid by an adult, in the case of students there is a substantial loss.

As I understand it, it was originally intended that students would pay the full poll tax and a compensatory award would be made to them. I appreciate the benefits of the approach that has now been adopted, but what guarantees are there for local authorities? An amendment was tabled in Committee in the other place by Lord Ross of Marnock. The then Minister, Lord Glenarthur, said that the point would be taken into account in setting the rate support grant. That is the equivalent of, "Your cheque is in the post," and will inspire no confidence among Scottish local authorities. I calculate that the sum involved is likely to be about £25 million, or about 1 per cent. of RSG. The Minister should give an assurance that that will be properly covered when the calculations are made.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this does not apply only to students? There are many other cases, such as holiday populations, that equally give rise to concern about the level of RSG and the factors that should be taken into account in assessing it.

Mr. Dewar: That is no doubt true, but we should keep to the subject of students.

When the category of students has been defined, the problem arises how to establish individuals' claims. Perhaps the Minister will take this convenient opportunity to comment on the vital matter of verification and on the state of the art and say how, when students are registered, they will establish their claim to the reduction to 20 per cent. which is at the heart of the scheme. For example, is it intended that universities and colleges will supply lists of those qualified to the registration officers in their areas? If so, a great deal of work is involved for the universities because the definition of a student for the purposes of the regulations cuts across many other definitions that are used at present in the universities. The category applicable in this case would have to be teased out from the general student body.

If universities are to have that duty, what sanction will there be if they fail to comply? After all, a responsible person has a legal duty placed upon him and faces a financial penalty if he does not carry it out. Would that sanction apply in respect of such institutions, if that approach were to be adopted? Have the views of vice-chancellors been sought on the matter? The Minister will be aware that many civil rights issues involving the denial of individual responsibilities would arise. Many of us take the view that such information should not be supplied by the university or college without the permission of the individual student concerned.

Another possibility is simply that the onus should be on the student to apply for the exemption and to prove his or her entitlement. Perhaps we could have a composite solution in which the onus should be on the student to apply and the registration officer then had the power to check with the university or college. The Minister must comment on that tonight and give an indication of the Government's thinking.

I very much want an assurance that we shall not go down the road taken by the Department of the Environment south of the border. I have here a letter from the hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) who, I understand, is the Minister for Local Government, to my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) which announces that the first step that will be taken in England to deal with the problem "is a requirement that universities and colleges should issue certificates to full-time students confirming their status. These certificates will make it straightforward for students to claim the student discount".

That looks unpleasantly and uncommonly like an identity card thinly disguised as a certificate to establish a student's status for poll tax purposes. That is totally unacceptable to Opposition Members. It should be ruled out now, and I invite the Minister to do exactly that.

It is clearly desirable that students should receive any possible remission from the burden of poll tax. I am in favour of that, as are my hon. Friends, but that does not mean that we must not be satisfied that there is confidence in the system and that it is workable and equitable. Even with the discount it is worth remarking that few, if any, students look forward in any sense to the arrival of the poll tax. They have many and manifold worries. Perhaps the Minister could do himself some good by giving assurances and addressing himself to some of the problems.

There is, for example, the matter of the rent levels paid by students. As the Minister knows, these are often set on the basis that the landlord will pay a substantial rates bill. The rates bill will disappear for the landlord, and students will shoulder perhaps £60 or £70 a year or more as their 20 per cent. of the normal poll tax in the area. Yet, so far as I am aware, there is no machinery for ensuring that the rents are adjusted to a lower level to compensate for this change. It is important that the Minister says a word or two about that during the debate. That is essential because students are hard pressed—no doubt in all parts of the United Kingdom, but I can speak from personal experience of Scotland only.

Students have suffered from the falling value and purchasing power of the grant over many years and from the failure to rate properly against inflation. They will suffer from changes in housing benefit, perhaps not so dramatically as some of my constituents, but nevertheless significantly and substantially. In the long term they will suffer from the Government's determination to end all support for students from the benefit system. In those circumstances it is absolutely vital that we have some assurance that efforts will be made to adjust those rents to ensure that students do not bear an additional burden which few of them can afford.

We want the best possible protection for students, but we do not believe that these regulations are properly thought out. They are full of gaps, distortions and anomalies. It is a case of doubtful means being employed to achieve a thoroughly undesirable end. The House should reflect the anger and vehement opposition of students to the poll tax in every part of Scotland. We intend to vote against the regulations and the tax. The regulations are part and parcel of an unsound, unpopular scheme, which we believe is essentially unworkable.

10.32 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I am happy to speak about the community charge regulations as they apply to students. I declare an interest because some members of my family are students and will obviously benefit from the 80 per cent. rebate.

I am worried about the way in which the community charge is being presented to the people of Scotland, including students. Only this week I received through my letter box The Tayside Digest—not one of my favourite pieces of reading material—which is issued by Tayside regional council. The digest advises us that an estimated £1,775,000 will be required for additional staff to operate the community charge, together with about £300,000 more for property costs, about £580,000 extra for administration costs, about £2 million for temporary office accommodation and about £4·5 million for permanent offices. The way Tayside is proceeding gives rise for anxiety. The council seems determined to spend money regardless. In those curcumstances students must be concerned about the 20 per cent. that they will be required to pay.

Kept at present levels and without escalating costs, the charge will be equivalent to a colour television licence fee. I should have thought that, for the value to students, certainly in my family, of libraries and other facilities, that is a small contribution towards the cost of local government. Non-students would pay substantially more for the recreational and other facilities that students use extensively. So is is good value, but it will remain good value only if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary keeps a careful note of how much Tayside and other regions spend on collection. For instance, Tayside has opted for an NCR system, and I wonder whether it is paying extra for that equipment.

I am also worried about the misinformation which is being put out about the community charge, its likely cost and the way it will be administered. During the local government election recently the Scottish National party, true to form, put out its usual bunch of lies in my constituency. [Interruption.] It does that all the time in my constituency and I am sure it does the same in others, including Labour constituencies.

The community charge will be affected by the way in which local authorities deal with housing. One lie put out by the Scottish National party was:

"The Government is determined that local authority housing should be sold off to the highest bidder . . . Council housing as we know it today will disappear and the only beneficiaries will be faceless city investors."

All that will affect the community charge and will worry students. I am worried about the downright lies that have been circulated to students and others by the Scottish National party in my constituency, and I welcome the opportunity to ask my hon. Friend the Minister to note that.

Because I have been asked to be brief, I will not deal with the other aspects of the regulations. I repeat that students will get marvellous value for what they pay. As I said, I have students in my family; they will enjoy the benefits, provided my hon. Friend keeps a close eye on the cost of administering the charge.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Some time ago I asked a question to which the answer was one of the most sinister that I have heard in Britain for many a day. I asked whether the Minister was suggesting that petitions would be used for the purpose of gathering names and addresses for the register. He said yes. That is incredible in Britain, where we have a history and tradition of using petitions to petition the Queen or the Government. There has never before been any suggestion that a Government would use a petition as a source of information. Now the Government intend to use petitions as a source of information to complete the disastrous poll tax register.

It is a sinister move. Students who are on the threshold of life and who are trying to get an education will be frightened to put their names to anti-poll-tax campaigns because the Government may use the information to compile the register. What else could the Government use the information for? They could use it for many other purposes. The Minister must tell the House and the country how the Government will use petitions. [Interruption.]

I know that other hon. Members wish to speak, so I do not want to take up too much time. I believe that the 20 per cent. is a tax on education. It is a tax on young people who cannot afford to pay it. We have recently seen in the House the push for Scottish Homes. The Opposition know that that will cause rents to escalate. On top of that, young people will need to find 20 per cent. of the poll tax. Does the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) believe that £70 is chickenfeed? Seventy pounds buys £70-worth of books. The Government will punish young people who can ill afford their education. They will drive young people away from further education.

The Government are on the road to stifling free speech. They cannot be allowed to use petitions in this way. The Minister should make it clear to the House that the Government have no intention of changing the traditions and values of this country and that they will use petitions for their proper purpose. It is disgraceful that any Minister, especially a Scottish Minister, should take away from the Scottish people the right to sign a petition, and the petition they sign should be used only for its proper purpose. It should not be used for any sinister means thought up by the registration office.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): We are discussing those lucky students who will be exempted from paying the full amount of the community charge and will only pay 20 per cent. of it. One of the objections to the regulations is that they exclude many people who, in any sense of the words, are students or trainees. However, they will not be exempted from paying the full amount, as are students of universities, colleges and so on.

It is worth noting that students who become liable to pay poll tax in their first year of education will have no allowance made in their student grants. That is because no adjustment will be made to the student grant until poll tax is payable throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. In other words, students attending Scottish universities and colleges will be disadvantaged.

Why is the group eligible for the allowance so narrow? Why does it not include part-time students, who attend universities and colleges for less than 21 hours a week? What about trainees? Are they not students? We constantly see advertisements that are paid for by the taxpayer and promoted by Lord Young, telling us that there will be more training and more students, yet those people are not to be included.

Student grants this year amount to £38 a week if one is living away from home, or £28 a week if one is living at home. If one compares those figures with the amount paid to YTS trainees—£29 a week in the first year and £35 a week in the second year—one sees that there is not much difference between the payments. Yet the students attending universities or colleges have to pay only 20 per cent. of the poll tax—I do not grudge them that—and trainees on, for example, YTS will pay the full amount if they do not come within the very restrictive benefit scheme. Although there is little difference, the Government are treating the YTS trainees differently. We suspect that that is because they are attempting to buy off the parents of the students attending colleges and universities.

One of the major anomalies involves student nurses. Why are they not included? What have the student nurses done to offend the Government so much? Why will they not be entitled to pay only 20 per cent. of the poll tax? What about the young unemployed?

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South) rose——

Mr. Darling: I hope that hon. Members will forgive me, but I am reluctant to give way to hon. Members who have shown little interest in the poll tax legislation for Scotland. We see them only when they are brought in to filibuster on behalf of the Government.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: No, I shall not give way.

The House must consider the double standards that are being applied—on the one hand, to students at colleges and universities, and on the other, to those who are on YTS and to student nurses.

For people on YTS, the poll tax may account for as much as £7 a week out of a weekly income of £29. On top of that, the unfortunate individual also has to pay for rent, food and rising electricity prices.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said, who will guarantee that student rents will come down when rates are abolished? In too many cases, what is likely to happen is that rents will stay exactly the same and the landlords will pocket the difference and, on top of rent, the student will have to find the money for the poll tax.

If the Minister refers to the rebate system in his reply, let no one be fooled. We have already seen, in the benefit changes, students being hit time and again along with thousands of others. The rebate system has been restricted, which will result in many people who wish to improve themselves by undergoing further education losing out, together with those who want to train and those who want the advantages to which they are entitled.

The regulations are full of inconsistencies—that is typical of the legislation as a whole. The one thing that is certain is that the Minister will say nothing to justify it, because there is no justification. Once again, he will mumble his way through the brief. People in Scotland, and in the United Kingdom, have every right to be worried about what is coming their way. The Government will pay the penalty for that. The regulations typify the double standards and unjust nature of the poll tax and that is why we shall vote against them.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): It seems strange that after a year the Opposition have still not got away from their yah-boo attitude to the House. They refuse to treat it as a debating Chamber, or to observe the normal courtesy of giving way. All they do is make a lot of noise without ever considering the issue at stake. The sooner they realise that they are the "feeble 50" and have a singularly incompetent year's work behind them, the better.

This is a good scheme to help whole-time students to deal with the community charge. The 80 per cent. reduction is significant and worth while and will be well received by the students concerned, bearing in mind that if everything is fair there will be a significant reduction in the rates that they are already paying.

Opposition Members have spent the past year giving out misinformation. They have totally ignored the rebate scheme for the community charge and have put the fear of God into people when that cannot be justified in any way. The misinformation in some of the documents that have been produced since the last election must make the consciences of Opposition Members turn even redder.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) rose——

Sir Hector Monro: They have put in some—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] Of course I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dalyell: Why is it, then, that the vice-chancellors should have expressed so many anxieties on behalf of the students?

Sir Hector Monro: I am afraid that they have been misled by the Labour party. When the vice-chancellors read the Minister's reply, they will realise that they were ignorant of the facts. That is why they have put out more misinformation than the hon. Gentleman's party in recent months.

There is no doubt that the Labour party—the Scottish National party is even worse—and the social democrats have been putting the most fearful and totally incorrect information before the people of Scotland. All Opposition Members, especially those in the Scottish National party, should apologise to the people of Scotland for the way in which they have behaved during the past year over the community charge.

Mr. Bill Walker: Another interesting aspect of the position of the Scottish National party is that the Scottish National party provost in Perth and Kinross and nationalist councillors in Angus are telling people to live within the law and obey the law, which is contrary to the nonsense that we hear from Opposition Members.

Sir Hector Monro: Indeed. Those who follow the advice of the SNP will be remarkably few. The majority will realise that it is far better to keep within the law, which is what most citizens of Scotland have done for generations.

My hon. Friend the Minister has brought forward regulations that will help whole-time students and will be well received by them. I hope that the prayer is rejected.

10.50 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I doubt whether I can attain the lofty forensic heights of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), but I shall do my modest best. In the houses of the vice-chancellors—we prefer to call them principals in the Scottish universities—it will be noted that it is the hon. Gentleman's view that the robust Scottish education tradition is so lacking in vigour that the principals have been deluded by Ministers of the Scottish Office. I have no doubt that that will ring loudly in their ears.

Sir Hector Monro: I should be grateful if the hon. and learned Gentleman would refer accurately to what I said. I said that the vice-chancellors have been misinformed by the Labour party, not by Ministers.

Mr. Campbell: That can be only because they have not accepted the alternative views of Ministers at the Scottish Office. It is unconvincing to suggest that the vice-chancellors are so unreceptive to good argument that they cannot distinguish between what is right and what is wrong. No doubt they will regard the hon. Gentleman's judgment of their inability to distinguish between what is right and what is wrong as a measure of the importance that the Government attach to higher education in the United Kingdom.

In the interests of brevity I do not propose to repeat many of the observations so pungently made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). However, I invite the Minister to give some consideration to the position of overseas students. As a result of the Government's policies, the university of St. Andrew's, which lies within my constituency, has had to make the attraction of students from overseas an important part of its economy. Anything which operates as a disincentive to such students to come to St. Andrew's might have serious repercussions for the financial stability of that institution. I hope that the Minister will make clear precisely what the position is on overseas students.

[Mr. Campbell]

We are concerned this evening not with the principle of the community charge but with its consequences. The regulations are offensive for what they contain and what they do not. The imposition upon students of even 20 per cent. of the community charge is deeply offensive because since 1981 the real value of student grants has fallen by about 21 per cent, and there is to be no increase in the grants in Scotland in the first year for which the community charge is payable. I know of students at St. Andrew's university who genuinely face hardship as a result of the low level of grants on which they are now forced to exist—[Interruption.] If they were present, they would give those who are interrupting from a sedentary position a clear account of their difficulties.

The imposition of even 20 per cent. of the community charge will add to the hardship of many students. It is nothing but an illustration of the lack of regard that the Government have for higher education and the opportunities that it offers for our young people that they should adopt such a policy.

I am interested that there are so many English Members present in the Chamber for the debate. I welcome their attendance, because the debate will give them an opportunity to prepare themselves for the onslaught in their constituency surgeries when constituents realise what the consequences are for their children when the community charge is imposed.

Mr. Devlin: English Members are already seeing their constituents in their surgeries on this issue. During my surgery at Stockton-on-Tees on Saturday I was met by half a dozen pensioners who wanted to know why the local council was organising a petition against the poll tax and I was not organising a petition in its favour. They told me that if I were to organise such a petition, they would be enthusiastic to sign it.

Mr. Campbell: I think, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that intervention taxed your tolerance of what is relevant to a debate on regulations that determine the position of students.

The regulations are offensive for what they do not contain. They fail to recognise the position of student nurses and of apprentices and trainees, who are necessarily engaged in full-time training or education and are poorly rewarded for that, not having the opportunity to take vacation jobs——

Mr. Ian Bruce: The hon. and learned Gentleman cannot have looked at the regulations. He must surely know that all the people on low wages whom he has described could well be entitled to a full 80 per cent. rebate. Students automatically get it, and do not have to go through the paperwork to do so.

Mr. Campbell: That is correct. It may be a measure of the importance that the Conservative party attaches to nurses that it thinks it reasonable to pay them a level of remuneration that results in their receiving an 80 per cent. rebate.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Campbell: I shall not give way. I have done my best so far to bring knowledge to the ignorant, and do not propose to permit further interruptions.

The regulations are an illustration of the flawed principle upon which the community charge is based. They are therefore inherently flawed themselves, which is why the House should have no hesitation in wholly rejecting them.

10.57 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I want to take up a point about student nurses that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and reinforced by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell). Before doing so, however, I want to answer the point made by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), who accused the Labour party in Scotland of having successfully persuaded the people of Scotland to oppose the poll tax by generating misinformation about it. I take that as something of a compliment.

What has been done to advise people in Scotland about the poll tax? At great expense to the taxpayer, the Scottish Office produced a glossy book that was delivered to every household in Scotland by the much maligned Scottish Post Office. At great expense, the Scottish Conservative party employed a former information officer from the Scottish Office to generate what it considered to be correct information about the poll tax.

All these efforts have failed to convince the people of Scotland of the value of the poll tax. They have chosen instead to believe the explanation given by the Scottish Labour party. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) fairly described how, at his surgery on Saturday, he was confronted by six old-age pensioners, who chastised him for not organising a petition in favour of the poll tax.

There are 10 Tory MPs in Scotland. I challenge one or all of them, or the Scottish Conservative party, which does not amount to many more than 10 members, to organise a petition and see how many signatures they can get in Scotland in favour of the tax. My guess is that they could be contained on the two sides of an A4 sheet, with enough room left over on it to write the address of the House of Commons.

To return to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central about student nurses, I do not think that the Government—I notice that the debate has been graced with the presence of the Minister of State responsible for Scottish health—have fully appreciated the impact on nurse training in Scotland that the imposition of the poll tax will have, four years before it is applied in England and Wales.

At its annual conference in the Scottish exhibition centre in Glasgow last year, the Royal College of Nursing went on record as saying that it will advise student nurses not to train in colleges of nursing and midwifery in Scotland while the poll tax legislation is being implemented in Scotland and not implemented south of the border.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Ewing: The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is desperate to make a point and I shall give way to him so that he may sleep peacefully.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that it is for the nurses' review body to decide what will be necessary to compensate nurses for the liability that the hon. Gentleman talks about? Does he not also agree that the Government have implemented the review body's recommendations in full?

Mr. Ewing: Nurses in Scotland will be worse off to the extent of the poll tax than their counterparts in England and Wales. We now have two views from Tory Members —the one expressed by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West and the one expressed by the hon. Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce). The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West says that it is for the review body to consider the remuneration of student nurses. The hon. Member for Dorset, South said that nurses received such low pay that they might well qualify for an 80 per cent. rebate.

Mr. Ian Bruce rose——

Mr. Ewing: I propose to finish on this point and I hope that the Minister will take it on board. Whatever may be said about the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, he believes in what he says. I do not dispute that for a moment.

Mr. Ian Bruce: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) has misquoted me. I clearly said that the income of those classes of people would be looked at and that they could receive a rebate of 80 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): That is a matter for debate and not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Ewing: Sometimes I think that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland is a fair person. I have to be personal here and I hope that he does not take offence. I am sure that he sees the total unfairness and injustice in the fact that student nurses whom he represents in Stirling royal infirmary and in other Health Service establishments in his constituency are faced with the possibility of the imposition of the poll tax while he will save £1,200 a year. There is simply no justice in that and student nurses training in Scotland will suffer as a result. That will be on the shoulders of Conservative Members.

11.3 pm

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): I shall be extremely brief and have no intention of giving way.

What concerns me about the regulations is the way that they affect education and universities not only in Scotland but elsewhere. Universities are collegiate organisations and a family. I watched with some interest the smirks on the faces of Conservative Members when my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) suggested that part of the thrust of the regulations was to invite universities to issue to students what is tantamount to an identity card. Many Conservative Members said, "Why not?"

Most universities have some form of identification, for libraries and so on, because it bestows on the students some privilege. If the regulations bestow a privilege, they go against the thrust of the poll tax and accountability. Although it goes partly along the lines of ability to pay, the main thrust of the poll tax is to impose burdens on people so that those burdens will be reflected in their voting behaviour.

The Secretary of State and the proponents of the tax argued at first that the students should pay the whole tax and get rebates, remission or exemptions. That is a range of words, but the Minister used the word "exemptions" because the students get grants from the Scottish Office. I want an assurance from the Minister, because I predict that there will be enormous difficulties in determining who is a student. I suspect that when the Scottish Office is faced with that problem it will go to its central records of those who apply for student grants. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] Why not? If that is not an infringement of civil liberties, I do not know what is. For the first time, we have an admission that if parents of students freely give information for one purpose, when the Secretary of State or those who desire to impose on young Scots a head tax with no real basis in ability to pay cannot get their way, they will use any device to hand.

If the Minister does not deny that, the suspicion will lie. People will not apply for student grants because they will not want to pay the poll tax. Students will not pay even the 20 per cent.; parents will. Tory Members are smirking. We want more children from working class backgrounds to go in for higher education, but their parents will not be able to pay the tax. It will be a further imposition and a further

---

Mr. Devlin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Douglas: I have made it plain that I shall not give way, and I shall certainly not give way to hon. Members who have scant regard for what is being proposed in Scotland.

The regulations have an extremely eclectic definition of students. We have had some debates about the future of Newbattle Abbey. Do students attending that college qualify under the regulations? As far as I know, they will have to pay the poll tax, although they will be in the college for periods of 24 hours or 21 hours. What will happen to Scottish students who go to organisations such as the college I went to—the co-operative college at Loughborough—not necessarily to take degrees, but for some other educational qualification?

We have no information as to the cost of imposing these regulations. I have made it plain that this is a monstrous tax that the people of Scotland want nothing to do with. I have warned my colleagues and I shall warn the Government. The Prime Minister may be doing us a good turn by visiting Scotland—and I do not mean the electoral chances of the Tory party. The more she tries to thrust down the throats of Scottish people what she thinks is good for them, the more the Scottish people will reject it. Come 1 April 1989, the revulsion that will be displayed by the Scottish people towards the poll tax will rock the unity of the United Kingdom.

11.9 pm

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): The community charge, or poll tax, which comes into effect in Scotland in 1989 and in England and Wales from 1990 onwards, will affect students from Northern Ireland studying at mainland universities. Like other students, they will be required to pay 20 per cent. of the tax. They will be registered for collection at their term-time addresses in Great Britain.

Is the Minister aware that students from Northern Ireland studying at English, Welsh and Scottish universities——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will be well aware of the fact that Conservative Members who have been present throughout the debate have tried to get involved in the debate—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not question the judgment of the Chair in calling hon. Members to speak. Mr. Beggs.

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have dealt with the hon. Gentleman's point of order and I ask him now to reflect upon what I said. Mr. Beggs.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your advice—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not taking another point of order from the hon. Gentleman. Mr. Beggs.

Mr. Beggs: This has gone a little too far. It is quite unnecessary.

Is the Minister aware that students from Northern Ireland at English, Welsh and Scottish universities——

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a very short debate and the House must leave it to the discretion of the Chair as to who should be called to speak. I appeal to hon. Members, whose frustration I fully understand, not to rise on points of order which are questioning the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. Beggs: Is the Minister aware that students from Northern Ireland who study at mainland universities will be adversely affected by the poll tax? Their parents are already paying domestic rates——

Mr. Barry Porter: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As an English Member, I have listened with great interest to the debate, and to some extent I understand how you have exercised your honest discretion in calling Scottish Members. Equally, this is a matter for the United Kingdom, and it is difficult to understand why, after four Opposition Members have spoken consecutively, you have called an hon. Member from the Province, and my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has not been called. We have a right to be heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course I understand the frustration of hon. Members on both sides of the House when they do not have the opportunity to be called in debates, but the whole House knows very well that that is one of the discretions—and it is a very difficult discretion —which the House has given to the Chair. I am exercising that discretion to the best of my judgment.

Mr. Beggs: Parents of students attending mainland universities are already paying domestic rates at the same level as is paid in Humberside. When the poll tax is introduced in Humberside, Northern Ireland ratepayers will pay domestic rates at the same level as the poll tax levied in Humberside. Those parents will then be required to provide additional financial assistance for their sons or daughters attending mainland universities. I understand that that could amount to as much as £70—[Interruption.]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Opposition Members are keen to listen to contributions to the debate, but we are unable to do so because of squabbling and speaking between Government Whips and Conservative Members. If the Government Whip cannot control the hon. Members, they should leave the Chamber and carry on——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is little time left in the debate and I ask the House to listen quietly to the hon. Member who has the Floor.

Mr. Beggs: I am sure that there is no intention to discriminate against me. I hope that there is no intention by the Government to discriminate against those Northern Ireland students who are attending universities on the mainland, who have taken the initiative to seek places and have been awarded courses appropriate to their needs.

Will the Minister undertake to discuss the problem with his colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office and request that consideration be given urgently to increasing student grants for Northern Ireland students at universities in Britain? Such students are already badly penalised by the high costs of travel to and from the mainland and we all know that travel assistance has been cut.

Will the Minister also bear in mind the fact—this is important and I hope that the Minister will understand and be sympathetic—that Northern Ireland is a low-wage economy? We have high unemployment. The future prosperity of Northern Ireland is dependent on our students getting the best education possible. We do not want anything that will dissuade them from seeking courses at mainland universities.

The additional burden of the poll tax puts at risk for many of those students the possibility of attending mainland universities. I hope that the Minister can inform us whether, taking account of the low incomes, such people will be entitled to a rebate of 80 per cent. of the 20 per cent. being levied or whether they will qualify for benefit to help pay the 20 per cent. that is expected from them.

It would appear that the cost of collecting that small amount of poll tax from our students may far outweigh the value of the money collected. It should be dropped altogether. Students should be exempted.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): From the tone of this evening's debate one would not have thought that the proportion of gross domestic product going on student maintenance in this country is higher than in any other Western country, that student incomes overall have risen by 5·5 per cent. in real terms since 1982 and that there are more students than ever before.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Given the respect with which the Chair treats the rights of minority parties in the House, it cannot have escaped your notice that the Scottish National party has again not been allowed to make a contribution to this debate on an important issue facing Scotland. That is particularly surprising given that the SNP emerged as the second party in Scotland in terms——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must say to the hon. Gentleman—as I have just said to Conservative Members —that this is a matter for the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. Lang: As the Scottish National party does not support the rule of law, I do not see why they should seek its protection in this House.

The regulations embody a generous and sensitive response to students' status in the application of the community charge. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) asked me whether I was satisfied that the definitions are precise and comprehensive, to which I answer yes, and I shall come to details of that in due course.

Mr. Salmond rose——

Mr. Lang: No. I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

First, however, I should like to answer some points arising from the debate. The hon. Member for Garscadden asked me about the number of students. In 1986-87, 81,600 full-time and sandwich course students were engaged in higher education in Scotland, the great majority of whom would qualify for the 20 per cent. concession. In general, students on short courses and bridging courses leading to entry to higher courses but not producing qualifications in themselves would not be eligible for the 20 per cent. concession, although they will, of course, be eligible for rebate. The definition of term time at regulation 3(c) provides for sandwich course students to attend their courses

"at such place or places as the educational establishment may specify or approve."

That covers sandwich courses. Provided that students undertaking sandwich courses or practical placements meet the requirements of the regulations, they will be liable only for the reduced rate of personal community charge throughout their course.

The hon. Member for Garscadden asked me about the financial implications for local authorities in the context——

Mr. Marlow rose——

Mr. Lang: No, I am very sorry. If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I have very limited time. I apologise; on another occasion I would happily give way to my hon. Friend.

I assure the hon. Member for Garscadden that account will be taken of the number of students in each area in the distribution of the revenue support grant. The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) estimated that the cost of the community charge to students in Scotland would be £70. The hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde asked whether that was chickenfeed. I point out that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science has been conducting a survey of student expenditure, which discloses that 60 per cent. of students already pay something towards rates in their rent payment. The average payment is between £70 and £80. I hope that that puts the matter in context. [Interruption.]

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) asks whether rent will go down. If they do not already have a registered rent, which is, of course, exclusive of rates, those who are already tenants will be able to apply to the rent officer for a rent to be registered if they are not satisfied that their landlord has reduced the amount that they pay to reflect the abolition of domestic rates. I acknowledge that that protection is not available to some students at present. The Rent Act has never sought to impose control on certain kinds of lettings, such as those where board is provided. In other cases—for example, where there is a resident landlord—the control is much less.

Any attempt to disentangle landlords' liability for rates from their other overheads would be impossible and would not necessarily lead to a reduction in what people pay. In that sector of the market, landlords charge what the market will bear rather than building up a charge based on the separate identification of rent and rates. In future, people in such accommodation may very well be offered short assured tenancies under the proposals of the Housing (Scotland) Bill. In those circumstances, they will be able to apply for the determination of a rent which would not include rates and therefore have the assurance that the total amount that they were called upon to pay was not excessive in the light of prevailing market conditions in the area. So Opposition Members' fears are not justified.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North East (Mr. Campbell) referred to student nurses. Students differ from student nurses and other trainees in two important respects. First, their financial situation is different. A student nurse's salary is considerably higher, for example, than even the highest student grant. The student grant outside London is under £2,000, whereas the starting salary for a first-year student nurse is £4,825 and for a third-year student nurse is £5,575. The average earnings of a student nurse in Scotland are about £5,500, which is about two and a half to three times what a student gets.

We shall take no lessons from members of the Labour and Liberal parties, as, under the last Labour Government, supported by the Liberals, nurses' pay fell by 40 per cent. whereas under this Government it has risen by an average of 44 per cent. in real terms. The crucial difference is that students will not be eligible for community charge rebates whereas trainees on low incomes will be eligible for rebates and other help through the social security system.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central asked about the young person with an income of £29 per week, suggesting that he would have to pay £7 per week community charge. That, as the hon. Gentleman must be aware, is totally misleading and inaccurate, as it takes no account of that person's entitlement to rebate.

The rebate details have not yet been published—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!".] However, on a rough calculation and based on present allowances, a single person having the income and of the age mentioned by the hon. Gentleman would enjoy a rebate of between £4·50 and £5.

Mr. Darling rose——

Mr. Lang: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) suggested that nurses in training in Scotland would suffer a four-year disadvantage. He must be aware that the English community charge will be introduced in 1990 and only in parts of London will there be transitional arrangements beyond 1990.

Mr. Dewar rose——

Mr. Lang: I am sorry, but I must press on; I have a number of points still to answer.

We have always intended that there should be a special community charge registration regime for students, in the sense that they should be deemed to be mainly or solely resident at their term-time address. That is a matter of administrative practicality, as it will ensure that students having a term-time address different from their home address will not have to be deregistered and then re-registered up to six times a year, at the beginning and end of each vacation.

It was the Government's original intention that, as far as possible, payment of the personal community charge by students——

Mr. Dewar: What about identity cards?

Mr. Lang: I hope to deal with that point later.

As to the payment of the personal community charge, students—like all other adults—will be liable to pay the full charge, but assistance will be made available through the student awards system. During the passage of the Abolition of Domestic Rates, Etc. (Scotland) Bill through the House of Lords, it was agreed that a 20 per cent. proportion with an 80 per cent. reduction was a more appropriate system.

A number of Opposition Members raised questions about the registration process as it affects students. I am informed that the hon. Member for Garscadden held a press conference in Scotland today at which he characterised the registration process as going badly, simply because the Government have not claimed that it is going well. I assure him that we have, and it is. Registration for the community charge is proceeding smoothly and as planned. [HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish!"] We are still only one quarter of the way through the registration period provided for drawing up the first registers, but it is already clear from press reports that return rates of higher than 75 per cent. are being achieved generally in the initial canvass, approaching 90 per cent. in some areas.

That is substantially better than would be expected from the first stage of the traditional canvass process for electoral registration. It leaves those who have been trying to disrupt the registration process looking as ridiculous as they are contemptible.

The hon. Member for Garscadden asked about identity cards. We are considering the possibility of inviting the university authorities to co-operate in the matter of registration, as our English colleagues have already made plain that they are doing. We have had a consultation process and are considering the outcome. We shall make our announcement shortly.

The hon. Member for Garscadden claimed great success for the campaign to send forms back. People have been sending them back—completed. It is clear that registration officers throughout Scotland are finding no insuperable difficulties in completing the tasks given to them by statute. Those who decided to adopt a postal canvass have almost completed the first stage. Lothian and Strathclyde, the two most populous regions, are well on track to completing the canvass by the end of June, as they planned to do.

Not only is the Labour party failing in its campaign—and there is nothing new about failure where Labour is concerned—but it is also demeaning itself by lending support to a campaign that encourages people to disregard their civic obligations. I regard Labour Members' posture of nudging the people of Scotland towards disruption and law-breaking as a squalid and demeaning exercise. It is undemocratic and unprincipled, and hon. Gentlemen know that. But they underrate the Scottish people, who are obeying the law, returning the registration forms and rejecting the Labour party's cynical blandishments. The result will be a fairer and more broadly based means of contributing to the cost of local government through the community charge. The regulations bring that system closer, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) rose——

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)):—

WELSH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That, during the proceedings on the matter of Education and Training for Employment in Wales, the Welsh Grand Committee have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it shall meet, and that, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees), the second such sitting shall not commence before Four o'clock nor continue after the Committee have considered that matter for two hours at the sitting.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On the Welsh order, in view of what has happened this evening, I understand that only Welsh and Irish Members will be called to represent——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. We cannot debate the matter now. The House has passed the motion.

Mr. Patrick McManus

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

11.44 pm

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): My constituent, Mr. Patrick McManus, of 40 Aster gardens, Motherwell, submitted to the Law Society of Scotland four sworn statements from witnesses accusing a local solicitor of failing to respond to their pleas to visit his sister-in-law before her death to finalise her will. His brother, John McManus, died on 2 October 1986 without leaving a will and since there were no children of the marriage his whole estate passed to his widow, Mrs. Eileen Patricia McManus.

The local solicitor attended at the home of Mrs. Eileen McManus on 6 October 1986, four days after the death of her husband, and took instructions on the winding up of the estate. He was also told that she wished him to prepare a will for her, though he did not take instructions at that meeting to prepare a will. Her health deteriorated over the ensuing month, and she died on 6 November 1986. During that period numerous attempts were made to contact the solicitor to get him to see Mrs. Eileen McManus and prepare a will for her. He failed to do so. There are independent witnesses who hold that it was her intention to leave her estate to her brother-in-law, Mr. Patrick McManus, and her sister-in-law. Instead, her whole estate passed to her relatives. The estate was approximately the value of a house.

Mr. Patrick McManus complained to the Law Society of Scotland a few days after his sister-in-law died intestate. The Lay Observer for Scotland, in a report dated 19 November 1987, confirmed that Mr. McManus had complained to the Law Society in a letter dated 24 November 1986. The Law Society had immediately written to the solicitor, asking for his account of the circumstances. It received a detailed, five-page document dated 4 December, with accompanying documents. This was sent to Mr. McManus, who returned full comments on 20 December. The solicitor replied in detail on 5 January 1987.

Mr. McManus, the lay observer continued, had referred to certain people who allegedly had tried to contact the solicitor to get him to attend the late Mrs. McManus. The Law Society, on 21 January, asked for sworn statements by witnesses. Four such sworn statements were sent on 28 January. These were copied to the solicitor, who again sent full comments on 5 February.

Meanwhile, the whole file was circulated to two members of the Law Society for their opinion. It was decided that precognitions should be taken in order to ascertain the strength of evidence of Mr. McManus and his witnesses. These were taken by the Law Society complaints investigator and the whole case was submitted to the complaints committee on 7 May 1987.

The complaints committee took the view that the solicitor's failure to see his client and take her instructions for the preparation of a will in urgent circumstances amounted to a serious professional misconduct, and recommended that the papers be referred to a society facal for prosecution before the Scottish solicitors disciplinary tribunal, the strongest possible action.

The council, however, referred the case back to the committee for reconsideration, and it was then decided that instead of prosecution a reprimand be issued, but subject to interview. This changed decision, according to the lay observer, was taken after a member of the council, but not of the complaints committee, wrote strongly disputing that there had been professional misconduct. The committee alleges that this letter did not influence the decision.

On 27 August, the solicitor was interviewed by a panel of the Law Society, with his legal representative. Further evidence from the solicitor, in particular an alleged log book of telephone calls and personal callers kept by the solicitor's firm, was presented. It apparently conflicted with parts of the sworn statements of witnesses. I am told that in court a telephone log is not accepted as firm evidence. Yet the Law Society accepted it in preference to the sworn statements of Mr. McManus's witnesses, and without an opportunity for him or his representatives to examine the log. The complaints committee decided that the proposed reprimand should be withdrawn without further inquiry, or Mr. McManus being shown the new evidence. This was later endorsed by the council. Mr. McManus was informed of the Law Society's decision.

The lay observer

"argued that the complainer should first have been advised what information in the log book contradicted the evidence he had submitted and given an opportunity to comment."

The lay observer recommended, in her 1987 annual report, "that whenever decisions to discipline are taken 'subject to interview' of the solicitor, the Council should, before reviewing those decisions, give complainers:—

(a) an opportunity to study new information produced at the solicitor's interview and to submit comments;

(b) an opportunity to be interviewed themselves, if they so wish."

In the course of nine months there had been a complete volte-face by the Law Society, following representations from a fellow solicitor, and without opportunity for Mr. McManus to examine new evidence. The solicitor in question finally escaped without even a reprimand.

Mr. McManus contacted the lay observer, whose report, though couched in carefully measured terms, is scathing. He also contacted me. I had a lengthy correspondence with the lay observer, the Law Society, and the Minister responsible for home affairs in the Scottish Office, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton). At the suggestion of the lay observer, and with my encouragement, Mr. McManus requested the Law Society to appoint a troubleshooter to investigate the case. The troubleshooter produced, in the estimation of the lay observer, a "very responsible analysis".

This report found that, if it were clearly established that it had been brought to the solicitor's attention that the making of a will was urgent, and that he failed to do so within a reasonable time scale, that could be professional negligence. His explanation that he required to wait until the finalisation of the husband's estate before making a will for the wife is difficult to accept. Unfortunately for Mr. McManus, while in the opinion of the troubleshooter he suffered economic loss, there were no grounds for holding in connection with the making of a will for Mrs. McManus that he was employing the solicitor for that purpose. Mrs. McManus could sue for damages for a professionally negligent act as the client, but she is dead.

There has long been a demand for stiffening the procedures of the Law Society's complaints committee, so that it is less susceptible to pressure from solicitors, and does more to safeguard the interests of clients. The case has been accepted by the Law Society itself. The Solicitors (Scotland) Bill, which is now making rapid progress through Parliament, is a Bill initiated by the Law Society, and agreed by the Law Society, the lay observer, and Scottish Office Ministers. It has all-party support. However, it has been gathering dust in the in-tray of Scottish Office Ministers in one form or another for years. The lay observer has been energetically pressing for the increased powers that the Bill will give her office in report after annual report.

Specifically as a result of a recommendation made by the lay observer on this case, if new evidence is presented, the Law Society's procedure now requires it to be put to the complainer. I welcome unreservedly the increased powers in the Bill given to the lay observer to refer cases to the disciplinary tribunal, and the new powers to discipline solicitors in Scotland in cases of inadequate professional services. I believe that the case of Mr. McManus has played some part in bringing the new Bill before the House. My only regret is that this important Bill was not introduced by the Government, and the issues properly aired. It was left to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) to introduce it as a private Member's Bill. The Bill has gone through Second Reading and Committee on the nod.

Had the Bill been enacted in 1986, Mr. McManus's case would have been handled very differently. As it is, he has so far been left without prospect of recompense. If there was negligence, or reasonable grounds for believing there to be negligence, by a travel agent, a quantity surveyor, or an engineer, there would be some fund from which a person like Mr. McManus could be compensated as a matter of judgment, not of law. It is my hope that the Law Society, and, influenced by colleagues, the solicitor whose failure to act has resulted in Mr. McManus's loss, will find some way of compensating him for his loss. The accumulation of such cases is bound to strengthen the case for lay panels to judge the complaints brought against solicitors. I hope that the Minister will be able to deal with Mr. McManus's case, and, in particular with the means of compensation, and with the complaints procedure generally.

I hope that I have allowed the Minister adequate time to make a full reply.

11.55 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) for raising this important matter. I was aware of his considerable interest through correspondence I have had with him. I was sorry to learn of the difficulties encountered by his constituent following the deaths of both his brother and sister-in-law. The case concerns the dissatisfaction of the hon. Member's constituent, Mr. McManus, with the Law Society's handling of a complaint alleging professional misconduct against the solicitor who handled the estate of his late brother and sister-in-law.

Although the hon. Gentleman has given an extremely clear exposition of the facts, this is a complicated case, and I should like to run briefly through the main points. The background is as follows. The constituent's brother died in October 1986 without leaving a will. There were no children of the brother's marriage, so his whole estate passed to his widow. The widow in turn died in November 1986, also without leaving a will. As a consequence of her death without leaving a will, her whole estate passed to her relatives, and Mr. McManus and his sister were not entitled to any part of that estate.

Shortly after the death of her husband, a solicitor was called to the home of the widow and was instructed to take action to wind up her husband's estate and to prepare a will for her. Subsequent to that meeting, the health of the widow deteriorated rapidly until she herself died the following month. It is alleged by witnesses that, during the period between the meeting at the family home and the widow's death, numerous attempts were made to contact the solicitor to have him call upon her and prepare a will.

In a total of five sworn statements, two witnesses claimed to have visited the solicitor at his office on two occasions to advise him of the lady's failing health and her concern that he had not called upon her in connection with the preparation of a will. It is further claimed by those witnesses that, had a will been drawn up, in all probability the estate of the deceased would have passed to Mr. McManus and his sister. Mr. McManus complained to the Law Society of Scotland about the solicitor's handling of his sister-in-law's instructions as regards her will.

For the benefit of the House, it may be worth while if I explain the general procedure for handling complaints against solicitors. These are a matter in the first instance for the Law Society of Scotland, which under the Solicitors (Scotland) Act 1980 has a general duty to promote the interests of the solicitor profession in Scotland and the interests of the public in relation to that profession. The Law Society will investigate a complaint made to it and has power in the case of a justified complaint to refuse to renew a solicitor's practising certificate, which he or she needs to practise, or at any rate to issue one subject to conditions.

If the Law Society considers that there has been professional misconduct by the solicitor, it may refer the case to the independent Scottish solicitors' discipline tribunal which has power to censure, fine, suspend or strike off the solicitor concerned. The Law Society can also provide a "troubleshooter", who is a solicitor prepared to take action on behalf of a complainer against another solicitor—for example, for negligence.

Should the complainer remain dissatisfied with the Law Society's handling of the complaint after the society has reached its final decision, it is open to the complainer to approach the lay observer for Scotland, who is an independent person appointed by the Secretary of State, to examine complaints about the Law Society's handling of allegations against solicitors. The lay observer, who sees the Law Society's files, can issue an opinion analysing the case and setting out her conclusions, which may include recommendations that the Law Society should take certain action on the complaint. However, the lay observer's opinions are not legally binding upon the Law Society. As the Minister responsible for matters affecting the solicitors' profession, I have general oversight of these arrangements, but am not involved in decisions about individual cases.

Returning to the case raised by the hon. Gentleman, his constituent took all the appropriate steps in pursuit of his complaint. He approached the Law Society for Scotland but, dissatisfied with the way in which it handled his allegations, he took his case to the lay observer for Scotland. The lay observer's opinion expressed concern about a number of aspects of the Law Society's handling of the investigation.

First, the Law Society's investigating committee had taken the view that the solicitor's failure to see his client and take instructions for the preparation of a will in urgent circumstances amounted to serious professional misconduct, and it recommended to the council of the Law Society that the solicitor should be prosecuted before the Scottish solicitors discipline tribunal. The council referred the case back to the committee for reconsideration and the committee then decided that its previous recommendation to prosecute was inappropriate but that a reprimand be issued. The decision to reprimand was accepted by the Council "subject to interview". The solicitor was invited to an interview to restate and elaborate upon the information already provided.

At this point, the society received a submission from a solicitor who was also a member of the society's council supporting the solicitor in respect of whom the complaint had been made, disputing strongly that there had been professional misconduct and questioning the issue of a reprimand. It is recorded in the minutes of the investigating committee and the committee was not influenced by this submission. The solicitor, supported by his legal representative, was interviewed by a panel of the Law Society and, in the light of the information put forward at that interview, the council of the society ultimately decided that the proposed reprimand should be withdrawn. The complainer was informed of the outcome and was sent a full extract from the record of the interview. This was the Law Society's final decision.

As a result of her consideration of the case, the lay observer questioned several aspects of the Law Society's procedure: first, the apparent practice of taking disciplinary action "subject to interview" with the solicitor concerned; secondly, the timing of such interviews; thirdly, the dismissal of evidence contained in five sworn statements from witnesses on the basis of an interview with the solicitor; fourthly, the fact that the complainer was not given an opportunity to comment personally on the points put forward at the solicitor's interview; and, fifthly, the involvement of a council member in presenting personally a case on behalf of a solicitor against whom a complaint had been made. The lay observer noted in particular that failure to give the complainer an opportunity to comment personally on the points put forward at the solicitor's interview was a frequent source of concern to her and that she intended to raise the point in her annual report to the Secretary of State.

The complainer sought the assistance of a troubleshooter to establish whether the facts of the case entitled him, as someone who would have benefited from his late sister-in-law's will, had she made one, to raise an action against the solicitor based upon professional negligence. The troubleshooter took the view that, under existing legislation, even if the solicitor had been negligent, such an action would have little chance of success if pursued through the courts, because the complainer in this case was not the client of the solicitor. In other words, the solicitor was not employed by the complainer for the purpose of preparing a will for his late sister-in-law. A further point at issue, which was derived from the sworn statements of witnesses but which can only remain speculative, is whether the complainer's sister-in-law, had she made a will, would have excluded succession by her sister and bequeathed her estate to the complainer and his sister.

It would seem that the hon. Gentleman's constituent has exhausted the existing procedures for pursuing his complaint against the solicitor concerned. The lay observer has, as she promised, drawn attention to certain aspects of the Law Society's practice in relation to complaints procedures as highlighted by this case and others like it in her annual report for 1987 which she presented to the Secretary of State for Scotland in March.

I can assure the hon. Member that the Secretary of State and I pay very close attention to the views expressed by the lay observer in her annual reports and to all representations about the Law Society's handling of complaints. The legislation governing solicitors' complaints is kept under continuous review. I understand from the Law Society that it has now changed its procedures so that the complainer will have an opportunity to comment on any points made by the solicitor, no matter at what stage. That was one of the hon. Gentleman's key points about this case.

I should stress that the Law Society's present complaints procedures are geared to alleged professional misconduct. They may be compared with the role of police officers in investigating crime. They are not essentially about civil remedies or making good a loss to a complainer. So even if the solicitor had been found guilty of misconduct, and perhaps fined, he could not have been obliged to make any payment to Mr. McManus.

As regards a civil remedy or recompense, the troubleshooter is firmly of the opinion that no contractual relationship existed between Mr. McManus and his sister-in-law's solicitor and that therefore the solicitor had no professional obligations towards him. A solicitor certainly has a duty of care for the interests of a third party, such as a beneficiary. In this case, however, since his late sister-in-law did not leave a will, Mr. McManus could not be regarded as a beneficiary, despite the assertions of witnesses about the late Mrs. McManus's intentions.

It seems to me that there are no circumstances, therefore, in which the question of ex gratia payments or compensation can arise in this case, which is of course a very unusual one. The legislation governing the procedures for dealing with complaints against solicitors already makes provision for the payment of compensation in certain cases, which I went into thoroughly.

The Scottish solicitors guarantee fund, administered by the Law Society, to which all practising solicitors in Scotland must contribute as a condition of receiving their practising certificate, exists for the purpose of making grants in order to compensate persons who in the opinion of the Law Society suffer pecuniary loss by reason of dishonesty on the part of any solicitor, employee of a solicitor or an incorporated practice. Also, in the interests of consumer protection, the Law Society requires that all practising solicitors must take out and maintain an insurance policy under the society's master policy for the purpose of providing indemnity against any class of professional liability.

In Mr. McManus's case, it seems to me that he would be unlikely to qualify for redress from the guarantee fund for two reasons. First, the Law Society's investigations failed to produce any evidence of dishonesty on the part of the solicitor against whom complaint had been made. Secondly, it cannot be said that Mr. McManus lost his own money as a result of the actions of the solicitor. In the case of recompense through the indemnity fund, the troubleshooter has advised strongly against Mr. McManus raising an action for damages because of the cost involved and on the grounds that he would be unlikely to succeed as he was not a direct beneficiary.

As the hon. Gentleman will be aware from recent correspondence, one important recommendation made by the lay observer in her 1986 annual report was that she should have powers to refer complaints direct to the Scottish solicitors discipline tribunal when she believes that the Law Society has reached a faulty decision. This recommendation has been incorporated into the provisions of the Solicitors (Scotland) Bill which is currently before the House. The Bill is sponsored by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and has benefited from Government assistance with drafting, and I strongly support it.

The Law Society of Scotland has demonstrated a strong case for introducing this Bill in the current Session so as to give it the powers it desires as quickly as possible. I recognise the point made by the hon. Member for Motherwell, South that he would have preferred the Government to do this. Unfortunately, pressure on the legislative programme meant that there was no Government time available to devote to the Bill. We were pleased to give drafting assistance for a private Member's Bill as the most appropriate method of bringing these provisions, which are considered to be worth while by hon. Members from all sides of the House, into force at the earliest convenient opportunity. The first solicitors' Bill was a private Member's Bill.

As the hon. Gentleman will know, the handling of the Bill is the responsibility of the Member promoting it. The Bill is designed, among other things, to extend the powers of the council of the Law Society and the discipline tribunal to enable them to deal with cases of inadequate professional services in addition to cases of professional misconduct as at present. The Bill would also enable such complaints to be made not only by the solicitor's client but by anyone having an interest in the services provided by the solicitor. It is intended that the Bill will come into effect six months after enactment, but its provisions will not be retrospective except in relation to services whose provision is continuing. It would not be appropriate to impose penalties on solicitors under the new arrangements for work carried out before the new disciplinary powers had been defined and set in place.

I fully recognise that these legislative proposals cannot benefit the hon. Gentleman's constituent. Beyond empowering the lay observer to report a case to the discipline tribunal, I do not think that they would help Mr. McManus directly, since he was not a beneficiary of a will. Nevertheless, his case was very much in mind in the drafting of the Bill and I hope that the assistance we have provided for the Bill will stand as evidence of our concern that these matters should be properly regulated, and of our willingness to take action when the circumstances require it.

It is very much to the credit of the hon. Gentleman that he has taken this case as far as it is possible to take it. This case has highlighted the need for reform in a number of areas. It highlights, for example the capacity of anyone having an interest both to report complaints to the Law

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

Society and discipline tribunal and also to have the opportunity to respond to new evidence put before the Law Society on behalf of the solicitor.

These reforms are being introduced in the first case by the Solicitors (Scotland) Bill and in the second case by the reformed practices of the Law Society. This leads to the question whether reform should be retrospective. The case against retrospective legislation is that it is very difficult to observe a law that is not enacted, not in force and not known about. Furthermore, it is unfair to expect solicitors to conform to laws that are not in existence. While I sympathise very much with the hon. Gentleman's constituent, the disadvantages of retrospective legislation outweigh any possible advantage to his constituent. None the less, the hon. Gentleman and his constituent can take some consolation from the reality that their perseverance and dedication were factors giving rise to the terms of the Solicitors (Scotland) Bill, which I hope will receive its Third Reading before long.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Nationality Applications

1. Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has now been made on clearing the backlog of nationality applications at Lunar house; and if he will make a statement.

5. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the present backlog of applications for British nationality.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Tim Renton): Good progress is being made. All applications received before 31 December have been acknowledged and passports and other documents returned to applicants.

We still face a formidable task in dealing with some 268,000 outstanding citizenship applications. They include over 80,000 naturalisation applications and 187,000 for registration as British citizens. To deal with the latter we have decided to establish a new nationality office in Liverpool, where we will create over 100 new jobs. Suitable accommodation has been identified and negotiations for its lease are in hand.

It will not be practicable to reach decisions on all the registration applications by the end of the year, as the Select Committee on Home Affairs has recommended, but I am confident that a substantial proportion will be decided by April 1989 and the remainder during the following 12 months.

Mr. Hanley: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the progress that has been made and the staff at Lunar house on meeting their immense task. Does my hon. Friend agree that the heavy work load at Lunar house was the result of more than 250,000 people leaving it until the last minute, having been given seven years within which they could have applied? Does my hon. Friend also agree that publicity should be given earlier to help not only the staff at Lunar house but those who have made applications? Would it not be sensible to do that with passports, where early application is always sensible?

Mr. Renton: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. I shall pass his congratulations on to the staff and management at Lunar house, who have worked hard to deal with the great mountain of work that arrived, particularly in the last weeks of December.

Active publicity to remind people that registration for citizenship applications had to be in by the end of last year started fairly early in 1987. I was pressed to increase the advertising and the number of leaflets to ensure that everyone knew, and that was done. Such was the success of the advertising campaign that we received a great many nationalisation applications—more than usual—even though there was no deadline.

Mr. Turner: Will the Minister show some humility, in view of the answer that he has just given, to the plight of those 280,000 people who are suffering indignity, frustration and anxiety as a result of the Government's incompetence? Irrespective of his announcement about the 100 new jobs, when will he reach out to those who at present believe themselves to be stateless, respond to their requirements and do the necessary and honourable thing?

Mr. Renton: As the House will know, I am a naturally humble person. However, most of the people who applied —100,000 in December alone—had waited five years before the deadline was announced before submitting their applications. They were in no hurry to apply. The hon. Gentleman must realise that application for British citizenship is important and should not be decided in a great hurry. In the intervening period, while their applications are being processed, we have told them many times that they will lose nothing by way of social security, pension, housing benefits or voting rights, so they have nothing to worry about. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will pass that message on to his constituents.

Mr. Budgen: Does my hon. Friend realise that those hon. Members who represent constituencies which contain many immigrants could have told him that there would be a flood of applications? We recognise that those applications should be dealt with properly, if necessary, by employing a large number of temporary assistants.

Mr. Renton: My hon. Friend's expertise on this matter is very different from that of officials in the immigration and nationality department at Lunar house. They took advice from a number of people in 1986 and were advised that most of the people who wanted British citizenship under the registration procedures had already applied in previous years.

The Department has increased its administrative divisions by 300 posts in the past three years. One hundred and eighty clerical staff were recruited last year, and over 300 applications for clerical posts are being processed at present. I assure my hon. Friend that we are making every effort to increase the staff complement.

Mr. Madden: Why did the Minister reject the urgent advice given to him by senior members of his own staff last summer that the arrangements for dealing with the inevitable number of applications were wholly insufficient? He is also the victim of justified criticism from the Select Committee on Home Affairs which roundly criticised him for presiding over an administrative shambles when the Government had several years to plan for this. The hon. Gentleman should have appointed the necessary staff to deal with the applications. He has failed and he should resign.

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman has again made his Second Reading speech on the Immigration Bill. There is no record of the trade union side at Lunar house having given officials and management such advice. When I met trade union officials at Lunar house in early February, they did not wish to recommend the staff at Lunar house even to do overtime. The management had to work extremely hard to persuade the staff to do overtime.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not clear that, if present trends continue, accommodation will have to be found in this country over the next 10 years for about 500,000 new immigrants? What provision are the Government making in their costings for assisting those areas of the country, to which the immigrants are likely to come, to provide additional housing, schools and hospitals?

Mr. Renton: As my hon. Friend will realise, that is a matter not so much for the Home Office as for the Department of the Environment. However, we are actively engaged in a number of initiatives—for example, an inner cities initiative to help those who have recently arrived in this country to become involved in their own small businesses. Last year the number arriving here for permanent settlement was 45,000—the lowest for many years and only about half of what it was in the 1970s.

Mr. Randall: Is the Minister aware that 60 per cent. of telephone calls coming into Lunar house are wholly ignored, not even being received on a telephone answering machine? How does he justify that policy?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman's remarks are out of date. The telephone inquiry bureau has shown a marked improvement in recent weeks, and an improvement was certainly needed.

Mr. Randall: Since I have been there.

Mr. Renton: A few weeks ago the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) visited Lunar house, and they spent the greater part of their time, according to the Observer, looking for a photo opportunity in front of the mail bags. That may have been of great help to becoming a political tennis star, but it did nothing to help the problems of Lunar house.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an important matter, but I hope that we can now proceed more rapidly.

IBA and BBC (Chairmen)

2. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority and the chairman of the British Broadcasting Corporation; and what matters were discussed.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I am in regular touch with both chairmen on a wide range of broadcasting matters.

Mr. Howarth: Next time my right hon. Friend meets the two gentlemen concerned, will he remind them that those who broadcast to the nation are part of the nation, not an elitist super race apart? Will he further remind them that it is they who act as censors and that the new Broadcasting Standards Council will serve as a vital test of accountability towards the viewer, which is badly needed? Does my right hon. Friend consider that one best suited to serve that accountability purpose may be Mrs. Mary Whitehouse?

Mr. Hurd: Mrs. Whitehouse's role in this matter has been well recognised. The truth is that it has been difficult to portray Sir William Rees-Mogg convincingly either as a gauleiter or as a vandal. I hope that as the waves subside on this matter he can get on with the broadcasting authorities and work out how the new council will operate in practice. We can judge a little later what the statutory definition and power should be.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that there is a further question about the Broadcasting Standards Council.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: When the Secretary of State next meets the chairmen of the IBA and BBC, will he congratulate them on the continuing high standard of broadcasting in the United Kingdom and assure them of his support to ensure that their independence is not compromised?

Mr. Hurd: Indeed, Sir. When we publish a White Paper on television, which will probably not be until the autumn, the hon. and learned Gentleman will see the huge change that will come over television in the form of greatly expanded choice for viewers, going well beyond the present scope of the BBC and IBA. We must deregulate to make that wider choice available, while keeping a grip on standards.

Mr. Stanbrook: In the light of the decision by the two authorities to allow a television broadcast giving a one-sided account of the Gibraltar incident, is my right hon. Friend satisfied that those two authorities serve the public interest? Should there not be a review of who is to determine public interest, rather than leave it to a group of nominated people and programme makers who are not elected to that capacity?

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made it clear to both chairmen, in his letters about showing the programmes on Gibraltar, that he was appealing to them on grounds of responsibility rather than law. My view is that it is for the broadcasting authorities to discharge their duties in this area and that they are helped rather than hindered by a robust give-and-take between broadcasters and politicians.

Mr. Winnick: Leaving aside the obvious and continuous vendetta by many Tories against the broadcasting authorities, in his talks with the chairmen of those authorities did the Home Secretary mention that he would make it far more difficult for retired people to get a concessionary television licence? Does the Secretary of State realise that his statement in his written answer that appears in yesterday's Hansard will be greeted with disgust by many retired people who will now find it more difficult to obtain a concessionary television licence fee? Why should not all pensioners be able to claim a concessionary television licence fee on the lines that I proposed in my Bill that was defeated?

Mr. Hurd: If we did what the hon. Gentleman suggests, the cost to other licence holders, many of whom are worse off than pensioners, would be substantial. The hon. Gentleman has not thought the matter through. We had to deal with the unsatisfactory 5p concessionary licence. We could not abolish it without substantial grievance and hardship. The solution that I outlined yesterday is sensible and fair in the circumstances.

Terrorism

3. Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further measures he is taking to co-ordinate action against terrorism, in the light of recent events.

Mr. Hurd: The Government have taken and will continue to take a leading role in international co-operation to prevent and fight terrorism. I shall be meeting Interior and Justice Ministers of the Trevi Group on 3 June at Munich and we shall take stock of a number of recent improvements in European co-operation in this area and, I dare say, discuss further proposals. Within the United Kingdom I believe that there is effective co-operation between the police and other agencies concerned.

Mr. McLoughlin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 is important? Is it not a great shame, bearing in mind the important fight against terrorism, that the official Opposition refused to support the Act although they supported it when they were in office? They have opposed it only since they have become the Opposition.

Mr. Hurd: The Opposition not only supported the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984; they invented it. We will have to produce and put before the House a new Prevention of Terrorism Bill because the old one is coming towards the end of its five-year life. That will give the Opposition a chance to reflect and take stock. Reinforcing my hon. Friend's comments, it would considerably strengthen the nation's efforts against terrorism if Opposition Members could bring themselves to change their position yet again and support a robust measure.

Mr. McCusker: Does the Secretary of State agree that sentencing policy should play a major part in the fight against terrorism? In the Secretary of State's view, what conditions should a convicted terrorist have to meet to qualify for remission of sentence?

Mr. Hurd: That depends on the offence for which the terrorist was convicted. If the hon. Gentleman wants to draw specific cases or instances to my attention or to that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, I hope that he will do so.

Mr. Burt: As regards international terrorism, will my right hon. Friend assure the House that he and his international colleagues will bend their minds to the difficult question of press and television coverage of incidents like the recent hijacking? Does he agree that the considerable publicity given to hijackers' demands can sometimes contribute to the problems of terrorism? Will he consider the difficult area of censorship associated with that problem?

Mr. Hurd: I agree that it is a difficult and sensitive area. It is a matter not so much of censorship as of responsibility. Obviously the broadcasting media in any free society need to report the news with some calculation of the consequences of their actions in what they do and do not show. That matter needs consideration.

Mr. Cryer: Does the Home Secretary accept that pressure from the Common Market will mean the removal of all internal barriers by 1992? Is he satisfied that adequate precautions will be taken to scrutinise people to detect terrorists and the movement of drugs after 1992? Does he further accept that while he may have reservations about this, many member states want the complete removal of barriers, whatever the consequences for the increase of international drug trafficking and terrorism?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has made a very important point. Fortunately, we are not alone in stressing its importance. The Single European Act, from which the movement towards 1992 flowed, made it clear that member states must be free to continue to take effective measures against terrorists and drug traffickers. In all our detailed discussions on the movement towards 1992—for example, regarding the Channel tunnel—it will be important to maintain effective controls for those purposes.

Mr. Marlow: What is the media's role in the fight against terrorism? It would seem that they compete with each other in providing entertainment for the public rather than an objective review of the facts. What can be done to prevent the media from providing gratuitous support for acts of terrorism?

Mr. Hurd: The media need to consider carefully, whether in Northern Ireland or elsewhere, the distinction between reporting the news—letting the citizen know what is happening, without disguising the fact that we live in a brutal and violent world—and adding gratuitously to scenes of violence, thus providing, according to Lord Annan's description when he discussed this matter, additional publicity which serves the terrorist without actually adding in any way to the information of the citizen.

Broadcasting Standards Council

4. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has yet decided on the terms of reference for the Broadcasting Standards Council.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out the terms of reference for the Broadcasting Standards Council in his statement to the House on 16 May.

Mr. Morley: Is the Minister aware that on 16 May the Secretary of State failed to give an assurance to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) that the Broadcasting Standards Council would not interfere with the political and current affairs contents of programmes and would restrict itself to standards of decency? Is he further aware that there is a great deal of anxiety that the council will duplicate what already exists simply so that the Government can manipulate it? The Government already have the press in their pocket. Can the Minister give the House a categorical assurance that the broadcasting authorities will be free to comment as they see fit?

Mr. Renton: Of course broadcasting authorities will be free to comment as they see fit. They have already commented and made known their views on the setting up of the Broadcasting Standards Council. Doubtless it is right that they should have that democratic right, and that will continue.

On his first point, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. When my right hon. Friend announced the setting up of the council, he described its remit and said that it was strictly confined to questions of sex, violence and standards of taste and decency. When asked whether it would be possible for those powers to be added to or diminished, he made the point that the council's role will be debated in the House—for example, in the course of future legislation. I have no doubt that at that time hon. Members on both sides of the House will seek to add to or diminish its powers.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my hon. Friend aware that many parents in Britain are angry about the steady diet of pornography, near-pornography and violence that is fed to their children on practically a nightly basis and fed up with the whining and whingeing of the broadcasting authorities which have been given plenty of opportunities to put their house in order, but have deliberately refused to do so?

Mr. Renton: I agree with my hon. the learned Friend. It was because of that anxiety that, in our election manifesto a year ago, we committed ourselves to bringing forward proposals for stronger and more effective arrangements. That is what we are now doing. I hope that the Broadcasting Standards Council will prove the cure to the disease. If so, its setting up will prove a worthwhile exercise.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am sure that the Prime Minister wants to make the BBC as fair and impartial as The Sun and the Daily Mail. How long will the Broadcasting Standards Council exist on a non-statutory basis, and how much will Sir William Rees-Mogg be paid as chairman of that censorship body?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman is wrong to refer to the council as a censorship body. Its purpose to reflect the views of and receive complaints from the public on programme content and decency. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has constituents, as I have, who will be pleased that an outside body is now looking at such complaints.

Sir William Rees-Mogg will receive a salary at the outset of £30,000 a year. We are setting up the council on a non-statutory basis so that it can get on with its work straight away. If legislation is needed to reinforce its work, that will be incorporated in the major broadcasting Bill that we shall bring before Parliament in due course.

Electronic Tagging

6. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on proposals to use electronic tagging for remand prisoners.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): We have received correspondence from interested bodies suggesting various uses for electronic tagging, including its use for people remanded on bail. We are making inquiries into the systems which are available and considering what applications they might usefully have.

Mrs. Bottomley: I thank my hon. Friend for his open-minded response. Does he agree that when one fifth of the prison population are on remand, and when two thirds of the women and one third of the men on remand do not subsequently receive custodial sentences, in the interests of civil liberty, cost saving and public confidence it is right that the tagging option should be explored? Will he join me in condemning the knee-jerk reaction of the Labour party, which is only too anxious to complain about the size of the remand population, but which looks with a closed mind at any prospect of tackling it?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend that the Opposition do not have an idea between them about dealing with the remand problem. Electronic tagging, subject to many safeguards, may be extremely useful in enabling people to be kept on remand outside the prison system. I am sure that that would be welcomed by all Members.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Minister agree that some courts may be less willing than others to have people tagged by the attachment of an object, either voluntarily or compulsorily, to their arms or legs? Will the Home Office consider alternatives, including the provision of the equivalent of a paging device in the accused's home, which would allow the police to make spot checks on a remanded person's whereabouts?

Mr. Patten: The hon. and learned Gentleman, unlike many of the hon. Gentlemen surrounding him, is extremely open-minded and is at least prepared to examine proposals aimed at achieving a reduction in the prison population. He may agree with me that asking people to carry an electronic tag or a paging device would be less of an intrusion into civil liberties than putting them in gaol.

Mr Wheeler: Does my hon. Friend agree that technological developments now make it possible for a variety of strategies to be considered under the general umbrella of tagging? Does he agree also that, as this debate continues, even probation officers are beginning to recognise the advantage of keeping people out of prison, and perhaps some people out of remand centres, by the adoption of such technology?

Mr. Patten: The technologies are developing rapidly and I agree with my hon. Friend that the probation service now has a golden opportunity to move centre stage in dealing with remand prisoners and with others who might otherwise be sent to gaol for committing non-violent, non-serious crimes.

Remand Centre (North Wales)

7. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans his Department has to establish a remand centre in north Wales.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): None at present. Last month the Prisons Building Board invited the private sector to submit outline proposals for the construction of urban remand centres. The responses are still being evaluated, but any new remand centres are likely to be sited in the main conurbations.

Mr. Jones: Is the Minister aware that the majority of remand prisoners in north Wales are held at Risley remand centre, which is a considerable distance from that region's rural areas? There is also concern about the conditions at Risley. Is the Minister not worried about the terrible inconvenience caused to the families of remand prisoners in having to travel the distances involved, as well as that caused to their solicitors and to the prisoners themselves? Will he review his decision and consider providing remand facilities in north Wales?

Mr. Hogg: There is a place in the building programme for a prison at Wrexham. Unfortunately, that proposal has not been received with complete enthusiasm by the local representatives. I hope that the point made by the hon. Gentleman will be considered by local residents.

Criminal Cases (Right to Silence)

8. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to alter the present right to silence of suspects and defendants in criminal cases.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) yesterday.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister agree that, while the mass of police interrogations are carried out in an exemplary manner, there have been worrying cases of alleged confessions that have afterwards been found to be false? This can be seen in the conclusions of the Mars-Jones inquiry. Examples are the Timothy Evans case and the Confait case, in which several youths, one mentally retarded, were alleged to have made confessions which were afterwards found to be false. Does the Minister not consider that any decision on ending the right to silence is premature, and that in attempting to create a law to deal with hardened criminals he is putting at grave peril the interests of the weak, the inadequate and the innocent?

Mr. Patten: The weak, the inadequate and the innocent are well covered by the codes of practice in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The hon. Gentleman is right. This is a complex subject, and that is why my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced an inquiry yesterday.

Mr. Hind: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for the comprehensive answer that he gave to my written question yesterday. When my hon. Friend assesses this problem, will he look very carefully at the Criminal Law Revision Committee report of 1972, bearing in mind that when the right to silence was introduced there were no solicitors in police stations or at interviews, or any tape recordings? We must keep pace with the new advances in technology and the changes in the laws of evidence.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right. Since the CLRC reported in 1972 many changes have taken place, both in legislation, such as the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, and in technology, such as the universal introduction of tape recording in police stations, which we hope to have in place by 1991. These are complex issues, however, and that is why my right hon. Friend said in answer to my hon. Friend's question yesterday that he would look into the matter as soon as possible.

Mrs. Taylor: Does the Minister not realise that there is widespread concern about the proposed erosion of the principle that someone is innocent until proved guilty? Why is the Home Secretary going ahead with the abolition of the right to silence before the results of the Government-funded research are published? Is it not irresponsible to make such a fundamental change to our criminal procedures without first obtaining all the evidence that is available? If the Government are willing to spend money on research, why are they not willing to wait until the findings of that research are forthcoming?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Lady is a little confused about the issues. My right hon. and learned Friend is not proposing to abolish the right to silence. He is proposing to set up a committee to look into the possibilities of abolishing the "right to ambush", by which I mean a defendant introducing into a trial at the last minute a line of defence that has not been previously disclosed. This often means that a prosecution case collapses, and sometimes people with a case to answer go free.

Remand System

9. Mr. Sackville: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish his Green Paper on plans to introduce the private sector into the remand system.

Mr. Hurd: Before the summer recess. We are also moving forward with the selection and appointment of management consultants to help in examining the practical issues.

Mr. Sackville: Does my right hon. Friend agree that because of overcrowding, drug abuse and other serious problems affecting our prisons it is unwise and inappropriate to expose unconvicted men and women to such a system? We have a lot to learn from certain American states about the treatment of remand prisoners.

Mr. Hurd: I think that my hon. Friend is probably right. I believe that the new bail hostels that I have announced will help, but I hope that we can bring the private sector into the business of not only constructing, but possibly managing, remand centres. We have asked the private sector for ideas on design and on quick methods of constructing open prisons and remand centres. We have had 30 responses, which I find encouraging. The Prisons Building Board will go through the responses and work out the proposals in greater detail.

Mr. Ashby: Will my right hon. Friend consider very carefully the close involvement of the private sector in the design and building of special remand centres? Will he also consider the smaller, localised remand centre, perhaps attached to or close to a court, or group of courts, so that there can be speedy access to people in custody and they can be remanded without the problem of having to go to distant police stations or prisons?

Mr. Hurd: The answer to my hon. Friend's first question is yes. His second suggestion is well worth considering in the Green Paper that we are preparing.

Police Officers (Prosecutions)

10. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of police forces have, for each year since 1974, been (a) tried and (b) convicted for conspiring to pervert the cause of justice.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The available information about criminal charges brought against police officers does not identify separately charges of conspiracy to pervert the course of justice, and I regret that the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wray: Does the Minister agree that there has been much anxiety about a number of cases over the years, culminating in two recent cases, the Chelsea gang case, and the Stirton case, where the dubious fabricated evidence has cost the taxpayer money? Will the Home Secretary review the present arrangements, by bringing out a Green Paper?

Mr. Hogg: There is absolutely no need.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Does my hon. Friend agree that the very small proportion of police officers who attempt to pervert the course of justice is symptomatic of what a good police force we have? Does he agree also that it compares favourably with police forces abroad, and that we should be concerned about the number of police officers who are injured?

Mr. Hogg: Absolutely.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why is the Police Federation so reluctant to give legal support to Inspector Woollard? Does the federation believe that if he were to go to court some police officers would be prosecuted for offences?

Mr. Hogg: I should be inclined to ask the chairman of the Police Federation.

Double Parking Offences

11. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many vehicle owners have been convicted of double parking in London in the past 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Drivers who double park may be charged with the offences of breaching waiting restrictions, unnecessary obstruction or leaving a vehicle in a dangerous position. In the Metropolitan and City police force areas there were over 11,500 convictions for these offences and nearly 2·7 million fixed penalty notices were issued. These offences may also be committed by persons who have not double parked, and I regret that it is not possible to identify double parking cases within these total figures.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware of the serious shortage of parking spaces in London and the increase in double parking for that reason? What view does he take of parking tickets being issued at 4 am and 5 am when people have double parked for short periods because no other parking is available? Will he take steps to see that more parking is made available, so that double parking may cease?

Mr. Hogg: I suspect that the case to which my hon. Friend is referring reinforces his belief that it is best to travel to work on a horse.

Firearms

12. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to break down future statistics for the use of firearms in the commission of crimes between those that are, or are not, held on firearm or shotgun certificates.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is not practicable, because many firearms used in offences are either not recovered or have had their serial numbers or distinguishing marks removed. There is no way of telling, therefore, whether they were originally held on a firearm or on a shotgun certificate.

Mr. Boswell: Given the considerable burdens that the new legislation will impose on legitimate shooters, will my hon. Friend reconsider whether he could publish as much as possible about the difference between guns which are held legally and those which are not known to be held legally, and whether he can measure as far as possible the leakage of legitimate guns, badly stored, into the illegitimate sector?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend will find two provisions in the Bill which will reassure him: first, the requirement for shotgun owners to identify and list their guns; and, secondly, the additional obligation on dealers to keep their registers for five years.

Official Secrets Act

13. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement on his proposals for the reform of the Official Secrets Acts.

Mr. Hurd: I hope, as already stated, to lay before Parliament next month a White Paper setting out the Government's proposals for the reform of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911.

Mr. Cohen: Can the Home Secretary give precise details of the timetable? Reform has been promised for eight or nine years. He was party to the punishing of his own Back Benchers some weeks ago, and precisely laid out on BBC radio some days after that what the White Paper would contain. Can he set out a timetable for the Bill after the White Paper and what consultations are likely?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has got the history wrong. We restarted work on this in April of last year. I said, I think for the first time in December last year when my hon. Friend's Bill was debated, that we intended to lay before Parliament next month a White Paper. That is still our intention.

Law and Order Budget

14. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the law and order budget within his Department for 1988-89; what was the comparable budget for the last 10 years; and what proportion of the budget is devoted to police manpower costs.

Mr. Hurd: The Home Office law and order budget for 1988-89 is £5,098 million, of which 61 per cent. is devoted to police manpower costs. I will, with permission, circulate in the Official Report the figures for the Home Office law and order budget for previous years.

Mr. Sumberg: Are not those figures proof-positive of the Government's commitment to the police force? Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning those Left-wing Labour councils throughout the country which knock the police constantly, spend ratepayers' resources on that and thus destroy the safety of law-abiding citizens whom they are supposed to represent?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. There are still too many snipers of the police about, and unfortunately some of them are still on the Opposition Benches.

The figures are as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	1,556
1979-80	1,971
1980-81	2,412
1981-82	2,855
1982-83	3,166
1983-84	3,462
1984-85	3,921
1985-86	3,967
1986-87	4,308
1987-88	[1]4,832
1988-89	5,098

[1] Estimated outturn.

This is the gross expenditure in England and Wales on police, prisons, the magistrates' courts, the probation service and the criminal injuries compensation scheme.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Powell: Will the Prime Minister reflect on the reception that she received last Saturday at Hampden park? Does she now realise that some of her decisions are even worse than the referee's? Last Tuesday, when she replied to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell), she stated that everyone in the country had enjoyed increased prosperity. Will she explain why, in 1979, my constituents in Ogmore were employed in the steel works and in the mines and were earning £150 to £240 a week, whereas many are now on the dole and have been unemployed for five years, as have 2 million others? How can she say that they are enjoying increased prosperity?

The Prime Minister: The answers to the parts of the question that I was able to hear are, first, that I very much enjoyed the game at Hampden park and the visit to the flower festival in the morning, and we had an excellent conference the night before. Secondly, everyone has participated in the increased prosperity. Average earnings are very much up, taxation is very much down, personal allowances are very much increased, social security benefits have increased enormously and so have the health services.

Mr. Stokes: Will my right hon. Friend consider whether any action can be taken against the BBC and ITV for their attitude towards the security forces in the fight against terrorism? Would any other country tolerate such behaviour, and is not their action a stab in the back for the nation?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is very well aware, if there are any complaints they should be made, not to me, but to the BBC complaints authority or to the chairman.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister satisfied with the effect on the pound/deutschmark rate of the interest rate —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It takes up a lot of time.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister satisfied with the effect on the pound/deutschmark rate of the interest rate cut on Tuesday?

The Prime Minister: I made a very comprehensive statement on Tuesday. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to know the unwisdom of asking direct questions about the exchange rate, he should see what happened when certain Labour Back Benchers, who later became Front Benchers, asked such questions of—as they are now—Lord Wilson and Lord Callaghan. It was absolutely catastrophic. I have nothing to add to the statement that I made on Tuesday.

Mr. Kinnock: Now perhaps the Prime Minister will give us the answer. Is she satisfied that D 3·17 to the pound is sustainable, or unsustainable?

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add. I commend to the right hon. Gentleman the references that I made. He will learn a great deal from them.

Mr. William Powell: Now that we have seen yet another substantial fall in unemployment as a result of the Government's policies, will my right hon. Friend reflect on the fact that it was in March 1979 that the closure of Corby steel works was announced and 8,000 people lost their jobs in my constituency? Today, the number of people out of work and claiming benefit in Corby town has fallen below 2,000 for the first time.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. Corby is an excellent example of a town undergoing the necessary reconstruction of a major industry and having the enterprise to find new jobs for the people there, and a new prosperity. I congratulate my hon. Friend.

Q2. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fisher: In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) the Prime Minister referred to income tax being very much lower. How does she justify the fact that as a direct result of the tax loopholes and tax advantages that her Government have created, a 51-year-old man earning £1 million a year can apparently pay no income tax? How is that a fair tax system, and what will she do to close those loopholes?

The Prime Minister: Under the new tax system those at the top of the scale pay a bigger proportion of the total amount than they did previously. I commend to the hon. Gentleman the speech of the New Zealand Socialist Minister for Finance, who has now made the top rate of tax 33p in the pound. One of the reasons for that is that he believes it is good for the people at the bottom of the pile to have a higher standard of living.

New Zealand Butter

Q3. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if the next meeting of the European Council will discuss the special arrangements for the import of New Zealand butter; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I am not aware of any plans to do so.

Mr. Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend fight hard to prevent the EEC further cutting New Zealand butter imports and depriving British housewives of freedom of choice, particularly as New Zealand has never let Britain down when we have been in trouble? Will she bear in mind the massive damage being done to New Zealand, Australia and the Third world by the Common Market spending over £200 million of taxpayers' money every week dumping butter on the world market at 6p a pound?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, we have done more than any other Government to get the surpluses under control in the Common Market, in particular at the last meeting that we had, because we were very much aware of the truth of what my hon. Friend said. The surpluses affect other countries which depend to a considerable extent upon the export of agricultural products. The New Zealand butter agreement will come up again shortly for examination and we expect the Commission to make proposals. New Zealand exports far less butter to Britain than it used to do, but it is an important part of its economy and many people in this country wish to continue to be able to buy that butter, and I assume that they will be able to do so.

Mr. Rees: Will the Prime Minister recall the speed with which the New Zealanders came to our support in 1939? Will she consider visiting the airfields in Lincolnshire and the war graves all the way from El Alamein to the Austrian border and reflect on the price that New Zealanders paid while supporting us, and support the New Zealanders in the EEC?

The Prime Minister: I thought that I was doing just that in my reply, because butter exports are very much a part of the New Zealand economy. People here still wish to purchase that country's butter—and lamb—and I am very much aware that the import quotas have been reduced steadily from 165,000 tonnes in 1973 to 74,000 tonnes this year. A new agreement will be negotiated, which I hope will be satisfactory to all concerned.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the fact that, although many people agree that the older generations of New Zealanders, in the first and second world wars, supported us superbly, as they did in the Falklands, the present New Zealand Government, under Labour, have reneged on their duty to contribute to the defence of the free world and the position has radically changed?

The Prime Minister: I am very much aware that our ships are not able to go to New Zealand at the moment —which I think is a great tragedy both for our Navy and for many people in New Zealand—because the New Zealand Government insists on the ships not having any nuclear weapons or on asking questions about that, and of course we cannot say whether they have because of our obligations to NATO. Nevertheless, I do not think that that would warrant taking it out of the New Zealand people by not doing everything that we can to see that they have a thoroughly satisfactory arrangement for the continued sale of butter to the Common Market.

Mr. Wilson: Having used the un-word "unwisdom", and having called in aid the good example of the New Zealand Socialist Government, will the Prime Minister now give an assurance that there will be no cruise missiles on the Clyde?

The Prime Minister: I shall give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that we shall take whatever measures are necessary to keep a continued effective nuclear deterrent and to carry out our obligations to NATO.

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. Friend accept, though, that fairminded New Zealanders agree that the arrangement for New Zealand, which is very welcome in all parts of the House, has been a very good one for that country, but that that does not gainsay the need for New Zealand to find other markets, including the Soviet Union, because New Zealanders sell more butter there than the EEC does?

The Prime Minister: Yes, but I hope my hon. Friend will appreciate that when they have a drop in quota from 165,000 tonnes in 1973 to 74,000 tonnes this year they have had to be very active in finding other markets, particularly those in the Pacific basin.

Engagements

Q4. Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Livingstone: In the Prime Minister's busy day, will she find time to consider the conviction for murder of Mr. Robert McConnell, a Unionist paramilitary, and investigate who authorised the decision of the RUC to destroy its case notes rather than bring prosecutions against two members of the SAS, Sergeant Aitken and Corporal McGow, who supplied the sub-machine gun used in the murder? Will she therefore report urgently to the House on who authorises SAS operations at political and operational levels at home and abroad?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, decisions about prosecutions are not for me. They are for the prosecuting authorities. If the hon. Gentleman has any evidence, I suggest that he puts it to those authorities, rather than give it under privilege. We do not discuss matters relating to the SAS, and no one would want us to do so unless he wished to undermine the security of this country.

Q5. Mr. Couchman: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Couchman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that today's most heartening unemployment and employment statistics underscore our burgeoning economy? Should we not now be placing the greatest emphasis on training our young people in the skills that will be needed in the 21st century, the shortage of which is beginning to worry successful employers?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend that the figures today are very encouraging indeed. Unemployment has fallen for 21 months in succession and over the last year by about half a million. I agree with him also that we shall need more and more skilled people for the jobs that are available. I hope that everyone, including the trade unions, will support the new adult training scheme, which is intended to give skills to about 600,000 unemployed people to enable them to get the jobs that employers are ready to offer.

Mr. Battle: Will the Prime Minister explain how 200 of my constituents, who are skilled workers and who received their redundancy notices from Courtaulds last week, have participated in the new prosperity that she says is for everyone?

The Prime Minister: Yes it is difficult for anyone who suddenly faces redundancy, but most people understand that there must be a restructuring of industry. There has to be change. One cannot go on making goods for which there is no demand. The many people, from both sides of the House, who come to see me fully understand that these things have to happen and they set about trying to find companies to go to the area or people who will take up the enterprise allowance to create the jobs and work of the future.

Q6. Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stanbrook: Will my right hon. Friend give some thought this afternoon to the constitutional difficulty that has been exposed by the fate of the Abortion (Amendment) Bill? When the Government are apparently neutral on an important moral issue it is quite impossible for that issue to be settled by means of a private Member's Bill, however meritorious it may be and however much support it may get in this place. Is there not therefore a duty on my right hon. Friend to change her mind about this single constitutional issue? Matters of this sort ultimately depend for decision on the Government giving the opportunity for them to be settled in Government time. It will take only a few minutes one evening at the end of business to settle this one way or the other.

The Prime Minister: I would not necessarily accept that there is a constitutional difficulty of the kind that my hon. Friend describes. Many of us have had to take through private Member's Bills that started by being very controversial, and some of us handled them in very different ways. A great deal depends on that, and I do not accept that there is a constitutional difficulty just because this Bill has not got through. I think that the decision we took not to provide time for private Member's Bills was correct.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 23 MAY—Opposition Day (12th Allotted Day) (2nd part). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "The Crisis in Housing".

Remaining stages of the Firearms (Amendment) Bill.

TUESDAY 24 MAY—Consideration of Lords Amendments to the Employment Bill.

WEDNESDAY 25 MAY—Motion to take note of the White Paper on developments in the European Community July-December 1987 (Cm. 336).

THURSDAY 26 MAY—Motion for the spring Adjournment.

Motions on short speeches and public petitions.

Motion on the Lord Chancellor's Salary Order.

FRIDAY 27 MAY—Adjournment motions.

Mr. Dobson: I thank the Leader of the House. In view of the revelation earlier this week that decisions have been taken in principle and in secret about the replacement of one category of nuclear weapons, can we expect an early debate on defence?

May we expect a debate on competition policy before control of Rowntree Mackintosh is transferred from York to Switzerland?

When can we expect a debate on foreign affairs—the debate that the right hon. Gentleman has been promising for some months now?

Finally, in view of the need to improve and update communications in the House, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us when the Services Committee can expect to receive the reports from the Property Services Agency on the replacement of the annunciator system, and from British Telecom on the electronic mailing experiment, both of which have been outstanding for more than a year?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has asked me four questions about next week's business. The first was about a debate on the defence White Paper. In due course there will be an opportunity for a debate on that. I understand that the Select Committee on Defence will be taking evidence and producing a report, and it would be better to wait for that before we arrange a debate.

The next question was about competition policy and the matter of Rowntree. I answered a question on this last week when I said that my right hon. and noble Friend was awaiting a report from the Office of Fair Trading. There is nothing that I can add to what I said then.

The hon. Gentleman asked about a foreign affairs debate. I recognise that there is concern about and a need for a debate on foreign affairs, and I shall seek to arrange that as soon as possible.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about the annunciator screen report and British Telecom's electronic mailing system report. The hon. Gentleman kindly gave me notice that he would be asking about these matters. I understand that both reports will shortly be submitted to the Computer Sub-Committee. The consultants' final report on the annunciator screen was recently received by the Parliamentary Works Officer, who is now considering it. A draft report on the British Telecom electronic mailing system prepared by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency is with the working party involved in the trial of this system.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an Opposition day. May I remind the House that business questions should be confined to business for next week and should not be on general topics?

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The Leader of the House said that there would ultimately be a debate on the defence Estimates. Does he accept that it would be preferable for the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement about any new nuclear weapons system to this House and not on "Panorama"? Will he have an opportunity to make that statement next week? Now that the motion about the Select Committee on Procedure is on the Order Paper, does the Leader of the House have any proposals to bring that motion to the House so that the Select Committee on Procedure can now be set up?

Mr. Wakeham: I will obviously refer the point about defence to my right hon. Friend, but the defence White Paper debate is probably the best time to deal with these matters. The House will have noted that the motion to re-establish the Select Committee on Procedure is on the Order Paper, and I hope that it will be agreed before Whitsun.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Has my right hon. Friend seen the report in The Independent that the deputy Leader of the Opposition has tried to persuade Mr. Speaker not to select the new clause on abortion put down for debate on the Criminal Justice Bill, which I understand must be debated very soon? In view of this and the disgraceful ploys which prevented the House from coming to a decision on this matter last Friday week, will my right hon. Friend give an assurance, first, that there will be a free vote on the amendment—assuming that Mr. Speaker selects it? Secondly, if there is any attempt at obstruction to prevent the House arriving at a decision, will he give us an assurance that the Government will not hesitate to move a motion in accordance with precedent?

Mr. Wakeham: My right hon. Friend raises the question of the selection of amendments on the Criminal Justice Bill. Of course, the selection of amendments on that Bill is a matter not for me but for you, Mr. Speaker. He also makes the point, which I would expect him to make, about the desirability of a structured debate on these matters. Obviously, we shall address our minds to that when we see the selection. At one time, matters of whipping were my responsibility, but I am glad to say that it is one of the responsibilities that I no longer have.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): When the Leader of the House answered the question about a debate on the defence Estimates, I fear that he misunderstood the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). There has been a revelation through the media—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where?"] There has been a revelation that new nuclear weapons decisions have been taken. Can the Leader of the House tell us whether it is therefore right that the House should be informed about this matter, and that there should be a proper debate? These decisions are being taken in secret and it is against the interests of the House that that should be done in this way.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Lady should not necessarily believe everything that she reads in the newspapers. I have said that I shall refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. If he thought it appropriate to make a statement to the House, of course he would do so; but I said that probably the best way to proceed was to have the annual defence debate in the normal course.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider the answer he has just given? Would it not be of great advantage to the House and to the nation if there were to be a debate on nuclear defence policy, so that the Labour party could expose its differences on the matter?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend tempts me, because that would be an important debate, but there are many other important debates, and much important legislation that I should like passed through the House as soon as possible.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast South): The Leader of the House is aware that I have been pressing on different occasions for a debate on devolution. In the light of the Prime Minister's statement in Scotland last week, could we have a debate in the near future? Alternatively—this might be more practicable could Northern Ireland be allowed into the benefits of that unitary state?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's persistence in raising these matters, which are very important to him. I cannot promise a debate in the immediate future, but I will bear his representations in mind.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): The Home Secretary is thinking about the introduction of electronic tagging for prisoners. Would the Leader of the House think of introducing it for right hon. and hon. Members, so it would be interesting to know where some of our distinguished colleagues are when they are not in the Palace of Westminster?

Mr. Wakeham: No, Sir. I have no plans to do such a thing. Quite a number of hon Members could go a long way away and I should not miss them.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the Leader of the House reconsider having a statement or debate on the new nuclear weapons matter, which the Secretary of State for Defence has announced? It has not been just in the press, as the Secretary of State has announced it to the Select Committee and on "Panorama". Many people will think that the Government have something to hide if they do not have a debate on this important matter. Will the Leader of the House ensure, at the same time, that there will be an early transcript of what the Secretary of State said to the Select Committee so that we can see the way in which he has been deceiving the House on this matter over a number of years?

Mr. Wakeham: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman's logic adds much to the debate. As I understand it, he says that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced this to a Select Committee, but is also trying to conceal it. Giving evidence to a Select Committee is not the most obvious way to conceal something.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): On Thursday next week we are to have a debate on the spring Adjournment, and then on one of the procedure motions, which is to be on short speeches, as I understand it. It should come on between 7 pm and 7.30 pm, as the Adjournment debate will last for three hours. Has the Leader of the House considered any of the other motions brought forward by the Procedure Committee, because some matters other than short speeches could be dealt with if the debate is brief?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise my hon. Friend's interest in these matters. The motion that I shall bring forward for debate next Thursday will be on short speeches and public petitions, dealing with two matters that I hope we can dispose of. I hope to arrange a further debate shortly in which we can discuss the other matters that I know are of concern, on which my hon. Friend knows I shall be having talks.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford South): Could we have a statement on lobbying next week as a matter of urgency? The Leader of the House will recall that I raised with him the position of Mr. Peter Luff, who is employed by "Good Relations" yet is an adviser to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Secretary of State is not even a Member of the House; therefore he is not directly accountable. "Good Relations" is being investigated by that Department over the Guinness affair. This is highly unsatisfactory. Lobbying is spawning around this place and it is about time that we had a debate on it, or a statement at the very least.

Mr. Wakeham: Mr. Luff, and indeed all special advisers, are employed on agreed and proper terms, in accordance with Civil Service practice. I do not believe that there is a need for a debate on that matter. I notice the Select Committee's proposals about changes, and a further look at lobbying, but I do not foresee the need for a debate.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will my right hon. Friend note that the Companies (Audit Committees) Bill was yesterday thrown out of the other place? That legislation was introduced by the late Member for Kensington and was quickly passed in this House a few weeks ago. Will my right hon. Friend consider the possibility of that legislation coming back later in the year in the form of a Companies Bill? Many hon. Members and people outside the House would be grateful for that.

Mr. Wakeham: I am sure that the whole House would want me to say how much we shall miss Sir Brandon Rhys Williams. He did not always, over many years, make himself comfortable with the Government—he had views of his own—but I shall certainly miss his lively intellect and his contributions to our debates. I cannot promise, however, that there will be such legislation. Whether the Government decide to introduce a Bill containing these or similar proposals is a matter not for me but for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Has the Leader of the House noticed that, on Tuesday, there is to be a reachable oral question—one of the few, I am told, ever to have been tabled in this way and allowed—on the role of the SAS?

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Will the right hon. Gentleman take on board the fact that, whatever is said by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), there are serious Members on both sides of the House who are increasingly worried about under what authority and on whose authority the SAS operates? What are its rules of engagement? This question extends to cases such as that of Michael Tighe. Is there not a case for the Government making a statement on this matter—this would possibly be to their advantage—to clarify suspicions? There are certainly suspicions about the use in this connection of the royal prerogative.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's persistence. I cannot possibly anticipate any answers to questions next week. Although the hon. Gentleman puts forward his view with all seriousness, there are others of us, on the Conservative Benches particularly, who would say that the security of the state requires that some things cannot be the subject of the to and fro of political debate in the House.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): I do not wish to prejudge any decisions that you, Mr. Speaker, will have to make on selecting new clauses to be considered in the debate on the Criminal Justice Bill. As more than 120 right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House signed an amendment reducing to 24 weeks the time limit for abortion when the Abortion Bill was considered in the House, does my right hon. Friend think that it would be helpful for a new clause to be introduced into the Criminal Justice Bill which would incorporate Lord Houghton's Bill —the Infant Life (Preservation) Bill—which would amend the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929?

Mr. Wakeham: Not surprisingly, the new clauses that I wish to see introduced into the Criminal Justice Bill are those introduced by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. My purpose is to get the Bill passed. As I have already said, the selection of amendments is not a matter for me.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Does the Leader of the House recall that in the summer recess I wrote to him about what was to happen to the Short money for the Opposition parties? The delay has been exaggerated once again, after all these months, because of the leadership crisis in the SLD. Although we in the Labour party fully understand that we might have to wait for the money—[Interruption.]—none of it will come to me; it is for the Front Bench. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about your leadership crisis?"]. When will there be a debate? Will the Division be along the lines of representation in the House? How will the right hon. Gentleman manage to figure out the arithmetic? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that some members of the Liberal party want to go to the television studios, get dressed up ready for when the cameras come into this place and buy their pink shirts and all the rest of it, and they need this money? When will they get it?

Mr. Wakeham: As I told the hon. Gentleman, among my souvenirs is the handwritten letter that he wrote to me setting out the problems of the allocation of Short money in the new Parliament. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that it was not as simple as some people thought. He knows that I have been struggling with this matter for many months, but I think that I see some light at the end of the tunnel. I hope to emerge in the fairly near future into the public gaze with my proposals. I can forecast one thing —they will not be accepted by everyone, and probably not by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Could there be a statement next week on the EEC's remarkable decision last week, without the British Government being consulted in any way, to impose a ban on imports of apples to Britain? If consumers in Britain are to be deprived of the right to buy the apples that they want and are forced to buy year-old apples from intervention produced in other countries, is it not sensible that there should at least be a statement or a discussion in Parliament about what is happening?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise my hon. Friend's concern about these matters. The decision to impose quotas on the import of apples from a number of countries, including New Zealand, was taken by the EC Commission, within whose competence it lies, without consultation with member states. The quota of 115,000 tonnes allocated to New Zealand is higher than sendings in any previous year and compares with the import in 1987 of 102,500 tonnes. A shortage of those excellent apples therefore appears unlikely.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is the Leader of the House aware that, in his answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), he enunciated a novel and unacceptable constitutional doctrine—that there are matters that about which the House may not question the Government because his hon. Friends think that it is not suitable that they should be questioned about such matters? If there are security matters that are not to be made the subject matter of question in this House, they had better be finely defined and there should be independent scrutiny of such matters by a committee of Privy Councillors.

Mr. Wakeham: If the hon. Gentleman would listen, he might make a little progress in these matters. I did not say that no one could ask questions. I said that there were some things that Ministers should not answer on and I will maintain that from the Dispatch Box for as long as I am here. There are some security matters that I am not prepared to have discussed across the Dispatch Box, even if the hon. Gentleman asks me.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May we have a debate next week on what can be done to help people whose homes are damaged by severe freak storms, such as that in Northolt, Greenford and parts of Hanwell and Ealing last week, as a result of which many poor people have been devastated? They have had walls knocked down by heavy water and their ground floor carpeting and furnishings have been destroyed. Finding themselves without any money, they do not know what to do. Their case should be brought to this House and answered.

Mr. Wakeham: That sounds a very distressing state of affairs and I am not sure whether I can give my hon. Friend an adequate answer. Perhaps he should take advantage of the Adjournment debate next week and see whether he can bring the matter before the House on that occasion.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Referring to the right hon. Gentleman's answers about the suggestion that a new clause might be moved on Report to the Criminal Justice Bill, he is right in saying that any selection would be a matter for Mr. Speaker and not for him. If new clauses of such a far-reaching character on such different matters were to be introduced into the Bill on Report, it would have grave consequences for the Government, and every other piece of legislation that they are seeking to introduce might be subject to the same kind of interpolations. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take that into account when he considers the matter and gives advice to the Home Secretary, who may be interested in his advice and that of the House.

Mr. Wakeham: The points made by the right hon. Gentleman, who is very experienced in these matters and is a former Leader of the House, are properly for the Home Secretary and me to consider from the Government's point of view, although questions of selection are matters for the Speaker.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Some months ago, the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) made allegations in this House concerning the late Captain Nairac, whose family lives in my constituency. Did my right hon. Friend notice today that the hon. Gentleman has again named people——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should relate his question to next week's business.

Mr. Knapman: May I ask my right hon. Friend whether this matter can be debated in the course of the next week or so, and how, if Parliament is to be televised, such privileges can be maintained in future?

Mr. Wakeham: I see no prospect of arranging a debate on that matter next week or any future week on the basis of that point. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister deplored the use of parliamentary privilege to make allegations which are properly a matter for the prosecuting authorities. Anybody with information of that sort who wishes to pursue the matter has a clear duty: he should give the matter in confidence to the prosecuting authorities, rather than seek to make statements in the House.

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside): Among the debates that the Leader of the House said he would have liked to fit in next week, would he consider including a debate which we should be having on the 500 per cent. increase in the cost of concessionary television licences and the considerable suspicion in the minds of pensioners who are receiving it that this increase from 5p to £5 is the beginning of a move to phase them out completely?

Mr. Wakeham: The concessionary licence scheme for pensioners in residential homes has been in existence for many years. The changes announced yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will enable it to continue and will ensure that the scheme benefits those whom it was intended to benefit. As we have made clear on many occasions, it would not be right or sensible to give free or concessionary licences to all pensioners.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): If we are not to have a debate next week on the Criminal Justice Bill because of attempts to hijack it, does my right hon. Friend agree that careful consideration should be given to how to structure a debate on new clauses which formed no part of the title of the Bill and were not debated on Second Reading or in Committee?

Mr. Wakeham: I hear what my hon. Friend says. We are not having a debate next week because we have other important business that we intend to get through. We shall have debates on the Criminal Justice Bill in the near future, when I shall bear my hon. Friend's point in mind.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): When the Leader of the House considers how to handle the Criminal Justice Bill, will he consider the precedent set in 1980 when the right hon. Member for Blaenau, Gwent (Mr. Foot) was Leader of the Opposition and amendments to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill which had not been considered in Committee were incorporated on Report after being moved by the Opposition Front Bench? Since 1975, every pro-life Bill has received a Second Reading majority. If 15 attempts to introduce pro-life Bills have all been foiled by extended speeches, points of order and hon. Members deploying the mechanisms of this House, how does the right hon. Gentleman envisage this issue being properly settled? Does he regard it as a matter for private Members' legislation or to be settled in some other way? If in another way, what way?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman knows that I do not fully accept his analysis of the failure of Bills on this subject to reach the statute book by private Member's legislation, but I recognise the force of his arguments. I further recognise that there is an amendment to the Criminal Justice Bill, but I do not have anything more to add to what I have already said on what is clearly a difficult decision for you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider his views on a defence debate? It is essential to hold one soon because it will show the enormous differences of view on the Opposition Benches. More important, it would expose the fact that Royal Air Force pilots would be expected to enter the next war, if it ever took place, at great risk, and that the lessons of 1939, when the British Expeditionary Force went to France to fight Hitler's tanks with rifles, had been forgotten.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the desire for an early defence debate, but I cannot promise one. I know that my hon. Friend is aware that defence questions will be answered next Tuesday, 24 May, and he may find an opportunity to make some points then.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): During the next week, would it be possible for the Leader of the House to speak to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services about tribunal appeal claims? I am increasingly receiving complaints from constituents who are claiming attendance allowance that at these appeals they are being asked questions which I consider to be insensitive. The latest case involved a girl who is only 3ft 7in tall who was seeking a mobility allowance because her height meant that she had difficulty getting on and off buses. She was asked why she was wearing rings. I received another complaint from a woman suffering from alopecia, who was asked why she was wearing an expensive wig. Surely a medical appeal tribunal should not ask such questions of people with those difficulties.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concern for his constituents. If he is concerned that improper questions are being asked, perhaps the right course would be for him to take the matter up directly with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, who will decide whether there is anything to be looked into.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): Will my right hon. Friend take time to have a word with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and ask him to come to the House early next week to make a statement about the near miss that occurred yesterday afternoon on the flight-path into Birmingham airport? Many people who use that airport will want to be assured about its absolute safety. The airport is crucial to the welfare of the midlands.

Mr. Wakeham: The incident to which my hon. Friend referred will be investigated by the independent joint air miss working group, whose report will be published. The Civil Aviation Authority is responsible for taking any necessary safety action arising from the incident. That action need not wait until the report is published. However, there is no evidence of any deterioration in the safety in the air over the United Kingdom. Despite a massive increase in traffic, the figures for risk-bearing air misses involving commercial aircraft in recent years have shown a downward trend, from 45 in 1977 to 16 in 1986.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Leader of the House has announced that a debate on EEC matters for the last six months of 1987 will take place next Wednesday. Will that debate last for five hours, six hours or less? Whatever the length of time, is the Leader of the House not in danger of getting his priorities wrong? Is he not aware that the June meeting of the Council of Ministers in the EEC will have to consider many matters which have not yet been debated by the House although they have been recommended for debate by the Scrutiny Committee? Would it not be better to ensure that those matters are properly debated in respect of future legislation rather than spend time on retrospective matters over which the House can have no influence?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's knowledge and experience in those matters and I always listen carefully to what he says. I believe that the debate that I have announced for next week is for the general convenience of the House; it was discussed through the usual channels before I announced it. However, I take note of what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I will have further discussions.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): My right hon. Friend will be aware that Manchester city council has been blocking an inquiry into its anti-racism policy in schools. It is said that the report is now on its way to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science—at least, an expurgated version is on its way. When that is received, will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to make a statement to the House? Many Conservative Members are worried that such policies, far from promoting racial harmony, actually discourage it?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend makes his point very well and I will refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science who will no doubt take whatever action he feels is appropriate in the circumstances.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Can the Leader of the House arrange a debate next week on my early-day motion 792 about grandparents' rights?

[That this House deplores the increasing frequency of grandparents being deprived of the right of access to, care, fostering or adoption of their grandchildren; notes with alarm the attitude of some social services employees; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to introduce early legislation to give legal rights to grandparents providing immediate right of access before children are taken into care and the right to be present or legally represented at any official hearing or inquiry regarding future access to, care, fostering and adoption of their grandchild or grandchildren.]

Is he aware that it has received the signatures of 266 hon. Members from both sides of the House? It is covered by a petition that I presented to the House signed by 8,000 grandparents across the country. Is the Leader of the House also aware that my motion has received the greatest number of supporting signatures of the 1,127 early-day motions that have been tabled this Session? Is it not time that he gave priority for a debate on this very emotive subject?

Mr. Wakeham: I agree that it is an important subject, and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the support that he has received. With regard to the early-day motion, grandparents may already be made the party to adoption proceedings. Further rights are provided for in amending legislation to be implemented this year. The Government will give careful consideration to the proposals in the motion when framing the legislation on child care and the family services provided for in the White Paper published in January 1987. I hope that that is some comfort to the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot find time for a debate next week.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): May I put it to my right hon. Friend that there is a way this week whereby he could get you, Mr. Speaker, out of a very difficult decision, and allow the Government to maintain their principle of not giving Government time to private Members' Bills while allowing the country to see the verdict that it expects from Parliament? Quite simply, we could have a business motion to allow the House to vote on whether it chose to use some of its own private Members' time on a Friday to finish the Alton Bill.

Mr. Wakeham: Would that all these things were quite as simple as my hon. Friend suggests. The Government table motions with regard to the allocation of private Members' time in the House. We gave extra time over and above that laid down in the Standing Orders for private Members' Bills. Those were approved by the House and I do not believe that it would be right to make a change in that regard.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Would the Leader of the House himself make a statement next week on the extraordinary revelation that an honorary British knighthood has been awarded to none other than one Kurt Waldheim? If that is not a matter for the right hon. Gentleman, will he undertake to refer it to his appropriate colleague who can advise the House as to this obviously offensive and iniquitous use of an ancient order of British chivalry?

Mr. Wakeham: I am pretty certain that it is not for me to answer questions in the House on those matters. However, I will investigate to see whether there is any responsibility that involves answering questions.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): With reference to the various answers that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has given this afternoon on the amendment tabled to the Criminal Justice Bill, while I respect entirely his position and the courtesy that he has shown when dealing with those queries, when the Government have been able to show consistently over a period that they expected an amendment on capital punishment to be discussed, why can they not give a similar sign in the case of the amendment on abortion?

Mr. Wakeham: Even the undertaking about capital punishment depends on Mr. Speaker selecting the amendments. I recognise that my hon. Friend has worked very hard for the cause which she believes to be important. I thank her for her kind remarks, but it would not be right for me to add anything further to the remarks that I have made already.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat that this is an Opposition day; I ask hon. Members to be brief.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): When I table my early-day motion requiring that Privy Councillors be not given priority in the selection of speakers in debate, may I have an assurance that Government Whips will not exert pressure on Government Back Benchers not to sign the motion? May I have an assurance that all hon. Members will have an unconditional right to sign my motion without pressure?

Mr. Wakeham: Knowing the hon. Gentleman as well as I do, I should be able to acquit him of charges of arrogance. However, if he continues to ask such questions, demanding that I support his early-day motion before he has tabled it, he will receive a rather dusty answer.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): Has the Leader of the House noticed how easy it has been for the Government to apply large segments of the Firearms (Amendment) Bill to Northern Ireland and how simple it was for a Conservative Member to apply the Motor Vehicles (Wearing of Rear Seat Belts by Children) Bill to Northern Ireland? Bearing in mind what the Prime Minister said in Perth last Friday about legislative devolution, when will the Government govern Northern Ireland like the rest of the country?

Mr. Wakeham: I shall not anticipate at the Dispatch Box the debate on the Firearms (Amendment) Bill or any debates on seat belts. I know that the hon. Gentleman is considering wider issues and wants to see changes in the way in which the House considers matters relating to Northern Ireland. I recognise those concerns and I have had talks with several of his hon. Friends about that. However, I am afraid that I have no proposals at the moment to make any changes.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House consider that it is now important that there be an early debate on the situation facing the people of London in respect of the housing crisis and the shortage of housing for rent, the high unemployment that many inner-city places face, the cuts in the Health Service and the amalgamation of health authorities, and the growing chaos in traffic and transport throughout London? Since the House destroyed the governance of London through the GLC and since most inner-London boroughs are rate-capped or short of money, is it not important that we should debate the plight of the poorest people of London at an early date? On previous occasions, the Leader of the House has said that there would be a debate in the near future. Can he now give us a date for that?

Mr. Wakeham: No, I cannot give a date. I have said that that is a suitable subject for a debate and, if I can find time for it, it would be a proper subject on which to have a debate. The more the hon. Gentleman raises such questions, the more encouraged I am, because much of what he says is highly contentious and such a debate would be a suitable opportunity for him and for some of his hon. Friends to explain, for example, why so many council houses in London are unoccupied where Socialist councils are in charge.

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): In view of the manifest failure of the EEC code of conduct for firms doing business in South Africa, emphasised by yesterday's annual general meeting of the BTR company, when shareholders asked questions about the dispute which has lasted for three years and which clearly shows that company to be in breach of the three main provisions of those guidelines, will it be possible in the EEC debate next week to discuss the conduct of British firms in South Africa under the EEC provisions, and the whole issue of trade with that country?

Mr. Wakeham: What is in order in a debate is not a matter for me, but for you, Mr. Speaker. On the face of it, I would have thought that if the hon. Gentleman used some ingenuity he might be able to make some of the points that he wants to.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Since the Leader of the House and his colleagues have failed to establish a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, is he aware that Members of the Scottish majority party have resolved to establish their own investigative committee, which may well have support from other parties in the House? Since funds have been made available to support an investigative committee to monitor the work of the Scottish Office, will the Leader of the House make a statement next week to ensure that those hon. Members who are prepared to do their duty in scrutinising the work of the Scottish Office will have access to those funds?

Mr. Wakeham: I shall not be making a statement next week, but I am prepared to make a statement now on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, if that will be any help to the hon. Gentleman.

I have been anxious for a considerable time to set up the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs on a basis acceptable to all parts of the House. During that period, the Labour party's position has changed on a number of occasions. That has been helpful. The proposal that I have recently put to all parties is for the Select Committee on Scottish

[Mr. Wakeham]

Affairs to be set up with mainly Scottish Members but with some English Members, and my proposal includes a place for the Social and Liberal Democratic party and the Scottish National party.

In order to achieve that objective, I have asked for some greater flexibility in the composition of the Scottish Standing Committee, which could involve a slight increase in the number of English members. I understand that my proposals are not acceptable to the Labour party, which I greatly regret. I have not yet had a formal view from the Social and Liberal Democratic party and the Scottish National party. That is the position at the moment.

Whitsun Adjournment

4.13 pm

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. Members that, on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 27 May, up to eight Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Debates (Selection of Speakers)

4.14 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I have your guidance for future reference? You will know of my interest in Scottish affairs, coming, as I do, from Scotland. I am sure that when regulations on the community charge for students are brought before the House in a year or so, the experience of hon. Members who sit for Scottish constituencies will be valuable. As you know, I have been selected to serve on the Committee that is considering the School Boards (Scotland) Bill. I attempted to speak in yesterday's debate on the community charge for students and various points that I wished to make on education, and so on, would have been valuable. However, there seems to be a way of selecting Members that rightly gives priority——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is a reflection upon the Chair. It is the duty of for the occupant of the Chair to take into account the specific interests of hon. Members. English Members have some interest in Scottish affairs, just as Scottish Members have an interest in English affairs, because this is a United Kingdom Parliament. However, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not challenge the selection of the Chair. I understand that he intervened a great deal last night.

Mr. Bruce rose——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick Cumnock and Doon Valley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Points of order only delay the Opposition day. However, I call Mr. Foulkes.

Mr. Foulkes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would be willing to meet the hon. Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce) to give him the long list of Scottish debates in which I have tried, unsuccessfully, to speak, and I do represent a Scottish constituency.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The selection of Members from the Government and Opposition Benches is a matter of obvious importance to me as a Welsh member. I have no wish to challenge Mr. Deputy Speaker's decision last night, but it would be useful to have some guidance on whether the Chair seeks to choose hon. Members from both sides of the House in order to have a balanced debate —or not, as happened last night, when four Opposition Members in a row spoke despite the fact that Conservative Members wished to speak.

That has obvious implications for other debates. A similar situation arose in the Welsh Grand Committee on 15 July last year, when Opposition Members took up the majority of debating time. Last night, in the 71 minutes of debate, Government Back Benchers had nine minutes and the remainder of the time, apart from the Minister winding up for 12 minutes, went to the Opposition. Such debates could be unbalanced as a result.

Mr. Speaker: I must bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman says when we have a Welsh debate, because he is frequently, perhaps over-frequently, called in Welsh debates.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of principle, is it correct that there is nothing to prevent English Members from being called to speak in debates relating either to Scotland or Wales?

Mr. Speaker: That is absolutely correct. I know that the hon. Gentleman is not making a complaint, because we discussed that matter last night.

Opposition Day

[12TH ALLOTTED DAY] [1ST PART]

Shipbuilding

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.17 pm

Mr. Brian Gould (Dagenham): I beg to move,

That this House, deeply concerned at reports that Her Majesty's Government intends to withdraw all financial support from British Shipbuilders, and aware of the grave threat to British merchant shipbuilding posed by the contractual problems of NESL and the uncertain future of Govan yard, calls upon Her Majesty's Government to affirm its commitment to British merchant shipbuilding and to provide the support needed to sustain this essential British industry.

We have drafted, the motion because we believe that a once great and still vital British industry is in mortal danger. There have been many occasions in the past when that claim has been made in respect of British shipbuilding. There have been many debates in the House in recent years in which grave fears have been expressed about the survival of that industry, but I truly believe that on this occasion the claim is justified, that this really is crunch time for British merchant shipbuilding, and that there is an axe poised over the industry which, in a sense, only the Minister can remove.

The purpose of the debate and the motion is to invite the Minister to make it clear that he sees, as we do, an important future for this essential British industry. We intend—I am sure that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will understand this—to use the debate to seek answers to questions, and to ask him to allay fears, to dispel rumours, to remove doubts and to make clear his commitment, and that of the Government, to the future of British shipbuilding.

No one disputes that British shipbuilding has gone through an extremely difficult period. Shipbuilding worldwide has had a difficult time because of the depressed state of demand for shipping, but the current problems that have arisen in respect of North East Shipbuilders—the Govan and Appledore yards—arise not just in the context of that difficult worldwide situation, but as the direct consequence of steps that the Government have failed to take. It is the Government who have raised those question marks; that is why we ask the Government to remove them.

The Government are exhibiting their now-familiar predilection for the triumph of ideology over the future of an important British industrial sector, together with their preoccupation with raising cash by disposing of those parts of the industry which can be sold off, accompanied by a willingness—at least implicit and increasingly clear—to junk those parts which cannot be sold off. That attitude threatens the taxpayers' investment, jobs, the regional economy of the north-east and the south-west, and the continued survival of an essential component in our industrial future.

The current problems are the obvious, inevitable and possibly even intentional consequence of the

[Mr. Brian Gould]

Government's attitude in the past, with their determination to dismember British Shipbuilders. They set sail on that course four or five years ago, when they began privatising the naval warship yards. It was always on the cards that, as the more viable parts of British Shipbuilders were disposed of, the increasingly small number remaining would face the growing threat of non-viability.

When the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster made his statement in the House on 18 April, and in statements that he has made elsewhere in recent days, there were hints that the Government's argument was that it was somehow inevitable, and a logical consequence of the process of dismemberment, that those parts of British Shipbuilders which remain cannot be sustained; that buyers or recipients must be found for them and that the rest must go to the wall. The Chancellor will not be surprised if I give him notice that we reject the inevitability of such an outcome. We will use this debate and future occasions to make clear our commitment to the industry and our belief that it would be wrong, not to say active industrial sabotage, to allow what remains of British merchant shipbuilding to go to the wall in the way that the Government contemplate.

When the Minister replies, I hope that the first matter to which he will address himself is the uncertainty which exists in respect of the Govan yard in particular. On 18 April, the House was told that someone—I am tempted to say a buyer, but I am not sure that is the right term—had been found to take the Govan shipyard off the Government's hands, and that the lucky candidate was the Norwegian gas ship firm of Kvaerner Industries. The House was informed that it was to take over rather than purchase the company; as we understand it, it is more a matter of a giveaway than a sale. As my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has often said, it is rather like saying, "You like the ships? Have the yard as well."

If the yard is a viable proposition for a Norwegian gas ship builder, and if that company believes it can make the yard a going concern, why cannot the Government accept that the yard can be made viable and have a future? This seems to be another example of the Government's willingness to get shot of a public asset at almost any price.

No one begrudges the Govan shipyard and all who work there the chance of a viable future. We on this side of the Chamber will take great care not to say anything that would in any way jeopardise that future. We understand the precarious nature of the situation and the importance of guaranteeing, so far as a guarantee can be given, the jobs in that part of the industry. However, we must have further information, assurances and guarantees as to exactly what is proposed.

A month has gone by since we first heard the Minister's statement, and presumably the negotiations have made some progress. We hope that the Chancellor of the Duchy will be able to tell the House more about the outcome. His answers are of crucial importance to the British shipbuilding industry and to all those who work in Govan.

We should like to know, for example, what exactly the Minister meant when he used the cryptic phrase "some restructuring" in his statement on 18 April. What does that mean in terms of existing jobs, future employment, the pensions of those who remain and of those who leave, long-term investment, and so on? What does Kvaerner have in mind for the Govan shipyard? One can understand why it is that, having closed down its own yard and made hundreds of its own workers unemployed, the company now needs, at least in the short term, some cheaper—perhaps temporarily cheaper—capacity. It may be that, in the short term, some future exists for the Govan yard.

We need to know what will be the future of the yard after Kvaerner's immediate objectives have been met. Will it be closed down, in the same way that the Norwegian yard was closed, and will Kvaerner then move on to another knockdown, giveaway yard in some other part of the world? What guarantee for the future is being offered to the Govan workers as a consequence of the deal? I hope that the Minister will provide answers to those questions.

Another cryptic remark was contained in the Chancellor of the Duchy's relatively short statement on 18 April, relating to the transfer of the Appledore yard. The right hon. and learned Gentleman made it clear that there were buyers in the offing for that yard as well. On 18 April, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) pointed out that Appledore includes not just the north Devon yard but also the Ferguson yard in Port Glasgow. It is a substantial operation employing hundreds of people at the two sites, and it is essential that those workers be given some information at this stage, a month after the statement, about who is the prospective purchaser and what are its intentions.

Many people in north Devon who depend upon Appledore for their employment are extremely alarmed. I am sure that the same is true of the workers at Port Glasgow. They are concerned that a private purchaser may use the acquisition and the assets of the yard not for shipbuilding but for property speculation. I hope that the Chancellor of the Duchy will dispel any fears that the workers may have. Four weeks after the right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement, both the House and those whose livelihood depends on those yards are entitled to more information.

Although this subject is not strictly within the terms of the motion I have moved, I hope that the Minister will say something about Harland and Wolff, which is an important part of the British shipbuilding industry. He will know that there is in hand a project for the building of a major liner known as the Ultimate Dream, which will require substantial Government support. That support ought to be given because of the importance of Harland and Wolff to the Northern Ireland economy. I do not need to labour that point, because it is well understood.

Less well understood is the reason why a substantial proportion of the work involved in building that massive liner—perhaps as much as 70 per cent. of it—will be undertaken by mainland suppliers and contractors. My hon. Friends and I have received many representations on that point, including those from Senior Green of Wakefield, which is competing for an order for two oil-fired boilers, five exhaust boilers and ancillary equipment; and Industrial and Marine Switchgear of Hull, which is competing for the order to supply switchgear.

That makes a point to which I may return later. While the initial order for a ship is of course of great importance to the shipyard that is fortunate enough to get it, it has major implications for the back-up industry, the hinterland of industrial activity that goes to support shipbuilding. In the case of Harland and Wolff, much of that benefit will be felt in mainland industry.

The really urgent problem, however, and one which now demands a clear answer from the Chancellor of the Duchy, arises in respect of the most important remaining part of British Shipbuilders. Assuming that Govan and Appledore go, what will remain is North East Shipbuilders Ltd. The danger is that it will be left in a non-viable, certainly vulnerable and exposed, position.

The fears arise not only because of the inevitable consequences of this process of dismemberment—this death by a thousand cuts—but because the position of the yard, which is of such importance to the regional economy, has unfortunately been exacerbated by the contractual difficulties that have arisen on the one remaining major order on which the yard is working.

On 18 April, the Minister broke the news to the House that those difficulties had arisen. I hope and expect that in the ensuing four weeks he and his advisers, particularly his legal advisers, have been thoroughly involved in trying to sort out what appears to be a legal argument. I hope that he will be able to tell the House today that the difficulties have been resolved, or are well on the way to resolution.

It is time for the Government to establish the truth of the matter. We have heard and continue to hear—this was stated in a television programme on which the Minister and I appeared together this morning—that the problems arose because of unsatisfactory work being done by the yard. That is a very prejudicial statement; it is prejudicial both to the good name of the yard and those who work in it, and to the proper resolution of the contractual problems.

I hope that the Minister will take the chance to make it clear—as I believe to be the case—that the contractual problems have arisen not because of any unsatisfactory work done in Sunderland, but because the Danish customer is having difficulty either in finding the money to pay or in finding customers to whom to sell the ferries on. If either explanation is correct, I hope that the Minister will say so, but if the position is as I believe it to be, I feel that we are entitled to ask further questions.

We shall need to know what the status of the order is, how much of it is to be carried out and how much of it is covered by the Export Credits Guarantee Department guarantee—which, after all, is offered by a part of the Minister's Department, and for which he must therefore take some responsibility. When I spoke to him some time ago about the matter, he did not know exactly what the effect or scope of the ECGD guarantee would be. I hope that by now he has informed himself and can tell us what would happen if—in the worst case—the Danish customer was unwilling or unable to pay, and the guarantee had to be applied in its fullest possible form. I hope that he will be able to explain how many ferries would then be built, and what that would mean for the continuing work programme on Wearside. That is the minimal information that is decently and properly required by those who are still busily engaged in building the ferries. They need to know what their future is to be.

There is a further question. If the Danes drop out of the picture and the ECGD guarantee is not adequate to ensure the continued performance of the full contract, what are the prospects of finding other customers? The Minister will know that there is a strong belief in Sunderland, particularly on the part of the management at the yard, that there is a real prospect—I am not competent to judge, but this is their belief—that the Cubans may be interested in buying at least some of the ferries. When my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) and I, along with others, spoke to the Minister a couple of weeks ago, he professed ignorance—or at least, considerable doubts—about the possibilities. I hope that he will now be able to tell us what the chances are, and what efforts he and his Department will make to bring them to fruition.

These are real questions. We certainly do not intend to use the debate to rant and rave or score political points. We want to hear the truth—the facts—from the Minister, because that is what the work force needs to hear. We also hope for an answer to a much wider question. The question that we wish most of all to be answered, because the answer will provide the context in which all these matters are to be resolved, is this: are the Government still committed to the survival of the industry?

We know, and the Minister knows as well, that there have been repeated reports—I am tempted to say authoritative reports—that the Government have made up their mind to pull the plug on British Shipbuilders, and that they are looking for an opportunity later this year to announce that they will no longer provide the financial support that is still required if the industry is to be maintained. I hope that the Minister will make it clear that those reports are ill founded. I hope that he will say that the short-term contractual problems of North East Shipbuilders are simply that, and not an occasion or pretext for announcing that that part of British Shipbuilders, which is an important component of British merchant shipbuilding, is to be allowed to go to the wall.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Surely, if the Government decide to withdraw financial aid from the shipbuilding industry—which seems likely—and to turn it over entirely to private enterprise, that is a political question. The Government's entire policy on shipbuilding over the years has been political. They have deliberately allowed the industry to run down for political, sectarian reasons related to their outmoded and outdated philosophy.

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend is right. I made the same point in my opening remarks. I believe that the Government's attitude to the industry has typically been dictated by exactly the political and ideological questions to which my hon. Friend refers. In fact, as I look for the point that I have reached in my speech, I see that my next remark was to be that unless the Government gave the commitment that we demand, we would be forced to conclude that this was yet another part of the British industrial steel base that was to be sacrificed on the altar of ideology.

Of course no one wants subsidies for their own sake. No one would be more delighted than all the thousands of people whose jobs still depend on merchant shipbuilding if it were possible to say that they had a viable future without subsidy. But if the present Government are to take the high-handed view that nothing is to survive if it requires subsidy—I suspect that there are powerful voices, if not in the Department of Trade and Industry at least on the Tory Back-Benches, who would say exactly that—we must face the fact that the worldwide problems of shipbuilding over the past decade have dictated that no shipbuilding industry in the world would have survived without subsidy.

We are not in a unique position. We are not even in a position that applies to Europe but from which the far east is exempt. The Koreans and the Japanese are also subsidising massively. They are doing so because they know that that is the only way to maintain the capacity in that important industry, which they have decided for political reasons—my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) is right; they have made a political judgment—they want to survive.

Therefore, the industries which survive this admittedly difficult period will not necessarily be the industries which pass the commercial test, because none of them would survive according to that test. The survivors will be those which are supported by Governments who make the political decision that they want to see national shipbuilding preserved because they recognise its importance to the national economy. That is what we ask and expect to hear from the Government. We want that political commitment so that we can be sure that the Government recognise the importance of the survival of the industry.

When we turn to competitive matters, we are also entitled to say that British Shipbuilders and British merchant shipbuilding generally have done amazingly well; they have taken huge strides to improve their competitiveness and efficiency. When British Shipbuilders has slimmed down at the cost of many tens of thousands of jobs, when it has improved the flexibility of its work practices, and when taxpayers have contributed hundreds of millions of pounds of investment to the point where British Shipbuilders and NESL are so advanced technologically that even the Japanese visit them to see how things are done, how remarkable it would be if at that time the Government said, "This is the point at which we pull the plug, destroy all that has been achieved, and thank and reward those who have made these substantial efforts by telling them that their industry is no longer required."

How ironic it would be if that step were taken, after such a difficult decade, just when for the first time there is a glimmer of a possibility—some would say a likelihood—of an upturn in world demand. The evidence is there in the fact that the proportion of laid-up shipping is at its lowest level for 10 years, now just 4 per cent. of the world fleet. The evidence is also there in the fact that the price of secondhand ships has doubled in the last year and that the price being fetched for new ships has also risen substantially. How ironic it would be if this were the time that the Government, for ideological reasons, were to decide to wield the axe and chop our industry down just when it is poised to take advantage of the upturn in world demand.

How ridiculous it would be if a great maritime and trading nation, which, despite the Government's worst efforts, still accounts for 8 per cent. of world trade, were unable to take advantage of improved circumstances. At one time, this nation built half the world's shipping output; 30 years ago it built more than a quarter of the output; now it builds only 1·5 per cent. of total output. How ludicrous it would be if we no longer had any merchant shipbuilding capacity. We would be dependent on foreigners who had had more faith in their shipbuilding industries and who had understood the commercial, strategic and industrial advantages of retaining that capacity.

Mr. David Porter (Wavency): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that in his last statement he ignored completely the private sector shipbuilding yards and concentrated totally on the nationalised industry?

Mr. Gould: As the motion makes clear, I am concentrating on merchant shipbuilding. That is the element of the industry which we believe is strategically important.

Sometimes the Chancellor of the Duchy and his ministerial colleague disagree with me on the meaning of "strategic". Sometimes they argue that "strategic" has a solely military connotation. Let us accept that its military connotation is strong. I have had calls today from naval architects and specialists who said that, unless we maintained the capacity to build merchant ships, not just in the mixed yards but in the specialist merchant shipbuilding yards which could undertake the range required, we would be incapable of mounting any sustained naval operation, particularly of the sort which we saw at the time of the Falklands war. All the experts agree that without that capacity, we would be unable to mount a Falklands operation again.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): If all merchant shipbuilding went, that would be right. But does the hon. Gentleman recall that he started his speech in a statesmanlike manner by claiming that he would do nothing to raise fears and spread rumours? He is now working himself up to a peroration in which he accuses the Government of being about to close down our entire merchant shipbuilding industry for ideological reasons, a statement for which he has no basis of fact. He is making that accusation against a Government who have so far put £1·8 billion into supporting the losses of British Shipbuilders. Does he not think that he is trying to raise fears in shipbuilding towns purely for political purposes?

Mr. Gould: Nothing would please me, my hon. Friends and the hundreds of shipyard workers who have come to London today to lobby for their industry today more than if the Chancellor were able in two or three minutes to give us the answers to the questions which we have posed and to give us the commitment which we seek to the future of British merchant shipbuilding. He will have every opportunity to convince us of his good intentions and good faith in these matters. I hope that he will, but on the basis of what he has told the House and what he has said outside, I am sorry to say that there is room for grave doubt and real fear about what the Government have in mind for this essential industry.

It is not just the strategic importance of the industry which matters; it is the impact on the local and regional economy if the NESL yards were to be lost. No doubt my hon. Friends from Sunderland and elsewhere will make that point. It is not just shipbuilding which would be affected. Other industries in marine engineering depend on shipbuilding for their survival. I think of enterprises such as Clark Kincaid, which is making engines for the ships being built in the Govan yard. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow will have something to say about that.

The ramifications of the Government's decision are important; on that I think the Chancellor of the Duchy and I agree. We now provide him with an opportunity to give us the assurances on Govan, Appledore and North East Shipbuilders, and to tell us the truth and what the Government intend to do. We expect answers to those questions. We expect the right hon. and learned Gentleman to make clear his commitment to this vital industry. Nothing less will do.

4.47 pm

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'recognises the support that Her Majesty's Government has given to the shipbuilding industry; and welcomes the prospect of returning British Shipbuilders' yards to the private sector.'.

I came to the House on 18 April to give hon. Members the earliest possible information about two items of news that were of great importance to shipbuilding areas. The first was that British Shipbuilders had received approaches —unsolicited approaches which the Government did not know were coming—for the disposal and sale of two yards, Govan on the Clyde and Appledore in Devon. I made it clear that we would welcome further interest from people wishing to take over business in all the corporation's facilities. I also told the House of the contractual difficulties that had arisen at North East Shipbuilders Ltd. in Sunderland. Those difficulties were already known to the work force and were about to become public, and it was important that the House should be aware of them.

I made that statement to the House because I and the Government realise the importance of shipbuilding yards to the communities in which they are sited. We are all concerned about the prospects for the local economy in Clydeside, Wearside, north Devon and other parts of the country. As my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter) said, there are other yards as well. What we are talking about is how best to sustain economic activity, including shipyards if possible, and employment in all those places.

We need to take advantage of the opportunity to look to the future of the economy in all those places and to keep up to date everyone who is understandably concerned about the facts, so that everyone may know where we are. I am not sure that this early debate, or the approach of Opposition Members on the Front and Back Benches, is altogether helpful. It is all very well for the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) to say that he wishes to do nothing to raise doubt and rumour, but he concluded by constructing an argument that contained the proposition that some deliberate attempt is being made to close down the yard. That hardly reassures the worried people in Glasgow, Sunderland or anywhere else.

I have had similar experience elsewhere. I have had several meetings with the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay). I mention him only because I see him in his place, as I would expect during such a debate. I have tried to be helpful and forthcoming when I have spoken to him, although sometimes I have had to be reserved to avoid jeopardising negotiations on the Clyde and elsewhere. His way of recounting to local newspapers what I have said seems aimed more at local politics than at helping the situation.

There is an important lobby today of people from the shipbuilding towns who are concerned about future employment levels in those towns. They have lobbied today largely because of speeches such as we have just heard, which have made people increasingly worried about where we are going. We ought to provide some answers. I shall certainly attempt to explain clearly where we are.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Show us where we are.

Mr. Clarke: The Opposition's explanation of where we are is hopelessly political. The hon. Member for Dagenham was listened to with care. The Opposition are now confirming my feeling that their concern is to create a row, rather than to discuss the issue sensibly.

The hon. Member for Dagenham, in describing what had happened, said that the Government had created the situation. The two things that I have mentioned, the Kvaerner bid for Govan, and the difficulties over the contract at Sunderland, are nothing to do with the Government. We did absolutely nothing to provoke them. The hon. Gentleman did not mention the underlying difficulty that has to be understood when considering shipbuilding—where are the orders coming from, and where is the work coming from? It is astonishing that he made a speech about the history of shipbuilding over the last 10 years. He dealt with the past at great length, without mentioning the slight difficulty that at the moment there are no orders from anybody who wishes to buy ships beyond the existing work on the Clyde.

The problem is getting orders. The existing work in Govan is for China, and in Sunderland it is for the Danish ferries. We are looking beyond that. We are talking about the future. It is absurd to say that the Government have caused all the problems. We just do not know where the next orders are likely to come from or at what price. Like most shipyards around the world, we are trying to cope with that.

Mr. Gould rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way just once. I do not wish to give way to the Labour party before I have really got under way.

Mr. Gould: The Chancellor is right to say that winning orders is a problem. We accept that. Does he accept that one essential condition for winning orders is the assurance that the Government intend to maintain a viable British merchant shipping industry? Will he now take the opportunity to assure the House that that is the Government's intention and that they will provide all the support required to achieve that objective?

Mr. Clarke: The prospects of having a viable shipbuilding industry, which we all would like to see, remain extremely uncertain because of the condition of world markets. Having listened to the hon. Gentleman's speech, one would not believe that the Government have committed substantial sums to intervention fund support, and more to British Shipbuilders' yards. The bulk of the money that has gone to British Shipbuilders has been invested during the lifetime of this Government a total of £1·8 billion of taxpayers' money has gone into a business that now employs 6,500 people. It is absurd for the hon. Gentleman to try to make use of today's debate to say that somehow we have shown a lack of commitment to the industry during these difficult times.

Mr. Heffer rose——

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland) rose——

Mr. Clarke: Let me take the factual basis a little further, as I have been pressed to do.

I made the announcement on 18 April, and as a result there has been a great deal of interest from people making approaches for a variety of the yards. It is quite right that I am asked to bring the House up to date. The news about Govan and Appledore has brought two main responses. There has been a wealth of inquiries from the private sector about the corporation's yards. Obviously we welcome those inquiries, as we welcome the prospect of returning the yards to the private sector if they have a future there.

I announced Kvaerner's letter of intent on 18 April. I am glad to say that talks have continued to go well. Not only is Kvaerner engaged in detailed negotiations with British Shipbuilders—which it would not be right for me to relate because difficult negotiations have to be concluded if we are to reach a successful solution—but it has had a very useful first meeting with the work force.

I listened to what the hon. Gentleman said about the possibility of a sale to Kvaerner. I think that I judged him correctly when I thought he would not oppose the sale to Kvaerner. I do not think that the local work force will drive away the approach from Kvaerner. I think that they welcome it, and I commend all those in Glasgow who are taking a responsible and realistic attitude.

More talks are planned for next week between British Shipbuilders and Kvaerner. I cannot anticipate where they will go, but I can point out to the House that not only has Kvaerner made it clear that it would contemplate placing two orders for gas-carrying ships in the yard—and there must be hopes of more orders—but that it wants to make west Scotland the centre of its gas technology business. If that were to happen, there would be prospects for many more jobs on the Clyde.

I am still being asked why we have to sell to Kvaerner and why we cannot simply take the orders. I have tried to explain this before, and I do not know whether Opposition Members have tried to raise that question with Kvaerner. Kvaerner is well established and has considerable expertise in this niche market—not all of it in shipping. Its gas technology business extends beyond shipping. It has recently been placing orders on licence around the world on a price basis. Its business intention is to acquire a yard and find a new base, and I think that we all should be hoping that negotiations will reach a successful conclusion so that that very important base is established on the Clyde.

The future for Govan and for what was Upper Clyde lies best in the conclusion of such negotiations. If it does not happen with Kvaerner, we would be interested in anyone else who offered a reasonable prospect for the area. As things stand, Govan is completing two ships for China. Nobody knows what it will do beyond that as a nationalised yard. It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to read declarations about his ideological commitment to the future of British shipbuilding, but he did not say a word about what it will build in Govan and what will happen when the Chinese ships are completed and the work force in Govan starts being laid off if there is no movement towards the Kvaerner sale to which I have referred.

We have received several written expressions of interest in Appledore. It depends on how seriously one takes them —some are more serious than others—but there have been a number of inquiries about the purchase of the Appledore yard. Some are interested in Appledore, some are interested in Ferguson and some are interested in Appledore and Ferguson as an entity. Negotiations have yet to get very far, but the interest, especially in Appledore, is very strong. I do not want to raise excessive hopes, but I am optimistic about a successful conclusion.

British Shipbuilders has businesses beyond merchant shipbuilding. Its engine building facility at Greenock, Clark Kincaid, builds large diesel engines for use at sea and in land-based power generation. We have received four expressions of interest in the acquisition of Clark Kincaid, including one from the management team, and negotiations for the sale of that shipyard have begun.

Finally, British Shipbuilders has a design and computer service business, Marine Design Consultants, which is based in Sunderland and in Dundee. MDC has attracted a particularly high level of interest. Again, I do not take all expressions of interest as commitment, but I have received a huge list of people who have expressed some interest, and I am confident that it will successfully be returned to the private sector, where it can broaden the range of its work.

I accept that there are questions about the future of British Shipbuilders because a number of the yards are now the subject of negotiations between British Shipbuilders and companies which have a serious continuing interest in maintaining them in business and maintaining a level of employment. On balance, that is good news. In fact, the approach from the Norwegians has reminded people at home and abroad of the Government's preparedness to dispose of the yards to those interested in acquiring them as a business. That has produced good news for Clydeside, north Devon and elsewhere.

I was asked about Harland and Wolff. I cannot go into that because it is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for Dagenham spoke about an order, or about the campaigning that is taking place because of the interest of Mr. Ravi Tikkoo in buying a large cruise ship. That is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. I do not believe that at present he has any indication of the cost or the level of support required. I am sure that everybody in Northern Ireland, including the taxpayer, would be interested in receiving those details and evaluating them as early as possible.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I want to draw the Minister's attention to what people are looking for in the order at Harland and Wolff. They want some enthusiasm and support from the Government. I accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point that the details are not known, but for many constituencies such as mine, which produces steel plate, and for firms such as CMR Electronics, which has submitted a major tender for the order, it will have great benefits.

Mr. Clarke: I am astonished if tenders are being submitted. It is not for me to answer on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, but my understanding is that the Government do not yet have estimates of cost, support or anything of that sort. If there is enthusiasm for the order, the sooner we move away from everybody being told through the newspapers about what an attractive proposition it is, and the sooner we get down to costs and estimates of how much the taxpayer is expected to contribute, the better it will be and the more likely we are to make progress. I can see that I am being drawn into a Northern Ireland debate. I touched on Harland and Wolff simply out of courtesy in response to the hon. Member for Dagenham.

The Government are explaining as carefully as we can where we stand with the yards in England. There is a good future in prospect for the bulk of the yards where there is interest in purchasing them, and we cannot be accused of a lack of commitment or of shirking our responsibilities. I shall repeat for the last time the figure of £1,800 million for 6,500 workers still employed. Last year, each job in British Shipbuilders cost the taxpayer nearly £20,000 to sustain through the support for the orders we had acquired and the subsidy for the losses that the yard was making over and above the intervention fund support. That is a commitment to one part of merchant shipping.

To return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney, we should not proceed with this debate on the basis that British Shipbuilders makes up the bulk of shipbuilding in this country. That is not readily appreciated by people away from the shipbuilding areas. British Shipbuilders, the nationalised industry, employs 6,500 people. In Britain—I shall leave Northern Ireland out of my figures for a moment—26,000 people are working in other yards. The total number of shipbuilding jobs in Britain is 32,500. Our £1,800 million has been used to sustain the jobs of 6,500 out of that total. That certainly means that we cannot be accused of a lack of commitment. There is no point in saying, as the Opposition seem to imply, that the only policy is to continue to throw money of that scale at the problem, particularly when they do not address themselves to the question of what they will do about new orders.

Intervention fund support has not been the major cost of British Shipbuilders. The amount of intervention fund support—the subsidy that Europeans give for orders—has amounted during our period of office to about £250 million. The rest, over £1·4 billion, has largely been spent in supporting the losses over and above the intervention fund support, and in supporting spare capacity costs when there were no new orders to cover those overheads. Every time we have taken an order the Government have given a 28 per cent. level of support. That has happened every time there has been an order from China, Denmark or wherever. The history of British Shipbuilders is that, on top of the intervention fund support, it has lost an average of about 20 per cent. more on the contract with cost overruns and delays before the ships are delivered.

The respective sales will result in new management and, in the case of Kvaerner, new forms of business. There will be people who believe that they can turn those chronically loss-making yards, some of which have been limping along in recent years, into businesses with a real future that can be put on to a commercial footing. That has to be better for the work force and for the communities that depend upon them.

Mr. Wallace: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has mentioned orders on several occasions. Is he aware that the Orkney Islands council wants to place six orders for new vessels in the near future? It found that when it wished to place an order with a British shipbuilding firm the intervention fund assistance would not necessarily be forthcoming, and it has been compelled to look abroad, where it has found that our foreign competitors are being subsidised, including one country where the subsidy will be increased threefold. How does the Minister think that that policy will help British shipbuilding?

Mr. Clarke: Intervention fund support has never been available for all yards in the United Kingdom, and most people have agreed with that. If one starts extending intervention fund support to yards that are not traditionally merchant shipbuilding yards, one simply increases the problems of excess capacity. The mood of Opposition Members on this occasion seems to be that the details of the Orkney contract would be better pursued on some other occasion.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Are not the figures that my right hon. and learned Friend has given of four times as many people working in firms that have been returned to the private sector a vindication of the Government's policy of returning the yards to the private sector step by step? Will my right hon. and learned Friend take encouragement and move further in the way in which he is describing? The record of the Northern Ireland Office in backing winners is not very high. I hope that it will pause before it puts more money into another dream project.

Mr. Clarke: On the first point, some of the privatised yards have been hugely successful and are doing better now than would have been the case had they remained nationalised. On the second point, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland would not dream of putting before the House any proposition for public support for a major industrial order that was not well-judged, based on costs and a serious assessment of what it would be likely to cost the taxpayer. That is a matter for my right hon. Friend, not for me.

I want to deal with the last point raised by the hon. Member for Dagenham, when he said that I must reaffirm the Government's commitment to the industry and so on. Nobody can quibble about our record of support for British Shipbuilders, and we shall continue to fund the corporation. We have laid an order before the House to raise the corporation's borrowing limit yet again. This will be debated in the near future on the Floor of the House. I made it clear that I no longer expect dividends to be proposed by or required of the corporation in respect of further payments of public dividend capital. Just to prove my point on the current stewardship of the Government, we shall be paying a further £24 million to the corporation this week.

I shall move on to talk about the problems at North East Shipbuilders Ltd., the problems of the orders that we have and the contractual difficulties. Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber are concerned about the state of the ferry programme at North East Shipbuilders, and I am sure that that is why many people from the north-east have come here today. We all know that there has been a dispute between British Shipbuilders and its Danish customer. I cannot intervene in that. My hope is that the dispute will be resolved. British Shipbuilders strongly denies any suggestion that the ferries are inadequate, or that there are defects in them. Counter-allegations are being made by the customer. We hope that the dispute will be resolved and that the contract will continue.

That contract is heavily supported by the Government. A total of £1 million-worth of intervention fund support is going into every ferry built. The contract price to Mr. Johansen is £4 million. The intervention fund support does not include the soft loans, and so on, which have also gone in to help this order, which is potentially for 24 ferries. At the moment the customer is in default on a number of the contracts, with the result that only two ferries have been delivered, and, as anybody who goes to Wearside is, unfortunately, able to see, there is a growing row of fine ferries moored there. In the opinion of British Shipbuilders these are potentially available for other customers. I think that there are seven ferries now on the river.

We are still waiting for negotiations, and I do not believe that it would be helpful for me to go into a blow-by-blow account of where the parties think they are at the moment. I accept that there has to be some doubt about whether the programme will be completed, but for the time being it is continuing. For so long as it is continuing, for so long as the ECGD has not declared the customer to be in default under his loans, and for so long as neither party has declared any intention of shortening the contract, we proceed with laying the keels and the customer keeps being declared in default under the contract. Everybody is hoping that this matter can be sorted out satisfactorily but, with the possibility of the programme not being completed, we are looking to the possible future in Sunderland.

Everybody accepts that any termination of orders in Sunderland would be a great blow to the local economy. Only as events unfold will we know whether Sunderland's future lies in continued support for the Danish ferries or any other kind of order or in looking for other, alternatives ways of stimulating employment in the town.

There will be talk of Cuban orders. I do not believe that the Cubans have any intention of taking the ferries, which are of a particular design intended for the Scandinavian waters. The hon. Member for Sunderland, North is always talking to me about the Cuban order, and the Cubans do, indeed, appear to be contemplating the possibility of building freighters, but no proposition has yet come in. Remembering the history of orders of this kind over the years—Polish ships, Chinese ships—we must look very carefully at these orders. The purchaser is very heavily subsidised, so one has to look very carefully at the financial basis of what is proposed.

We are making it clear to all prospective purchasers of British Shipbuilders' yards that we will discuss with them support for new orders and the basis upon which we might contemplate continued support of an intervention fund kind for the future. I should be inclined to consider requests for support from British Shipbuilders with considerable care, if not scepticism, in the light of the very heavy losses over and above the intervention support that British Shipbuilders has consistently made in the past.

People from Sunderland obviously want to know what the immediate outlook is. At the moment we have this contract under negotiation. First, it is a small source of comfort, but very relevant, that no scenario—if I may use that awful word—that can be contemplated for the outcome of the Danish ferry dispute means that the yard will close tomorrow, or anything like it. There are months of work that is bound to continue, including work in hand, contractual obligations, and so on. We are not facing a disaster that will lead to an overnight shutdown. Secondly, other things are happening in Sunderland. The Government have helped Nissan cars to go into Washington new town, and there is the potential for a huge amount of extra employment there in the early 1990s.

In any event, unemployment is falling rapidly in Sunderland. This morning's news is extremely good. Unemployment in Sunderland has fallen by 4,500 over the last 11 months. Unemployment in the Sunderland travel-to-work area has fallen faster than the average for the northern region as a whole, where unemployment has fallen faster than in any other region of the country except the west midlands.

We are not talking about a no-hope town. We are talking about a town in which the economy is coming back very strongly. I fully expect that the hon. Members for Sunderland, North and for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) will get up and say that everything is dreadful in Sunderland. I do not think that they do their town a service, because it is engaged in a great revival of activity and they should be lobbying me about the shortage of factory space for people who want to invest in alternative employment.

Things have moved a little since my last statement, but I believe that the Opposition have rushed too soon into this debate. Negotiations are continuing with Kvaerner. There are more potential customers who wish to acquire other yards—Appledore, Ferguson, and so on—with a continuing interest. The dispute over the Danish ferries is not resolved yet, but work is continuing and there is no imminent threat of all work coming to an end.

We are not talking about the end of British shipbuilding. We have had all this talk about a strategic industry and how a great maritime nation can go forward without a shipbuilding capacity. The great bulk of the industry is outside British Shipbuilders' merchant yards. We retain a great shipbuilding capacity for purposes of war or other purposes. British Shipbuilders' warship yards are already there and we have the private sector merchant yards that were never nationalised. Their employment may be modest in total, but it now approaches one sixth of that of British Shipbuilders.

I am pleased to say that there is a substantial amount of work in progress on warship building. Vickers and Cammell Laird have submarine programmes stretching well into the 1990s. Swan Hunter has two type 22 frigates and one type 23, and a second auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel under construction. Yarrow has one type 22 and three type 23 frigates. Vosper Thornycroft has work on smaller vessels until 1993.

There are good prospects of a substantial amount of new work in the shape of further type 23 frigate orders. Four companies have already tendered: Swan Hunter, Vickers, Vosper Thornycroft and Yarrow. We cannot say at this stage how many frigates will be ordered and when, but they are very important prospects. All these companies are thriving. They are the companies that the hon. Member for Dagenham was dismissing a few moments ago as failed companies in the private sector. As my hon.

Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) pointed out they are all extremely successful warship builders.

Warship builders can and do build merchant ships as well, although they do not get intervention fund support to do so. Swan Hunter is building a cable ship at the moment. Hall Russell is building a replacement vessel for St. Helens. The small private yards that I mentioned are building a range of vessels, including tugs and fishing boats. Further orders have been announced for, among other things, chemical tankers, a ferry and vessels for the Ministry of Defence. All that is shipbuilding. The Government are not in any way indifferent to the fate of shipbuilding in this country. Large sections of the shipbuilding industry are doing well and quite a number of the British Shipbuilders yards that we are talking about this afternoon are likely to do well if they go into the hands of companies such as Kvaerner and get into specialist markets in the future.

I do not for a moment deny that we are at a somewhat difficult crossroads with British Shipbuilders with the news that I have had to report on different yards where events vary from case to case. There is a limit to the information that I can give until negotiations and disputes have been resolved.

Having put in all this money to sustain the industry through a difficult time, the Government are looking to the future of the yards and the economy on Wearside and Clydeside, at where the modern jobs, the next jobs, are to come from and at the continuing, and we hope rising, employment in those towns. That is what matters most of all. I hope that the future will include shipbuilding in most of, if not all, the places with which we are primarily concerned today. We cannot be faulted for the support that we have given to shipbuilding in the past, or that we are giving to it now, which is generous to excess compared to any other industry in the country.

We shall continue to handle the problems of Govan, NESL, Ferguson and Clark Kincaid on the same pragmatic basis, case by case, and try to reach a successful conclusion. We shall handle them in a sensitive fashion, but we are not helped by the Opposition seeing the prospect of fanning a few fears and winning a few quick political points, and spreading a few unjustified rumours in the hope that they will get some advantage out of the present changing situation in the British shipbuilding world.

5.19 pm

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): It is 25 years since I made my first speech in the House on shipbuilding. Since then I have seen the nationalisation and denationalisation of the industry and served on the Committee that examined the relevant Bill in long and controversial proceedings.

I am cautious when it comes to predicting the total demise of the British shipbuilding industry. There are historical reasons for its present position and we should not spend much time in this short debate analysing them. We should look not backwards, but forwards to what is likely to happen.

I am pleased that the Minister mentioned Swan Hunter which is in my constituency. It was nationalised and then denationalised. When it was nationalised it spent some of the money given to it in the form of subsidy on modernising the yard and making it more efficient. The benefits of increasing its efficiency and of modernisation have been seen since it was denationalised, so the money was not wasted.

In the past two years the Swan Hunter group has made tremendous improvements in its efficiency and in cost reduction. Overheads have fallen by over 30 per cent. and productivity has improved by 25 per cent. Those are good, aggressive moves to keep the company in international shipbuilding. In some ways the taxpayer is now beginning to receive value for money.

The shipbuilding industry is now tightening up and making more aggressive its purchasing from local suppliers and from British industry in general. That had to come. In the past, the industry was rather slothful; it did not shop around widely enough to make its sub-contractors keen and competitive.

Recently, the result of this efficiency was shown when HMS Sheffield was handed over to the Ministry of Defence ahead of time. We should give credit for that to the shipbuilding workers and management on Tyneside. The ship was handed over with no defects or work outstanding, and the captain expressed complete satisfaction with his mastery of the ship. Such news was well received in the district, but not in the national press, in which one never hears about the good side of the business. All the national press ever does is knock the shipbuilding industry, and that has had an effect on morale.

Some companies are beginning to fight their way out of this position and adopt a more positive attitude. But I warn the Minister that this progress towards efficiency by companies such as Swan Hunter can be maintained only against a background of continuing work. Unless that is guaranteed, companies will have to make substantial cuts in their work forces. We are nearing the threshold of further cuts because of reductions in the volume of work.

The mix at Swan Hunter's yard should serve as an example to others. It consists of Ministry of Defence and merchant contracts. The company has tightened up its marketing, and its maintenance of overseas sales drives has brought an order from Ghana and a possible order from India. Above all, the company has won a substantial order, worth £40 million from Cable and Wireless, in the teeth of intense competition. Cable and Wireless did not hand over the contract—it had to be fought for.

The Government's philosophy of a hands-off approach to massive subsidy will have to change. A time is coming when we shall have to put in some money for social reasons. The company will need a social input of cash to maintain the initiative and incentive that it is now developing. It will need that to remain in the international market and as a large contractor for the Ministry of Defence.

We hope that when the contracts for the four frigates are announced, Tyneside will get a substantial share of the work. If it is successful, it will be based on a completely costed contract. The Ministry of Defence wants value for money, and it will get that from companies such as Swan Hunter.

The Conservative party's blind spot—it was evident in the Minister's speech—relates to the £20,000 per job that the British shipbuilding sector costs. How does that square with the amount it costs to keep a British farmer in a job? If we had that figure we would have a reasonable basis for comparison.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): It costs £3,500 a year.

Mr. Garrett: I am not opposed to subsidies to the farming industry if they are kept within reason, but the Conservative party is usually silent about subsidies to British farmers——

Mr. Oppenheim rose——

Mr. Garrett: I have nearly finished.

The Conservatives create mayhem about the costs of subsidising shipbuilding. I am not stupid enough to think that every shipbuilding yard should remain open if that is impossible for various reasons. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) will, I am sure, have his say about this later. Sometimes, for social reasons, a shipyard should be kept open in the short term until work comes along, and it will, because of the efficiency measures that management is introducing and because the work force realises that do-or-die efforts lie ahead.

I conclude by asking the Minister—who, I know, will not budge if I mention massive subsidies—to bear in mind in future discussions in Cabinet and with senior colleagues that there is a case for a short social fund payment to tide British shipbuilding over until orders are obtained. If he will give some sign that he thinks there is merit in my point of view, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I hope the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) will forgive me for not following his argument about the north-east. As always, his speech was reasonable, save in one respect. From listening to him and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), one would think that the Government had been wholly indifferent to the fate of British shipbuilding over the past nine years. I hate to repeat the figures—repetition is a form of flattery; but perhaps this is meant to be that —but the Government have spent £1·8 billion in that period to ensure that the industry is supported in one way or another. That is not indifference.

Mr. Gould: As the figure of £1·8 billion has been cited so frequently, it is perhaps worth making it clear that a substantial proportion of that money went to the much touted privatised yards, and another large proportion has gone on the costs of restructuring and redundancies in British Shipbuilders. The money has not gone entirely to British Shipbuilders' present operations.

Mr. Porter: A large proportion of it was used to pay for some restructuring in the industry, and it is right that that was done. Whatever way one looks at it, a substantial tranche of public money has gone to the British shipbuilding industry; that cannot be gainsaid.

I shall speak about my own area. My earliest memory of the shipbuilding industry was watching the launch of the Ark Royal in about 1950-51, when Cammell Laird employed about 20,000 people and was the hub of the town in which I was born. [Interruption.] This was a bigger and better one. It was difficult for me to watch the decline of a town that depended upon shipbuilding and had its heart in the shipyard. I still live in that town and I am pleased to see in the Chamber listening to my speech the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field).

The hon. Member for Dagenham concentrated on the problems of merchant shipbuilding, but problems also exist in the warship market. They are not as critical as those in the merchant sector, but there is very keen competition between the yards. The hon. Member seemed to ignore the obvious reason for that, excess capacity, and to hope that it would go away. It is obvious that a yard such as Cammell Laird depends greatly on the Ministry of Defence and on the Government's warship procurement programme.

I was delighted to hear my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister say that an order for another four type 23 frigates will be placed some time this year. I trust that the orders will be placed sensibly and that their placing will be based upon the philosophy that underlay the privatisation of the warship yards.

I do not want to give the House a long and detailed history of the problems of Cammell Laird. I am sorry to see that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) is not here, because many years ago he worked, no doubt expertly, as a joiner with Cammell Laird. By 1984 Cammell Laird was nearly on its knees. Nobody cared or worked very much, and that was part of the Merseyside malaise. The yard had no future and was making a loss. There was a politically and industrially motivated sit-in, and without doubt the yard was within a week or so of being shut. With the help of some hon. Members from the area, about 1,250 shipyard workers walked past the pickets. They passed the jeering bully boys, and that was a significant turning point for the town and for Merseyside. The realism shown by the work force was an important British industrial landmark and ensured the survival of the yard.

I hope that I shall not destroy the political career of the hon. Member for Birkenhead any more than I have already done by paying tribute to him for his realistic response at that time. It was realism that obtained the order for the first frigate. The first and second frigates were delivered on time and in good order, and I have no doubt that when we get an order for a third frigate it will also be delivered on time and in good order.

The thrust of my argument is that Cammell Laird went along with the Government's policy of privatisation. It accepted that the Government had the right to do that, and it made itself efficient. It has now increased its work force from its low point of about 1,200 or 1,300 to about 2,000. That is significant. It would be wrong if that yard, having gone through that change, did not get orders. It does not expect them through saying that it is wonderful and marvellous and that it is Cammell Laird's turn. Similarly, it would be quite wrong if other yards got orders on the basis that it was Buggins's turn. The Buggins philosophy is purposeless.

Yards such as Cammell Laird, which have proved their efficiency and shown that they can build these ships, should be given orders on the basis of efficiency, cost and quality. If that does not happen, the whole privatisation programme will make no sense at all. Buggins must not have his turn. On the basis of efficiency, Cammell Laird must have the orders that it deserves. I am quite certain that hon. Members with constituencies on the Wirral peninsula as a whole, and in Birkenhead in particular, will do everything in their power to ensure that Cammell Laird gets what it deserves.

5.35 pm

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): I have some justification for being happy to take part in the debate, because I have a shipyard in my constituency. It builds excellent fishing vessels and is a very thrusting and enterprising yard. However, that is not the type of yard that we are discussing.

All previous speakers have highlighted the fact that, certainly in terms of production, British shipbuilding is a sad story of decline. The over-capacity in the world's shipping industry has led to a chronic dearth of orders for new ships. It is clear that world production capacity far exceeds future demand in the medium and long term. The fall has not been uniform. In the European Community, for example, the reduction has been about 45 per cent. In Japan, which is the world's main producer, production has fallen by about one third, whereas in eastern Europe it has remained stable. Korea, which is a relative newcomer to shipbuilding, now produces about 15 to 20 per cent. of the world's ships, but the United Kingdom's share has fallen to 2 per cent.

We know that nearly every shipbuilding nation subsidises its shipbuilders, either directly or indirectly. The Minister made much of the support given by the Government. I wonder if he will give some reply to the European Community Council's sixth directive on shipbuilding, which took effect from the beginning of 1987. As I understand it, the Council agreed that the aid ceiling should be set at 20 per cent. for smaller ships costing less than approximately £4·2 million.

The Government decided that the full value of the permitted aid ceiling should not be applied to ships costing £10 million or less to build. Instead, they applied a sliding ceiling under which the amount of assistance available is set at a maximum of 20 per cent. for a £10 million ship, reducing on a straight line basis by 0·75 per cent. for each £1 million drop in shipbuilding cost.

I hope that the Minister will tell us why the Government have cut this level of aid, thus damaging our yards in their efforts to win new orders. It is extraordinary that the Government, having concluded a Community agreement on the level of aid permitted, should then refuse to take full advantage of that agreement.

The decline goes on. It was said in the merchant shipping debate and it should be said again that in 1975 there were over 1,600 British ships. Now we have less than 650. Of course our fleet, like others, has been subject to changing world trade patterns and to innovations such as containerisation. The Government's 1984 Budget which removed incentives to capital investment in shipping was a great blow. I shall speak briefly about Govan.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I hope that the hon. Lady will be brief.

Mrs. Michie: I want to say something about Govan because, like the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), I come from Scotland.

The Government intend to sell off the Govan shipyard to the Norwegian firm. Any additional work and the potential for future orders is to be welcomed, but I do not think we have been told about guarantees that the Norwegians will not just build these ships and then walk away. What hopes are there for more orders? The Minister said in his original statement that the company would be making conditions, but I do not think that he said anything about the Government asking for guarantees for workers or orders. I still do not understand—I ask the Minister again—why the Govan shipyard does not build ships for the Norwegian company. It has the expertise. Are we saying that we could not do it? Alternatively, is there not the possibility of a joint venture or the formation of a partnership?

Hon. Members have referred briefly to Harland and Wolff and the Yarrow shipyard, and to the hope that the type 24 frigates will go there. But the lack of civilian orders is crucial for our yards. We understand that British Shipbuilders—I believe this is true—would prefer to order in our yards, provided that they can compete on price and delivery, and great strides have been made in this direction. It is much more costly for a British company to spend time and money to send someone to Taiwan or Korea than to send him up to have a look at a ship in Govan. I believe that our companies want to build ships here.

The truth is that shipping companies will order ships only if the rate of return on a massive capital investment is at least as good as other investments. Any lack of Government encouragement means that this money goes elsewhere, to the detriment of shipbuilders. We all accept that shipping operates in a very competitive environment. It is not regulated like the airlines. Foreign shipowners can buy cheaper ships because of aid from their Governments, whether by subsidised building, protective trade or assistance with crew costs, and the stark reality is that British owners will not buy ships.

The Government policy means that British yards will not even be at the starting blocks to compete for work; that is bad for shipbuilding and repair, and bad for the national interest. Surely we should be supporting an industrial strategy instead of what seems to be a policy of sell, sell, sell.

I want to draw attention again to the fluctuating exchange rates, which can do more to damage ship-building than almost anything else.

We need a strong merchant fleet to carry our own trade and ensure control, as an island nation, of those vital lines. We need to send clear signals that we can reinforce and resupply our industry and population in times of tension or war. Have we reached the point where that can no longer be certain? It is increasingly clear that merchant shipping will dwindle further unless there is action now.

We have been asked, "Where are the ships and the orders?" Here are the orders. The fleet is aging. Today's ships average 12 years old, and 48 per cent. of container ships are more than 15 years old, so the crucial time for investing in British ships is immediately ahead; indeed, it is now. The Government seem content to let the ships go, and with the ships what remains of the great contribution to engineering skills from the shipbuilding industry, especially in Scotland.

We must take action now. The means are readily available. I heard the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster say this morning on the radio that he wanted somebody to come forward with ideas. I have a list of ideas here, which I will send him rather than take the time of the House now.

Many solutions are on offer in relation to crew costs and investment. The Government need to seize them, and to find the political will to look at the future of our island seafaring nation, and the shipbuilding skills and expertise of our men, so that we have a merchant fleet of which we can be proud, which is British built and crewed by British merchant seamen.

5.45 pm

Mr. David Porter (Waveney): I have been impressed since I came to the House last year by the golden opportunities missed by the Opposition in their choice of subject for Supply days and their treatment of them. I thought for a while that shipbuilding might be a different case, but I am relieved to hear that it is not.

My hon. Friend and namesake, the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) stressed realism in his speech. Realism is missing from what the Opposition say, not just about the market place but, amazingly for the Labour party, about the shop floor.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) who is no longer in his place, I am sorry to see, admitted that he was concerned only with the nationalised industries and yards. I have an independent yard in Waveney, Richards of Lowestoft, which was founded in 1876. It is a living, breathing, vibrant and private yard. I also have Brooke Yachts, which until recently was part of the internationally known Brooke Marine, the famous warship builders. I am concerned with Richards in this debate.

The men on the shop floor at Richards know the reality —that shipowners go to the cheapest source of supply. There is no customer loyalty, as shipping is an international concern. They know it every day, because if they forget it for one minute they will be out of work. They also know that British Shipbuilders makes substantial losses, something which passed virtually without comment until recently. The shop floor workers do not understand why that should be, and neither do I.

I was present when the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster assured Richards last July that he would not allow British Shipbuilders' yards to carry on putting in loss-making bids, thereby damaging the private sector at the taxpayer's expense. I have had a letter from a private secretary in 10 Downing street since then to confirm that it is Government policy. The Government attach particular importance to BS only bidding for contracts in competition with United Kingdom private sector yards, provided that it does so on a realistic basis.

I must ask a variant of the question posed by the hon. Member for Dagenham: do the Government want a small-yard, independent shipbuilding sector? The work force at Richards are incredulous sometimes at the speed of response from the "enterprise" Department. I raised with our noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the case of an application for two tank vessels submitted by Richards in March. It will go abroad unless something moves fairly quickly.

The general point remains. When pressed, the official response from the Department is often on the lines that these applications for intervention fund support are being considered in the normal way. That is not, and should not be, good enough. Surely, of all the leviathans of the state, DTI should know that speed is of the essence.

On the operation of the intervention fund, an impression persists sometimes in dialogue with officials of a slightly negative approach to using the assistance available in the manner for which it is intended. Shipowners will not wait while shipyards and the Department, and the Commission in Europe, argue the toss about applications in a protracted way. Both sides need, not a long-awaited grace and favour decision but the offer of a firm amount, so that shipowners could decide their financial liability and shipbuilders quote a firm price. Our partners and competitors in other European countries have a certain amount of flexibility, which we once had. Let us have it back.

Three or four years ago, these decisions were speedy; let us have that back, too, with the confidence in the IF system that the industry needs. I do not think that I can vouch for it at the moment. We have heard of orders tonight, such as for Danish ferries. Another was required by the Government of Mauritius. There was also the Ministry of Defence range mooring vessel order, which Richards finally won. All show in different ways that something is wrong with the present system.

To defend my hon. Friends, I am aware that this is not entirely in their hands. We are dealing with an army of bureaucrats who have failed to solve the problem, many of them in Brussels and Strasbourg. We are dealing also with almost kamikaze survival tactics from Japan, Brazil and South Korea. It is a global problem. There is a dearth of new building orders. But, as the Opposition admit, there is a glimmer of hope and a definite increase in optimism about demand prospects.

To be equally fair, some of the problems are inter-departmental. There is one skipper who would order at least two new trawlers to be built at Richards in Lowestoft but for problems with intervention and fishing licences. Interdepartmental, international or intercontinental—the noise made by the Opposition at any suggestion of subsidies being removed from British Shipbuilders is head-in-the-sand stuff.

The hon. Member for Dagenham is quoted in Lloyd's List in April as saying that it is crazy for the United Kingdom to pull out of shipbuilding when the market is picking up and United Kingdom companies are returning to competitiveness. If he is talking about BS, that remark sticks in the throat, but he misses the point—that, with a vibrant private sector, the United Kingdom will not pull out of the world market.

Shipbuilding may no longer be fashionable, but the updated private sector can offer places to graduates, craft apprentices and youth trainees. Surely that contributes to what we are all trying to achieve in respect of traditional attitudes, good behaviour and honest endeavour. The private sector must have an eye on dividends. In Richards's case, the parent company let it retain dividends while rationalising working practices. But where there is profit, there is substantial tax. How much tax has British Shipbuilders paid?

5.51 pm

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): The hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Porter) said that there is a glimmer of hope for an upturn in orders, "as the Opposition admit." We have trumpeted the fact that an upturn is coming and that there are orders to be secured. The difficulty is that the Government do not have the will to sustain the industry, to secure those orders and to continue to do so until the upturn comes. Once again, the Minister's speech was complacent, and I make no apology for saying that. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman acknowledged, the area which I represent faces—perhaps not overnight but certainly within months—closures and the loss of 3,000 jobs—with perhaps another 6,000 or 7,000 dependent on them—if the Danish ferry contract finishes and other orders are not secured.

I make no apology for being appalled by the Minister's complacency and at the incompetent muddle of his speech. His speech was permeated by the idea that there was great enthusiasm for buying British Shipbuilders' yards. I do not understand why so many people want to buy Appledore, Govan, the Clark Kincaid engine works or Ferguson-Ailsa if there are not orders in Britain or elsewhere. Perhaps people may want to buy those yards for property speculation, which would be disgraceful. The Minister has not yet answered that point, which was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould).

At stake are not just the thousands of jobs at NESL, but the pride of a community which at one time built and launched more than half the world's tonnage of ships, which has suffered tens of thousands of job losses since the Conservative party came to power and which now has its back to the wall, seeing perhaps the end of a tradition going back decades.

For all that unemployment may be falling slightly, it is still 21 per cent. in the area as a whole. Because of tradition, history and many other factors, two thirds of the work force live within a mile of the yards on the river. There are pockets and estates where unemployment is still 30 or 35 per cent. There is no need for us to face this crisis. The Opposition have argued long enough.

Korea and Japan subsidise their yards far more than the Government have been prepared to subsidise ours. Now our Government talk about "no further loss making." It is absurd. I am sure that the Minister has had placed in front of him by his civil servants—if they have any competence—figures showing the age profiles of the merchant fleets around the world. By the end of the 1990s, unless there is substantial new building, there will not be ships. They will have sunk, so old and unseaworthy is much of the merchant ship capacity. It is a question not whether there are orders and when they are coming—there will be an upturn—but whether the ships will be built in this country and whether they will be built in Sunderland—the point that concerns me.

It was an insult to shipbuilding, and to Sunderland in particular, for the Minister to say, "If we cannot sustain shipbuilding, perhaps we should look at something else." As ever, Nissan was mentioned. We all know that we shall need another three Nissans just to replace the job losses if NESL closes. Shipbuilding is a high-tech industry. Does the Minister not understand that? The ships that NESL builds are among the most superb advanced ships in the world.

I have a suggestion for the Minister. Around the country there are great big billboards, paid for by the Department of Trade and Industry, which show the heavy features of Sir John Harvey-Jones, the former chairman of ICI, who advises British business men to get ready for 1992. A few weeks ago, the same Sir John Harvey-Jones was in Sunderland for the radio programme "Down Your Way." He chose to go on one of those Danish super-flex ferries with John Lister, the chairman of the corporation. They had an interesting conversation about the superb technological advance that those ferries represented, how they were doing what had not been done before and what an advance in building they were.

As Sir John Harvey-Jones seems to have great enthusiasm for those ferries and as everyone in the town, the management and the work force stand by the standards of those ferries and refute any accusation of bad workmanship in Sunderland, instead of taking a stand-off attitude of "wait and see", why does the Minister not ask Sir John Harvey-Jones with his great commercial and industrial experience, or someone of his ilk, to step in and, on behalf of the Department of Trade and Industry and British Shipbuilders, promote those ferries on which payments have been defaulted?

The Minister should be able to say that we shall build all 24 and that, whether or not the Danes buy them, we shall find other purchasers. It is a disgrace, because the borough of Sunderland, which is hard-pressed with penalties, and threatened with rate capping, has done more to defend those ferries and to find purchasers than the Minister and the Department.

Whatever happens with the Danish ferries, we must recognise that by the end of the year, even if the contract is completed—as we pray it will be—we shall be coming to the cyclical crisis of where the next order will come from. The Minister says that there are no orders. I have a suggestion. Yesterday, for the third time, a report was issued showing that roll-on/roll-off ferries—not the Danish ferries being built in Sunderland but those crossing the Channel and other seaways—are unsafe. The Royal Institution of Naval Architects has recommended that work be done on those ferries to make them seaworthy and safe. It is a disgrace that that has not been done already. That work could be done in British ship repair yards with Government grants, if necessary. That essential work, on which the Government should insist, would provide a good breathing space before more orders are placed.

I am appalled that the Minister was so complacent about Cuba. I had never seen such a gap in beliefs. British Shipbuilders believes that it is dealing with a real prospect. If the Minister does not believe that, he should call BS in and accuse it of wasting public money. People have been going to Cuba, no longer at the initiative of British Shipbuilders but at the request of the Cubans who want to buy ships, and technical discussions have taken place. The Minister says that there has been talk of these orders for long enough. I cannot believe that he does not know that these orders are the hottest prospect of substantial orders for British Shipbuilders for a long time. The Department should be saying to British Shipbuilders, "What kind of financial arrangements shall we need to clinch the order? What kind of loans, period of grace, interest rates and package shall we need? Let's get on with that so that there is work in the yards and orders are signed."

Having denied that there are orders to be won and having dismissed the Cuban order, the Minister then says, "If there is an order, we shall have to consider it carefully. We are not sure whether we can carry on putting in money." I hope that he will at least have the decency to acknowledge that, if British Shipbuilders managed to clinch that substantial order, it would save NESL for a long time to come. We should not then have the final sabotage of the Department refusing to put together the necessary cover and financial package. That would really give the lie to everything else that he has said.

The Minister should face another fact. With all the talk about private yards, one would think that it was a great success story for the private sector and failure for the public sector. Let us consider some of the losses to which the Minister frequently refers in respect of British Shipbuilders. The assets of the privatised yards were virtually written off, and that shows up as part of the allegedly huge losses that British Shipbuilders has made.

Let me bring matters a little closer to home. The ITM Challenger, whose owner defaulted and went bankrupt, was ordered by the private sector. There are two sides to the private sector—the builders and the people who buy the ships. The £47 million for the ITM Challenger showed up as part of the loss put down to Sunderland. That was due to the failure not of public enterprise, but of the entrepreneurial system about which the Government are so enthusiastic.

The Danish ferries are not being ordered by the British Government, by British Shipbuilders or, indeed, by anyone in the public sector. Those ferries, whose owners now appear unable to pay for them and are attacking the standards of British Shipbuilders to cover up for that, were ordered by private entrepreneurs. I should have thought that when such a scheme fails, and that failure jeopardises thousands of jobs and threatens to end a community's history of shipbuilding, the Government, who are so enthusiastic about such schemes, would step in and do something to save the situation.

I conclude by quoting some of the Prime Minister's remarks when she named the Stena Seawell in my constituency on 25 April 1986. She said:

"This is a very proud day for Sunderland shipbuilders and for Britain and I am proud to be a part of it. You, Mr. Olsen, and your people designed the most modern ship with the latest technology that could be built anywhere in the world and you chose this shipyard and you chose this management and you chose this work force to to it and they've done it, and they've done it superbly. It has been a tremendous boost for us that we can achieve this in our country. It teaches us that we can do the latest technology and that we can do it well. We have the skills, the enterprise, the inspiration to do it. Thank you. Congratulations. I hope we'll be able to do a repeat performance by virtue of the tremendous advertisement we can blazon across the world with what we've done on this ship the Stena Seawell."

For the people of Sunderland, the next few weeks will determine whether that was flag-waving, empty rhetoric and hypocrisy or whether the Prime Minister is now prepared to put her money where her mouth is.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): I am immensely grateful for the chance to speak briefly in the debate, because I am concerned about the future of Appledore Ferguson which has been discussed in detail today. Like the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), I made my maiden speech on shipbuilding because of my concern about the matter, although I do not have as many years' experience of such matters as the hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless, I share his concern for the individual yards.

There have been grand speeches today about the future of British shipbuilding. We are talking about individual yards and jobs. I am concerned because Appledore Ferguson is a large employer in my constituency. There are 530 jobs in that yard and my task is to protect them because the yard puts £10 million into the Torridgeside economy. That may not sound a great deal to some hon. Members, but the Torridgeside area has historically been short of work and incomes have been low in comparison with other areas. Every shipyard job creates in the area at least five other jobs, which must also be protected and expanded.

It is not a single-industry economy in my area, but a mixed economy with many other factors depending on the large employers. The many people who come to see the shipyard and do business there attract other work to the area. They may add to our burgeoning tourist industry and they also visit our farms. The hon. Member for Wallsend mentioned the problem of support for farms and price support for farmers, but I am happy to tell him that, in the recent agriculture debate, Opposition Members committed themselves to supporting farming and to price support in that respect.

We have to eat, and we must grow as much food of our own as it is economically possible to do. I would be deeply concerned if, as an island, we ever stopped making ships, but it is a question of balance, as in so many other areas of political life. How much money do we want to pump into shipbuilding and farming, and how much should go into other sectors, such as social benefits? It must be a right and proper principle for private funding to be attracted by the Government and to come into the shipbuilding industry in every way possible, so as to release funds for other socially important matters.

I was therefore delighted to hear the Minister say that the Government were committed to sustaining economic activity in shipyard areas. I welcome that crucial commitment, but, following his statement of a few weeks ago, the workers at Appledore Ferguson are intensely worried about their future. Theirs is a right and proper concern, because job uncertainty has implications for families and the future. Above all, I seek from the Minister an understanding about and guarantees for the future of jobs in the yard. I know that it is difficult to ask him to look into a crystal ball, but, as the future of the yard's employees was undefined when he made his last statement, perhaps he can tell us a little more today.

I am pleased that a large lobby has come from the yard to the House today. I have paid two visits to the yard since I have lived in the area and I have another visit planned at the invitation of the convener, Dick Mathews, and his colleagues. I have been a little late in accepting it, but I am looking forward to making the visit shortly.

The Minister will recall that I have raised with him my concerns about Appledore several times, both in debate and privately. My concerns today can be stated very briefly, but they are none the less strong concerns. First, and most important, we should retain Appledore Ferguson as a shipbuilding unit. If we consider the examples of other former shipyards, we see that part of Falmouth has become a marina under Vosper Shiprepairers Ltd. Lowestoft is halfway to being a marina under Brooke Marine and Robb Caledon Shipbuilders at Dundee has gone into luxury flats. Much nearer home, Richmond yard, Appledore, cannot be used any more for shipbuilding and has gone to become luxury flats, and Bideford shipyard is now overrun by houses.

I can accept that those may be right and proper uses for those unneeded yards, although I would have preferred Richmond and Bideford to go a different way but, as the Minister well knows, Appledore is needed in the shipbuilding world and must not go that way. It is crucial that I obtain the Minister's commitment that the Government will do their best in that respect.

In the event of a sale, it is important that every effort should be made to keep the men and management fully in the picture, because so much shipyard knowledge is contained within the yard. It has perhaps the best union-management relationship in the business, and it is important that the track record on involving the work force in policy formation should be retained during this exceptionally difficult period. I accept that commercial constraints make that sort of commitment nigh impossible to give, but I put it on the record so that it can be carefully considered as buyers come out of the shadows and become potential bids. Appledore shipyard has a unique track record on union-management relationships.

It would be difficult even for a yard with the pre-eminence of Appledore Ferguson to survive on the open market without any support. Hard work cannot win against unfair competition, and by that I mean some of the competition from the far east which is so heavily subsidised. Appledore excels in making small dredgers, but it could make any sort of ship up to 10,000 tonnes. Support of about 20 per cent. or 28 per cent.—the figure is perhaps higher than the one given by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie)—is necessary, even for making dredgers. I cannot help thinking that those interested in the yard will also be interested in a continuing commitment to some form of support by the Government or European Community.

Appledore has a bright future and I ask the Government to help, not hinder, the yard's development.

6.12 pm

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I agree with a good deal of what the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) said. Unfortunately, she is one of the few Conservative Members who takes a keen interest in the shipbuilding industry. It is a pity that more Conservative Members do not take that interest in this extremely important industry.

I do not know whether the Minister thought that anything he said would reassure those involved in the industry who are extremely worried about the future, but I can tell him that nothing he said will provide reassurance. He told us little that we did not already know and the one or two pieces of information were rather detrimental to the interests of the industry and will certainly cause more rather than less anxiety.

The Minister did not answer some basic questions, one of which relates to the takeover of my yard at Govan by Kvaerner Industries, and the continuation of the subsidies under the sixth directive. That is a five-year commitment, started on 1 January 1987. It has been renewed at the present level of a maximum of 28 per cent. for 1988, as it was for 1987, but, as far as I am aware, there is no commitment for the Government that there will be that level of subsidy or any other beyond 1988. There have been all these stories in the press, some of which have undoubtedly been leaked from the Department——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose——

Mr. Millan: With respect, if the Minister had wanted to give that assurance, he should have done so at the beginning of the debate. He spoke for a long time and told us very little, and a Minister will reply, so I have no intention of giving way to him now.

What will happen in the next three years? The Secretary of State for Scotland can give an assurance when he replies, if there is one to be given. The Minister said absolutely nothing about the level of subsidy beyond 1988. The hon. Lady has just made a similar plea, that we want to know what will happen about EEC subsidies over this five-year period and, indeed, over a longer period.

The idea that the Government have had a genuine commitment to shipbuilding over the past eight years does not bear serious examination. They have looked on British Shipbuilders as an embarrassment. They have already dismembered it by selling the naval yards and now they are hellbent on selling the rest. I do not accept that they have had any commitment to or faith in the future of British shipbuilding, certainly not on the merchant side.

Govan is an excellent yard and the facilities there are first class, as has been acknowledged by Ministers. The management is good and there is excellent co-operation with the work force. I acknowledge immediately that there has been a problem with orders in the past three or four years. Anyone who knows the yard and is worried about its future is anxious to see that it gets new work when the Chinese orders, which it is building now, run out in 1989.

Nevertheless, the announcement about Kvaerner, or rather the leak in The Daily Telegraph, of all papers, about the Kvaerner interest in purchasing Govan, has caused considerable upset and anxiety, particularly as shop stewards were specifically assured only two days previously that rumours about a Norwegian buyer were absolutely groundless. Therefore, there is some anxiety to overcome for that reason alone.

Today we have been told nothing about the progress of negotiations. The Minister keeps saying that the negotiations are with British Shipbuilders, but his Department is involved. I do not complain about that—it is absolutely right that it is involved—but an official from his Department is to be present at the meetings which he mentioned were to take place next week in Norway, so the Government have a direct interest and we are entitled to more information than we have had so far about exactly what is going on. In a foolish statement on television a couple of weeks ago, the Minister said that there was no question of the Government laying down conditions in these negotiations. In other words, the Norwegians or anybody else can take over the yard, regardless of circumstances. They can take it off our hands, as it were. Conditions must be laid down if the yard is to be sold or, as it seems, given away.

The Govan yard, like all other merchant shipbuilding yards, has had all its assets written down to nil, apart from land, in the 1986-87 accounts. Incidentally, that is a reason for the huge figures of subsidy which the Minister quoted. If the Government give away the yard at a bargain price, which is almost inevitable given their attitude, there should be understandings, and as far as possible legal conditions should be laid down, about its future.

Two gas-carrying ships are to come to the yard and that is extremely welcome. That work will be invaluable. But what happens after that? There is no definite commitment, although there are hopes, aspirations and vague promises. We do not know what the Norwegians intend to do about building other types of ships at the yard. We do not know whether they intend in due course—I hope that they do if the negotiations succeed—to put LNG carriers as well as LPG carriers into the yard. We learned very little by way of detail from the Minister today about the transfer of gas technology. There is also the question of more investment in the yard, widening the berths and so on. All those are crucial issues for the long-term future of the yard. Answers to those queries will be very important and will show whether the Norwegian company considers the yard to be a long-term commitment.

We know that there is another side to the picture. Apart from any investment, there is talk about a significant number of redundancies. The Minister did not even mention that this afternoon. We know that if the Norwegian company becomes the owner of the yard, it intends to operate with a core work force of about 450 men and women less than the present work force. There have been no discussions or negotiations with the trade unions. One of the directors of Kvaerner visited the yard and had informal conversations with the shop steward. However, I checked yesterday and there have been no official discussions with the trade unions on the future labour force, conditions and working practices in the yard. It is absolutely essential from the Minister's and Kvaerner's point of view that the discussions take place. Unless there is a proper understanding on those matters, the yard cannot possibly be successful.

There is a long way to go yet. The workers in the yard will be extremely disappointed by the Minister's comments this afternoon. They have made it clear that although, like me, they oppose privatisation, and would like the yard to remain with British Shipbuilders, if the Government are determined to dispose of it, they will make the best of things and co-operate with the new owners.

I met Mr. Gronner a senior director from Kvaerner at an informal meeting a few days ago. I recognise that Kvaerner is a reputable shipping company with wide interests in engineering and shipping as well as shipbuilding. If the negotiations succeed, I believe that the company intends to try to make a real go of the yard. Kvaerner has more faith in the future of shipping and shipbuilding than the Government. That is one of the problems that we must deal with. If the Government had the same faith as Kvaerner about an upturn in the shipping and shipbuilding industry, the yard could successfully remain under the present ownership.

The Government have said that we should be flattered —I believe that Ministers used the word "flattered"—that someone is willing to purchase the Govan yard. What an absolute recognition of defeat. The Government are saying that we should be pleased that someone is going to take the yard off their hands and make a go of it. Why can we not make a go of it ourselves? That question was asked when the news was leaked and we are still asking it, because it has not been answered satisfactorily.

We could have attracted the orders for the gas-carrying ships into Govan without disposing of the yard. I do not believe what the Minister said this afternoon about Kvaerner wanting to build those ships in that yard. We could have attracted the orders—or similar orders—into the Govan yard without disposing of the yard. As an alternative, we could have had a joint venture arrangement between British Shipbuilders and Kvaerner. However, the Government have dismissed those possibilities. We are left with the alternative of purchase, which may hold out some hopes for the future of Govan in the short term. However, I am concerned about the longer-term interest.

It would be absolutely tragic for Govan if a deal was struck with Kvaerner or anyone else which was good for the short term, but led in the long term to the ultimate demise of the yard. I am interested in the yard's long-term prospects; that is why I want to see the firmest commitment from the Kvaerner management in the process of negotiations. After all, we are selling to a foreign firm. We know how difficult it is to have decisions reversed if a closure happens in a factory or establishment under British ownership. The difficulties will be all the greater if we are dealing with a foreign firm.

I am not claiming that Kvaerner does not have good intentions for Govan: I believe that its intentions are good. I hope that those intentions are fulfilled. We can be more certain that they will be fulfilled if we lay down conditions now. Unfortunately, from what the Minister has said today and from his general attitude on this matter, it seems that the Government will not bother to try to lay down those conditions.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): The hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) and my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) have rightly drawn attention to the successful state of affairs in our naval yards. I am sure that more export orders will arrive in the near future. The potential for the Canadian nuclear submarine order is gigantic and we must all hope that Vickers is successful in receiving that order.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South did not mention the submarine work carried out by Cammell Laird. It is fortunate to be one of the few specialist submarine builders in this country, and it has assured work through its initiative with Vickers. If we had more time tonight, I should have wanted to consider the refit work of the Royal Navy which is vital to the future of the repair yards on the Tyne. No doubt we will be able to return to that subject in future.

The main subject for debate tonight is clearly the future of merchant shipbuilding in this country. I believe that the House regards it as inconceivable that our island should not have some Merchant Navy shipbuilding capability. It is not simply a matter of our long island history; it is a question of looking to our future strategic needs. I remain convinced that we will continue to build merchant ships in future, although obviously on a far smaller scale than we would all have liked.

I remind the House that for a long time I have advised the marine equipment industry. I want to draw the attention of the House to the widespread nature of employment in the equipment industry. Many of the factories producing parts for ships are nationally and historically situated near ports and dockyards. However, many of the firms are in the midlands, miles from the sea. It is essential to remember that while the industry has done very well in exporting parts to foreign shipyards, it requires a healthy home base if it is to continue to do that in future.

The Ultimate Dream was referred to briefly. I appreciate that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was right to say that that gigantic project for a 160,000-tonne cruise liner, which will be twice the size of the QE2, is basically a subject for the Northern Ireland Office, as the discussions involve Harland and Wolff. More than half the cost of the ship would go in parts that would be constructed mostly on the mainland of Great Britain. No doubt many of those parts would be built on Tyneside and, I hope, Wearside.

I want to consider the sombre scene facing the merchant shipping yards. The present position has not come about suddenly. It is not a sudden development, apart from the crisis at Sunderland Shipbuilders. We have debated the shipbuilding scene for many years against a background of lack of orders and ridiculously low-cost competition from the far east.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster reminded us of the significant amount of aid given to the industry by the Government since 1979. I believe that talking about billions of pounds is almost meaningless to the man in the street. However, if we divide the commitment provided by the Government in terms of financial aid, it works out at £1 million for every working day since the Government came to office in 1979. I congratulate the Government on having provided that support for the industry and on having recognised its importance to the country.

I also want to draw the attention of the House to the enormous efforts made by British Shipbuilders management to modernise the yards and revolutionise working practices. In the past two years £2 million has been spent on research and development and £3 million on product development. Many new designs have been offered to the Sunderland yard and the other yards and an enormous effort has been made worldwide to find orders. That has not produced the number of orders that we would have wished, but it is not for lack of trying. It is the result of the gross over-capacity worldwide. In particular, it is the result of the development of the industry in South Korea. That country now has an order book bigger than that of Japan, and the small country of Korea now builds more ships than Europe.

At present, there are 75 tankers on Korea's order book. No tanker is building in Britain and I doubt whether one is building in Europe. We, like the other European countries, are left running around the world desperately trying to obtain orders for one or two ships at a time.

Korea decides the world prices. My inquiries there suggest that, allowing for the long hours of work, its wage rates are about one quarter of those that Britain pays. Industry leaders from Britain who were in Korea a few months ago suggest that the labour costs overall, allowing for the lack of national insurance contributions, and so on, are about 20 per cent. of European labour costs. It is not surprising that it has been difficult for European countries to compete against such figures.

A recent EEC study shows that the cost of building a tanker in Europe is $43 million. In Korea, an equivalent ship sells for $24 million. The cost of building a bulk carrier in Europe is $21 million, and such a ship in the far east would be sold for $12 million. I could go on with other examples. It is against such competition that we have a serious lack of orders.

The situation at Sunderland is not the fault of British Shipbuilders, and it is certainly not the Government's fault. However, there is a genuine and great worry in that area about the shipyard's future. It is hard to see what assurances the Government can give in present circumstances. The Government seem to be doing all that they can to sort out the sorry situation that has developed over the Danish order, but I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor can understand the need for a message of hope to come out of tonight's debate.

It is extremely hard to see how the Danes can be justified. The yard is capable and experienced, with a well-respected managing director and a skilled work force. The reasons for the trouble are very much those suggested by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) in his comments about the customer. It is interesting to reflect that the ECGD has not branded the customer as being at fault, and I find that rather surprising.

The ships for Cuba might produce salvation in the short term. We are looking at the long-term future for the industry in the rest of the country, but we must face the fact that in Sunderland we are talking about the short-term solution and salvation. We must all hope that something will come from the strenuous marketing efforts being made over those Cuban ships.

The intervention fund, which matches the aid given by our Western competitors in Europe, must continue. I believe that the Government accept that, and it should be spelt out. There will be an opportunity to do that as the discussions on the Cuban order proceed.

We are talking about an industry that has an important future for Britain, and hon. Members should do all that they can to ensure that future.

6.33 pm

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): There is one simple and direct question about shipbuilding that the Government must ask themselves and to which they must provide an unequivocal answer. Are we in the United Kingdom to retain a merchant shipbuilding capability, or do we intend for all time to surrender our traditional and proven skills in that area to foreign yards?

In recent times merchant shipbuilding has suffered cruelly at the hands of those who look for sensational negatives. Both inside and outside Government there are those whose purpose in life appears to be to demoralise and dismantle the industry.

I am disappointed by the apparent lack of understanding of the commercial realities—the need for intervention funding for our merchant shipbuilders. It evokes much ill-informed comment, and that must be a matter for regret. It should be fairly acknowledged that privatisation, even if one is convinced of the attractions for the management of the companies concerned, is not in itself an automatic panacea. It does not alter the international pricing level for ships which makes intervention funding a necessity—a commercial reality of life for all EC countries. The United Kingdom cannot isolate itself from that reality if it is to maintain a core of merchant shipbuilding capability in line with the majority of European nations.

Kvaerner, on entering talks on the sale of Govan, made it clear that it will go forward with a deal only on the understanding that there will be access to intervention funding. That is not surprising, because it is the agreed and accepted way in which other European shipbuilding nations operate to match far east competition.

I listened to the Minister on the radio this morning when he spoke of shipbuilding in terms of what is happening at North East Shipbuilders Ltd. I agree that it is a matter of regret that the company is in difficulty with clients over the future of a valuable ferry order. It is to be sincerely hoped that that can be completed as originally ordered.

However, in the present situation it cannot be surprising that North East Shipbuilders Ltd. does not have customers tied up and willing to place an order. Without a customer, the whole question of intervention funding becomes irrelevant. But surely, in current market conditions, the Government's policy on shipbuilding and intervention funding in the United Kingdom cannot be based on that one yard. Is it the Government's wish to allow a situation where such is the doubt created in the minds of those who would order ships that they automatically look away from British yards to those on the continent or in the far east?

That is not how it has to be. Everything points to an upturn in overall market conditions within the next two to three years. Whereas in 1983 there was a laid-up 90 million tonnes, or 15 per cent. of the world fleet, that figure has dropped dramatically to around only 3 per cent. today. That usage, combined with the comparative obsolescence of a large part of the world's fleet, shows that much new build must occur in the early 1990s.

I have seen the Harland and Wolff yard in my region come through a traumatic six-year period during which it has cut its work force by over 60 per cent. It has just completed negotiations which will produce a degree of flexibility within the remaining work force which is unparalleled in the United Kingdom and will match the best in Europe, and it has adapted itself to the market demand for high-tech ships. That, and the massive dry dock and other capital resources that Harland and Wolff possesses, puts it in a position to compete on virtually equal terms with European opposition.

Nor did the cost of that rationalisation come anywhere near the £20,000 per job that I heard the Minister quote on radio this morning and in the House this afternoon. With the exception of the last year, when there was a one-off situation, the average annual cost per job has been about one third of that figure.

I was surprised to hear the Minister refer to extra costs as loss costs. They are the costs of restructuring—restructuring to enable shipbuilding to move forward to the 1990s. We could not produce new jobs which would impact throughout the United Kingdom, as shipbuilding does, for anything like that cost.

What a pitiful surrender it would be if, with brighter prospects ahead, the Government were now to implement a stringent unilateral policy on intervention funding, completely out of line with our EEC partners. It would sound the death-knell for our merchant shipbuilding industry.

At Harland and Wolff one finds a different situation from that at North East Shipbuilders Ltd. Harland and Wolff has customers who are willing to place orders which would bring the United Kingdom back to the very forefront of the cruise liner market. Yet every sort of innuendo, damaging criticism and abuse is levelled not only at Harland an Wolff, but at their biggest potential customer.

Are we really trying to create a situation where we hand over to a foreign yard the work and prestige connected with that project, and probably further similar orders? Further, is every shipowner, particularly shipowners with proven track records, to be treated as fair game for totally unjustified criticism when expressing a desire to have a vessel built in Northern Ireland? That is hardly the way for the United Kingdom to go about winning major export contracts.

Some sections of the press appear to have got it wrong, too. It was not a proven industrialist, such as John Parker, who brought De Lorean to Ulster; it was the Government of the day. Leaders of industry and respected customers should not have to live for ever under that cloud. Must that spectre be permitted to crush all potential for initiative and creativity in the Province?

I am concerned that, just as we have lost virtually all our merchant fleet since 1982, so we may be losing our potential to rebuild it, if and when the opportunity or need arises. One must also consider the domino effect that any further contraction of the shipbuilding industry will have —not only in areas of shipbuilding but throughout the country. The vital knock-on effect of a large proportion of any shipbuilding contract being sub-contracted throughout Northern Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom has already been described. Letters have been sent to my hon. Friends the Members for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) and for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs) from Ulster Carpets and from CMR Electronics, which wish the Ultimate Dream contract to go ahead because it will create work for those companies. The Minister really should have understood that if Harland and Wolff is to arrive at a contract price, inquiries must go out to the companies that will be involved in sub-contracting.

Is there not every justification for the United Kingdom to retain a core merchant shipbuilding industry so that it may at least compete on equal terms with other European yards? Both the Minister and the House know the answer to that question. I hope that sensible decisions will be taken which will give back hope and confidence to both our merchant shipbuilding industry and its potential customers.

6.42 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): The Chancellor of the Duchy opened with the implicit criticism of our action in originating this debate. The suggestion was that it came too early. It was necessary to have this debate now because of the anxiety which exists over the uncertainty and problems facing the shipbuilding industry. That uncertainty will undoubtedly affect morale and confidence, and it is right that we should push the Government for an up-to-date report. If the House is not entitled to such a report, certainly those whose livelihoods depend on the industry are entitled to know what progress has been made. My one regret is that the House has learned disappointingly little as a result of this exercise. However, that does not invalidate our attempt, and certainly we shall be returning to press the Minister again and again.

Much depends on the Government's attitudes. Because it is not the main subject of the debate, I shall make only a passing reference to the major frigate shipbuilding company of Yarrow, which is located on my constituency boundary. The Chancellor of the Duchy made only a very casual reference to the type 23 orders, and could not say what they would total or when they would be forthcoming. I recognise that it may be difficult for the Minister to give that information, but it is essential that Yarrow receives an early order for four type 23s. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, it has been promised only a variation of between one and four orders. All the yards are gasping for those orders. In the case of Yarrow, there have already been some redundancies, and if no orders are received there will be substantial job losses by the end of the year. Those orders are as important to Swan Hunter, Vickers and Vosper as they are to Yarrow. That is one area of the shipbuilding industry where immediate salvation lies entirely within the confines of the Government's ordering policy and is in the hands of Ministers.

It is interesting that the Minister feels that the talks concerning Govan are progressing well. He was being optimistic when he said that the work force there welcomed what was happening. That is not a very accurate description of the situation. There may be recognition that, sadly, the sale of Govan may be the only way forward. If that is so, everyone in the yard, in Glasgow, and in the shipbuilding industry generally will want to make a success of that development. However, it would be wrong if Ministers—as has occasionally been the case in similar circumstances previously—presented that situation as some kind of triumph and a major advance. It is a retreat for the British shipbuilding industry, now that a very important yard will be flying a foreign flag.

I have considerable sympathy with the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), who questioned whether it was necessary for the yard to go with the orders. The Minister said that it was a fine prospect that Kvaerner was setting up its gas technology industry on the Clyde. I am not clear what that means, beyond the two orders which have been pledged to the yard. If there is a wider prospect, and if there will be a larger spread of jobs, perhaps the Secretary of State for Scotland, who must be following these matters closely, will say a word or two about them. He will appreciate that the phrase "some restructuring", which has taken on a somewhat sinister air, is one in which we are all entitled to take an interest.

I underline the point about early consultation with the work force and with the shop stewards. Whether or not rumours about 450 job losses are correct, it is important that we look for long-term guarantees and that the Government involve themselves not just in providing two orders in the short term but also in creating the kind of base which will allow the yard to continue flourishing.

The House was told that there was a wealth of inquiries for some smaller yards. I was glad at least that there was mention of Clark Kincaid and of Ferguson. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who has sat patiently throughout this debate but who has not managed to catch Mr. Speaker's eye, has pressed the Minister in the past on that subject. It seemed as though Ferguson was far from the Minister's mind on that occasion. I hope that the right solution will be found for that yard and for Appledore, whose future was eloquently defended by the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson). We shall be looking for further details of the Government's plans at an early stage.

NESL faces a difficult and tragic situation. It is depressing to see the way in which Ministers approach it. I was angry at the way we were accused of scaremongering and of presenting a gloomy scenario that could not be justified. However, almost everything said by the Minister could be described in exactly those terms.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is extremely difficult for the management and the work force of NESL to secure orders against the background of the black propaganda emanating from the Department of Trade and Industry, seen most noticeably in The Guardian's front page leader on 4 March?

Mr. Dewar: It was certainly rich of the Government to accuse us of being defeatist about the industry's prospects when the Minister could only tell the House that he was unable to intervene in any way and could only stand by and hope that everything would be all right with the Danish contract. He acknowledged that it might be a great blow for the local economy, and the nearest thing to good news he could manage was that if a shutdown was necessary, it would not be made overnight—that there was no imminent threat of all work coming to an end: no imminent threat, but presumably a medium-term threat.

The Minister went on—I thought, suggestively—to speak of other prospects in the area, such as Nissan, and about the general level of unemployment. I do not know what is the Minister's idea of defeatism, but such remarks will not put a spring into the step of anyone working for NESL or living in Sunderland. I hope that he will take a more positive approach and will recognise that he has a duty to that yard, as he has to the other sectors of the British shipbuilding industry which have been in public ownership.

The Government resent the suggestion that they lack commitment, but there were real signs of that in what the Chancellor of the Duchy had to say. We distrust ministerial motives and believe that there is a real danger, as anyone who studies the Government's track record will understand, that the Government will privatise and shove the yards out of the public sector and then walk away from the problem without a backward glance. I do not believe that a responsible Government should do that, or that we should in any way encourage them or give them an easy passage if that is what is in their mind.

I believe that the shipbuilding industry has a future. There has been much talk about some recovery in the market, which can be seen in the amount of tonnage laid up, in charter rates and so on. It will be a long haul; it will be a difficult market for a very long time. But there is room for a specialist shipbuilding industry in this country, with all the skills and engineering excellence that it represents.

The Government should recognise that. They should look at the areas where public sector orders may arise and perhaps can be advanced. They should give realistic commitments about the level of support and their willingness to abide by at least the EEC level of 28 per cent. It is important that they put themselves out to help the industry through what is undoubtedly a very difficult period. It is all too convenient to say that part of it could be sold and the rest could be industrial scrap. That means putting on the scrap heap many people with real skill who have given a lifetime of service to that industry, or hoped to do so.

The Minister said, in a phrase that I thought rather quaint, that the industry was at a somewhat difficult crossroads. I thought it quaint because it so understated the evident danger that faces almost every yard and every part of the industry. We are determined that, if the industry is at a crossroads, the Government should at least make the right choices. We will do all that we can to concentrate the Minister's mind on that, because we feel that if he is left to himself there may well be an abdication of responsibility, with tragic consequences.

6.51 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): We have had a very serious and constructive debate. It is perhaps significant that a substantial proportion of those who have contributed have a deep and personal constituency interest in the future of shipbuilding. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) and for Waveney (Mr. Porter), to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) and to the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), whose passionate speeches clearly showed their concern for their local communities—as have those of other hon. Members who have caught your eye, Mr. Speaker.

The debate takes place at a time when there is a feeling on both sides of the House that we wish to maximise the prospects for shipbuilding in the United Kingdom, but on a basis that is healthy and viable. We are conscious that over the past few years the prospects for shipbuilding throughout western Europe have been very grim. Sweden, for example, has closed its last major merchant shipbuilding yard. The French have run down their yards from five to only one, and the Spanish have reduced their capacity by some 50 per cent. The Germans, the Danes and even the Japanese have been closing yards. This is not a problem peculiar to the United Kingdom, and it is not sufficient simply to have good will or good intent. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy rightly pointed out, in the absence of orders there is a grim future for any industry.

Over the past 10 years, the Government have made their commitment very clear. The £1,800 million that we have made available has not simply been support through the intervention fund; that has been a relatively small proportion of the total, becuse of the limits that are required. A substantial amount has been used to cover the trading losses of companies that obtained orders. That is one of the saddest facts about the shipbuilding industry; even when orders have been obtained, many companies have sustained massive losses.

The right hon. Member for Govan said that he was concerned that my right hon. and learned Friend had, as he claimed, given no indication of the Government's view about the future of support for the industry. I ask him to read tomorrow what my right hon. and learned Friend said. Perhaps I can remind him. He said that, with regard to support for new orders, we have made it clear to all who have inquired in connection with the present disclosures that we are prepared to discuss support for new orders with them.

Dr. Godman: The Secretary of State knows that I have been present throughout the debate. May I point out that I sincerely hope that, if the Norwegian firm is successful in its bid for Govan, the Government will impress on it the need to order the engines for the liquefied petroleum gas carriers from Clark Kincaid in my constituency? May I also plead for the Secretary of State to keep a tight weather eye out for Ferguson, also in my constituency? Both, as he well knows, are very important to the local economy.

Mr. Rifkind: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. He is right to express concern for both establishments, and it is encouraging that there has been interest in both as a result of the Government's recent announcement.

It is important to remember a number of important considerations about Govan. First, as the right hon. Member for Govan well knows, the Government did not simply go out looking for a purchaser. Kvaerner made the first approach, expressing an interest in acquiring the yard. The Government then responded to that interest.

Secondly, it is not a speculative interest. We are all aware that, occasionally, companies buy yards and then hope to find orders. What is most encouraging and welcome about Kvaerner's interest is that, far from wishing to look for orders, it has orders, and has already said that, if it is successful in acquiring the yard, there are at least two liquefied petroleum gas carriers that it wishes to build in the yard, and further orders for similar vessels are likely. Of particular importance is the firm's suggestion that, apart from the shipbuilding role that it sees for Govan, it wishes the centre of its gas-handling technology to be transferred there. That is not only important from a technological point of view, but could lead to a significant number of jobs in the Glasgow area.

One of the curious things said by the right hon. Member for Govan was his repetition of what has been said in other quarters, concerning his personal belief that Kvaerner could have been persuaded, or could be required, not to acquire the yard but simply to place orders, while British Shipbuilders retained ownership of the yard. The House will have noted that the right hon. Gentleman did not produce an iota of evidence to substantiate that view. He informed the House that he had had recent discussions with senior management of Kvaerner. Presumably he raised this issue with them. If he has reason to believe that the firm is interested in doing as he suggests, it is surprising that he made no such reference in that respect to the House.

I must tell the right hon. Gentleman, and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), that the simple fact is that Kvaerner made it clear that its interest is in acquiring the yard, not in placing orders. If it does not acquire the yard, there is no guarantee or even likelihood that orders will necessarily come to Govan. They might go to many other shipyards around the world. The right hon. Gentleman must take that into account, for I know that he is as concerned as the rest of us for the future of employment in the yard. Kvaerner's present interest is the best prospect for the yard that has emerged for some considerable time.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, once the Chinese ferry orders are complete, there are no other orders on the order book, and the prospects for Govan—whatever the view or policy of Government—could have been very serious. The fact that Kvaerner is not only interested in acquiring the yard but has ships to build there may explain the constructive approach of the unions at Govan.

When Mr. Sammy Gilmore, the shop steward at Govan, was asked whether the unions would be obstructive and seek to oppose Kvaerner's interest, he replied:

"We are shipbuilders, not anarchists . . . The name of the game is employment."

He rightly went on to say that the trade unions would naturally wish to discuss in detail the consequences for the work force, saying with his customary humour:

"There will be no Vikings sailing up the Clyde until after the Glasgow Fair."

That may be a prediction about timing, but it also demonstrates a desire for the negotiations to succeed, which is very welcome.

Mr. Millan: What I was trying to find out from the Ministers—I have not done so yet—was what understandings and undertakings they are attempting to obtain from Kvaerner in the negotiations.

Mr. Rifkind: These are delicate matters of negotiation. Our main interest is that Govan should have not a short-term but a long-term future. Kvaerner is not only talking about two immediate orders for liquefied petroleum gas carriers, but is also suggesting that future orders are likely for the same kind of vessel. Moreover, it would not be suggesting publicly that it wishes to transfer the whole of its gas-handling technology to Govan if its interests were only short-term. There was no need for it to say that. It does not relate directly to the shipbuilding activities at the yard itself. It is a sign of the serious intent of the firm to establish a long-term presence.

With regard to shipbuilding as it involves British Shipbuilders as a whole, there is a common interest on both sides of the House to try to ensure a long-term future for the shipbuilding industry. We believe that, with a return to the private sector and with the interest currently shown by the private sector, that is realisable. It is on that basis that I invite the House to oppose the motion and to approve the amendment.

Resolved,

That this House recognises the support that Her Majesty's Government has given to the shipbuilding industry; and welcomes the prospect of returning British Shipbuilders' yards to the private sector.

European Community (Finance)

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

7.13 pm

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 10552/86 and the un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Treasury on 18th March 1987 on the 1987 Community Budget, the un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Treasury on 18th March 1987 on carry-over of appropriations from 1986 to 1987, 6037/87 on the 1987 Budget situation, 6822/87 and 7552/87 on Supplementary and Amending Budget No. 1 for 1987, 6048/87, 7211/87, COM(87)240, COM(87)677 and COM(88)81 on the 1988 Preliminary Draft Budget, 4766/88 on the 1988 Draft Budget, 4051/87 on financial engineering, 5266/88 on Own Resources, 5282/88 on amendments to the Financial Regulation and the un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Treasury on 10th May 1988 on budgetary discipline; and endorses the Government's objectives of securing effective and binding control of Community expenditure.

I am delighted that the House has the opportunity this evening to debate the unfinished business of the Brussels European Council and the 1988 Community budget, ahead of the decisions which the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament are likely to reach over the next month or so.

The motion mentions a number of documents, deposited with the House, which the Scrutiny Committee has recommended for debate. I pay tribute to the Scrutiny Committee for its clear, concise and conscientious reports on these documents. I pay tribute also to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee, which has been monitoring developments in Brussels with all the diligence and understanding that we have come to expect from that Committee.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As my right hon. Friend said that the Council and the Parliament are likely to agree these matters within a month, will he explain how that is possible under article 199, when this Parliament and other Parliaments have not approved the increase in resources that would match the expenditure under article 199?

Mr. Brooke: If my hon. Friend will be content to know that I was going to deal with those matters at some length, it might be more sensible if I took them in logical order.

The House may find it helpful if I begin by saying a little about the likely timetable of events in Brussels, the Community's financing needs and the procedures for obtaining Parliament's approval for the Community's new own resources decisions and the 1988 intergovernmental agreement, or IGA. The House may like to be reminded that the Heads of Government agreed at the Brussels European Council in February on a new own resources ceiling and system for the Community. They also agreed that it should take effect for the current year by means of an agreement between the member states that they will provide supplementary contributions to the 1988 Community budget in the form of non-reimbursable advances against the newly agreed own resources, pending ratification of the new own resources decision.

To begin then, with the likely timetable, we learned from Strasbourg last night that the European Parliament had reached agreement with the President of the Budget Council on the 1988 Community budget, though it is not yet clear whether the President of the Parliament, Lord Plumb, will declare the budget adopted until final agreement has been reached on the other unfinished business of the Brussels European Council.

The Community has still to reach final agreement on all the other main documents implementing the European Council conclusions, including the new decisions on own resources and budget discipline and the 1988 IGA. Also unfinished are the negotiations with the European Parliament on an inter-institutional agreement about implementation of the Community's expenditure policies over the next five years. There now seems a good chance that all this unfinished business will be resolved over the next three or four weeks, but I cannot, of course promise the House that that timetable will be fulfilled.

If I may turn next to the Community's financing needs and the question of seeking the House's approval for the Community's new financing agreements, I want to say first that the Government will not pay any contribution to the Community under the new own resources decision or the intergovernmental agreement until the House has signified its approval. I have made that point already to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee, and I am glad to repeat it in the House now.

The Commission will, however, have an urgent cash-flow problem over the next few weeks. It has calculated that this will arise in any case as a result of the Community's existing obligations, whether the 1988 budget is formally adopted or not. The cash requirement has nothing to do with adoption of the budget or the IGA, but simply reflects the fact that the level of spending to which the Community is committed, in particular on agriculture, is running faster than the limited revenues which are available, month by month, under the present provisional twelfths regime. Earlier in the year the Commission's cash position was strong and this enabled it to make ends meet. This month, however, it has had to call for an advance payment of traditional own resources under article 10(2) of regulation 2891/77. I shall be providing details of this in a written answer tomorrow.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): The House might be slightly puzzled, as I confess to being, at hearing my right hon. Friend say that there are problems of expenditure outrunning resources. My right hon. Friend will recall that when Fontainebleau was concluded we were told that effective measures had been put in place to control expenditure. If I am not mistaken, we shall probably be told something similar in a few moments. How can my right hon. Friend square the fact that the Parliament and the Community have run out of money and are in crisis with the fact that Fontainebleau was supposed to provide the answers some two or three years ago?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend will be familiar with the answer. In the current year the Community is operating on provisional twelfths. Provisional twelfths quite clearly do not represent the level of resources that would otherwise have been adopted, because no budget has been adopted. That is why the Commission has a cash flow problem.

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): Is it quite accurate for my right hon. Friend to say that the Commission has a cash flow problem? Would I be wrong in supposing that if the House does not agree to an IGA or to the increase in own resources, the Commission does not have a cash flow problem; it quite simply does not have the money?

Mr. Brooke: The provisional twelfths amounts come through on a monthly basis. It is a current month problem that the Commission has asked us to address. The nature of a 10(2) overdraft request is simply to ask for own resources to be brought forward and to be paid at a slightly earlier date than they otherwise would be.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way at this point, because it helps to bring about a rational debate. He may have said something that he did not intend. He said that the new IGA would not be approved by the Government unless it had been endorsed by the House. That has to happen through a Bill or an Estimate. Can he assure the House that the Government would not assent to that in the initial stages, before it was endorsed by the House, unless and until there had been agreement in the institutions of the EEC to the British rebate formula and the disciplinary documents? Surely the former depends upon the acceptance of the latter.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct in identifying that as a subject that came up when I gave evidence to the Treasury and Civil Sevice Select Committee last week. If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me I shall come to the issue and deal with it within the logical framework of my speech.

Next month the Commission expects to have to call for overdraft facilities under article 12(2) of the same regulation, although on a much smaller scale than would be implied by a six-monthly slice of IGA contribution.

When the 1988 budget is finally adopted, the Commission will need further funding without too much delay to enable it to fulfil its responsibility to implement the budget. It has suggested that it is likely to call up contributions from member states in the form of IGA contributions or of overdraft advances under article 12(2) of the regulation to which I have referred, depending on what has been agreed in the Council and what is possible for the member state concerned. Initially, these requests for the funds will be needed to cover cash flow requirements which would have arisen in any case. The IGA cannot be finally crystallised until we have agreement on all the relevant provisions of the Community's new own resources decision, including the United Kingdom abatement provisions.

Member states are obliged to comply with overdraft requests by the Commission under article 12(2) of the regulation, provided that these are genuinely needed to cover a prospective cash deficit, and provided that they would not involve exceeding the own resources known to be available for the year. The Government stand ready, therefore, to meet such overdraft requests, before or after adoption of the budget, and before or after final agreement on the IGA, provided that these conditions are fulfilled. We would charge such overdrafts directly against the Consolidated Fund, like all other Community obligations, while keeping the House fully informed. The Government would not, however, intend to meet demands for overdraft contributions, to the extent that these were in effect requests for IGA contributions, without first seeking the House's approval for the necessary supplementary financing.

As we cannot be sure when the supplementary financing will first be needed, we may well find that we have to seek Parliament's approval on a somewhat accelerated timetable, though the overdraft facility will continue to be available in the way that I have described. If that happens, I am sure that the House will understand the reasons why.

As to the means by which Parliament's approval will be sought, there are in principle two main options. One will be to seek approval my means of a composite Bill, covering both the new own resources decision and the IGA. This would follow the precedent of the European Communities (Finance) Act 1985. The Bill would be introduced as soon as possible after the IGA and the new own resources decision have been formally agreed and the 1988 budget adopted. The initial instalment or instalments of the IGA would be financed as necessary from the Contingencies Fund if and when Parliament has given the Bill a Second Reading.

The other option would be to decouple the own resources decision and the IGA. On this approach we would seek approval for the own resources decision through a Bill while separately presenting a special Estimate and Consolidated Fund Bill to cover our IGA contributions. The procedure for approval of the 1984 IGA would provide a precedent for that.

I imagine that most hon. Members would feel, as I do, that the composite Bill approach would be preferable to the decoupled approach.—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I shall stick by the observation I have made. If hon. Members wish to disagree during the debate, I shall look forward to replying later.

Mr. Spearing: This is a Committee-style exchange because Committee-style detail is required. Surely the right hon. Gentleman appreciates that the IGA is outside the treaties and is an agreement between Governments not within the treaty of Rome. The draft decision, which has also to be ratified by the House and which has not yet been completed in Brussels, will have to be ratified to cover the new financial structure for the next five years. Surely it would be quite wrong to put the two together—one intra-treaty and one extra-treaty—in the same piece of legislation.

Mr. Brooke: I have offended the purist instincts of the House in suggesting that they should be taken together. I did not hold the office for which I am currently responsible during 1984 and 1985. My understanding of the affairs of that time was that Parliament in general, and the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee in particular, had shown a preference for the linked approach and the composite Bill. It is the case—I am now referring to Parliament's convenience—that one would be taking through the entire complicated matter in a single tranche rather than as separate measures. No doubt other hon. Members who registered a negative a moment ago will want to enlarge on that when they speak.

The final choice will have to depend on the timing of agreement in Brussels on the various elements in the total package. If the final agreement on the own resources decision, or even on the IGA, should be delayed, the composite Bill route might not be available and, as I understand it, would not be to the liking of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). Decoupling might then be the only solution.

Before leaving this important subject I should emphasise again that the timetable in Brussels remains uncertain and we do not yet have final decisions on how the Commission will handle these somewhat complicated financing issues. The Government's own proposals on procedure must likewise, therefore, remain provisional for the time being. I shall keep the House informed about developments.

The documents that appear in today's motion fall into four categories: documents relating to the 1987 and 1988 budgets; a document on the Community's "financial engineering" proposals; the Commission's proposal for a new own resources decision; and documents on budget discipline and management.

With the House's permission, I shall say a few words about each of those subjects. First, I shall deal with the 1988 budget. The documents in today's motion have been largely overtaken by the developments in Strasbourg last night, which I mentioned earlier. Although precise details are not yet clear, it seems that the European Parliament voted yesterday evening to reinstate all its first reading budget proposals, thus creating, on present indications, an excess of 200 mecu in commitments over the statutory margin that the treaty allows the Parliament to add to the Council's proposals for non-obligatory expenditure, while using up all the margin for payments.

In response to this, the President of the Budget Council announced that he had authority from the Budget Council to negotiate a new maximum rate of increase for commitments and would therefore agree to the Parliament's proposals on the Council's behalf. The result is that we now have agreement between the Council and the Parliament on the 1988 budget.

It remains uncertain when the President of the Parliament, Lord Plumb, will declare the budget adopted. He said last night that he would take time to consider——

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I hesitated for a moment before pointing this out, but I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that he has already made these points to the House this evening.

Mr. Brooke: I will, if I may, continue my speech.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): I wonder whether it would assist the House if I told my right hon. Friend what happened in the European Parliament yesterday, because I was there. The Parliament voted through a budget that went beyond what the Council regards as the margin of commitments and the President of the Council, Mr. Tietmeyer, signalled his consent to that higher amount by fixing a new maximum rate. Therefore, the situation is that the budget is now in a condition to be signed by the President of the Parliament. He has said that he will sign the budget after he has studied it, and the event upon which he is waiting is the next round of discussions on the inter-institutional agreement, to which my right hon. Friend referred, and which represents the Parliament's desire to be associated with the longer-term framework of budgetary discipline over a five-year period. What has not yet happened, as my right hon. Friend said, is any vote in the Parliament on the financial regulation or the own resources decision.

Mr. Brooke: By some process of serendipity, my hon. Friend has anticipated with absolute precision the remarks that I was about to make. I shall enlarge upon what I said earlier about Lord Plumb before the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) intervened.

Lord Plumb said last night, as my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) mentioned, that he would take time to consider whether the budget had a secure revenue base, and also the state of play on the inter-institutional agreement about the development of the Community's programmes over the next five years, which the Council and the Parliament are trying to negotiate. Some members of the Parliament are arguing that, in the absense of agreement on the new own resources decision and the IGA, the budget has no secure revenue base. We have considerable sympathy with that view. The decision, however, is for Lord Plumb. Here, too, I undertake to keep the House informed about developments.

As to the magnitudes involved, we do not yet have the detailed figures from Strasbourg. Our own provisional calculations suggest, however, that the budget as now agreed will provide for total commitment appropriations of 45·3 becu and total payment appropriations of 43·8 becu. Compared with the final budget for 1987, the percentage increases are 20·9 per cent. for commitments and 21 per cent. for payments.

Within the totals, the level of agricultural guarantee expenditure is exactly as agreed at the Brussels European Council. The percentage increase in non-obligatory payments is 9·5 per cent.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I am trying to understand what is going on. It seems that we are in a rather humiliating position in that we do not know what we have to pay. All we know is that it is continually more each year and each time the Paymaster comes along. That is a singularly appropriate nomenclature. He is the paymaster of the Common Market. Whatever it says we have to pay, he coughs up the money. He is not sure what we have to pay, but we have a helpful intervention from a member of a slightly alien institution who gives him helpful advice as to how much we have to pay. Whatever it is, he gives us the bill and we pay it. Is that what the British Parliament has come to?

Mr. Brooke: If the hon. Gentleman will excuse me, I think that that was a largely rhetorical intervention. I can assure him that when I became Paymaster General I informed my friends in the Budget Council that my attitude towards them had not changed at all and that my title did not indicate any change in my attitude.

I was referring to the level of agricultural guarantee expenditure. The increase in non-obligatory payments is 9·5 per cent. This, too, is broadly in line with the level of expenditure envisaged at the Brussels European Council, although the increase of 12·6 per cent., in non-obligatory commitments is somewhat higher than I would have wished. I argued at the last Budget Council, with French support, that the Council should not agree to any excess over the statutory margin which the Parliament is entitled to add to the Council's non-obligatory expenditure proposals. The prevailing view was, however, that the President of the Council should have a certain flexibility to negotiate with the European Parliament.

I turn briefly to the document on the Order Paper, No. 4051/87, which introduces the Commission's ideas on financial engineering. "Financial engineering" is a term of art in the Community—if art is the right word—which refers to the mobilisation of funding for investment. The Government share the Commission's views on the importance of the spirit of enterprise, the working of market forces and productive investment.

We are not convinced, however, that new Community funding mechanisms are necessary. In most of the Community countries we already have highly developed private sector mechanisms for funding investment programmes, and the Community itself already has a major institution, the European Investment Bank, for the funding of investment projects in Europe. The member states will no doubt wish to examine the Commission's idea carefully with these points in mind.

Mr. Curry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the British Government's ideas on reducing the number of commissioners had been adopted, so that there was one per country, we might have rather fewer policies, because it would not be necessary to find policies for every commissioner to manage?

Mr. Brooke: I am familiar with the application of Parkinson's law in all areas of human endeavour, and in the Commission in particular.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Before my right hon. Friend leaves document COM(87)150, as he has referred to the percentage increase in agriculture, could he explain why on page 16 of that document, which seems to be the fundamental page setting out the figures, according to the Commission and according to those who published it, there is a proposal to increase expenditure on agriculture by 16·03 per cent., and not the figure that he mentioned, particularly as this seems to be an extravagant figure well beyond what was mentioned in his speech or in the discussions in the European Council?

Mr. Brooke: As that is a rather detailed statistical point and I do not have the document readily at hand, I shall respond to my hon. Friend at the close of the debate.

I turn now to the new own resources decision. Document 5266/88 in the motion contains the Commission's proposal for this important new decision, which the Council and official Committees in Brussels have been debating for several weeks. The purpose of the new decision is to give effect to the agreements on own resources which the Heads of Government reached in February at the Brussels European Council. In keeping with this, the decision provides for: a new own resources ceiling of 1·2 per cent. of the Community's GNP, with a corresponding 1·3 per cent. of GNP ceiling on commitment appropriations; limitation of VAT contributions to 1·4 per cent. of the VAT base, which is similar to consumer expenditure; a redefinition of the VAT base, known as "capping", such that in future the assessable VAT base of each individual member state may no longer exceed 55 per cent. of its GNP; the introduction of a fourth own resource, based on GNP shares, which will take its place alongside the existing levies and duties and VAT own resources and serve as the Community's residual source of finance; and new provisions to ensure that the Fontainebleau abatement system for the United Kingdom remains intact within the new system of own resources.

For the United Kingdom the effect of these provisions wil be that for any given level of the Community budget our gross contribution will be lower in the first instance than under the existing own resources system, because of the provisions for VAT capping and the new fourth resource; but we shall receive correspondingly less abatement in the following year. The overall effect on the United Kingdom will thus be neutral, except that there will be a timing advantage.

The Commission's draft of the own resources decision makes no provision for sub-ceilings on own resources: that is to say, intermediate own resources ceilings for the years between now and 1992 below the overall 1·2 per cent. of GNP ceiling. However, the Brussels European Council made explicit provision for such sub-ceilings and the Council has been considering how they should be incorporated within the own resources decision.

There are, in addition, certain other arguments over the text of the own resources decision which have still to be resolved in the Council. The largest of these is the so-called Italian problem. The Italians claim that the Commission's proposals for financing the United Kingdom abatement will result in too much of the budget being financed from the new fourth resource and too little from VAT own resources. Since the Italians' share of the Community's GNP is considerably larger than their share of the Community's VAT base, the Italians would be better off under a different system, which provided for more VAT and less GNP-shared financing.

We remain hopeful that these and other problems will be finally settled over the next two or three weeks. The Government have, however, made clear throughout that the United Kingdom will not finally and formally agree in the Council to the new own resources decision until there has been agreement to the other elements in the Brussels package, notably the decision on budget descipline.

The last two papers listed in the motion deal with the important subjects of budget discipline and management. On budget management, the Commission proposal in document 5282/88 for amendments to Community's financial regulations is concerned with giving legal force to changes for which the United Kingdom pressed hard in the future financing negotiations. The first is a provision whereby the traditional Community practice of carrying over unused budget appropriations from one year to the next should become the exception rather than the rule. The second is a provision limiting any negative reserves which may be entered into the budget to 200 mecu.

So far as budget discipline is concerned, the explanatory memorandum, which is the last document listed in the motion, summarises the proposal for a council decision on budget discipline for obligatory expenditure, and in particular for agricultural guarantee expenditure. As hon. Members will recall, the United Kingdom fought long and hard in the months before the Brussels European Council for improved discipline over agricultural spending. That is reflected in the draft decision.

As I explained to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee last week, there are five critical areas in which the controls on agricultural spending have been strengthened. First, the guideline limit for this spending will in future be enshrined in a legal instrument which will be binding on the Council.

Secondly, the notorious provision in the 1984 budget discipline conclusions for exceeding the guideline in "exceptional circumstances" has been scrapped. In its place we are to have a symmetrical monetary reserve arrangement to deal with the budgetary effects of substantial movements in the ecu/dollar exchange rate in either direction within a limit of 1 becu a year.

Thirdly, the Commission has undertaken to put forward price proposals which are consistent with the guideline limit; to insist on a joint meeting of Finance Ministers and Agriculture Ministers if the latter seem likely to take decisions which would involve exceeding the expenditure implied by the Commission's original proposals; and to manage the agricultural budget chapter by chapter—or, in other words, major commodity by major commodity—not globally as in the past. The Commission has undertaken to monitor expenditure and take remedial action if it threatens to exceed the budgetary provision, either by using its own management powers or by making proposals to the Council on which the Council will be committed to act within two months.

Fourthly, the instruments for controlling spending on individual commodities have been greatly strengthened by the introduction of automatic stabiliser mechanisms in all the main product regimes.

Finally, there are new arrangements for systematic depreciation of new agricultural stocks, with special provision earmarked for the cost of depreciating existing stocks.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend was not in his present position at the time of Fontainebleau, and cannot therefore take any credit for it, but having looked back at it and at what was said in the House after it, when a number of us were accused of being unhelpful and cynical for suggesting that Fontainebleau was not all that it had been cracked up to be, will he assure me that he and our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer are satisfied that we have got it right this time? By conceding an interest in the Community's resources, will we get the effective discipline that we emphatically did not get after Fontainebleau?

Mr. Brooke: I assure my hon. Friend that the narrative of the Fountainebleau debates is well known to me, and I am aware that several of my hon. Friends made such comments at the time. The position today is greatly improved, but my hon. Friend and I belong to a party that has always believed that this is an imperfect world, so I cannot promise him everything.

Mr. Curry: Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the important things that has happened since Fontainebleau in the changing budgetary arithmetic of the Community is that France is moving into the position of being a net contributor rather than a recipient and so has a greater vested interest in the control of expenditure? Equally, Spain stands to make no great gain out of agriculture and therefore has an interest in limiting agricultural spending to create resources for the funds from which she would benefit. Is that geographic change not as politically important as formal guarantees about agricultural expenditure in determining what happens?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comment, although some of it might have come in a speech at a later stage. On the first day of the international cricket season, I have no desire to bat all day and I shall seek now to bring my speech to an end.

For non-obligatory expenditure, there appears to be no scope for a legal instrument, based on treaty, comparable to that proposed for obligatory expenditure. The problem is that such an instrument would fetter powers which the treaty itself confers on the Parliament. The Brussels European Council agreed accordingly to seek an inter-institutional agreement with the Parliament over the development of non-obligatory expenditure during the next five years and, failing such agreement, to adopt on its own initiative internal rules for restraining the growth of such expenditure.

The Council's proposals, which were enshrined in the Brussels European Council conclusions, provide for specific additions each year to commitments for the structural funds, confirmation of existing multi-annual commitments for research and development and integrated Mediterranean programmes, and containment of commitment appropriations for the rest of non-obligatory expenditure within the statistical maximum rate of increase laid down in the treaty.

Although the provisions for budget discipline over non-obligatory expenditure cannot be enshrined in a legal instrument of the same kind as for obligatory expenditure, the political commitment to this element in budget discipline is every bit as binding as for agricultural expenditure. In addition, the sub-ceilings on own resources which I mentioned earlier, taken together with the guideline limit on agricultural guarantee expenditure, will indirectly provide an overall and binding limit on the scope for increases in non-obligatory expenditure.

I apologise if this speech has been a little protracted by interventions. Some hon. Members may feel that I have raced with indecent haste through a labyrinth of complex issues. If they do, I ask their forgiveness. The Government will continue their efforts to put the Community's finances on a sound basis, and we hope that hon. Members of all parties will support us in that.

7.47 pm

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I beg to move, to leave out from "discipline" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'views with concern the proposals of government to conclude an agreement to provide payments to the European Community prior to final adoption of instruments authorising own new resources and discipline; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to give notice to the Council of Ministers that its agreement to the draft budget and the proposals for own resources is dependent on rapid agreement on new financial disciplines, particularly those related to the Common Agricultural Policy, and on the formula for the United Kingdom rebate as agreed at the last European Council in Brussels, on adoption of a genuine and expeditious programme for a substantial reduction of Common Agricultural Policy spending, on a corresponding increase in other budget allocations, not only for the social regional funds, but also for the environment, and for assistance to developing countries, on recognition that a harmonisation of VAT rates is not necessary for achievement of a common internal market by 1992, on international governmental action for a recovery of employment, income and trade in the Community, including re-establishment of a major role for the Medium Term Economic Policy Committee, and on new accounting procedures to gain transparency on the market behaviour and abuse of dominant positions by bigger business in the Community.'

Some things bear repetition—music is a case in point—and I must repeat that the Government's record of failure in the matter of budget and own resources is deplorable by the standards that they have set themselves.

[Mr. Stuart Holland]

I am sure that we shall shortly benefit from a contribution by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) who, in the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee on 11 May, put the following question to the Paymaster General:

"We were told some years ago, were we not, when the original budgetary package on this came through, that the proportion spent on agriculture would fall?"

The Paymaster General replied:

"I think it is a matter of common knowledge between us that the arrangements which were secured in 1984 for the restraining of agricultural expenditure were not as effective as they should have been."

That, I suggest, is the understatement of the month.

In the same Select Committee—in passing, I congratulate it on the work that it has done—the right hon. Member for Worthing said:

"If we go, as the Michelin Guide would say, for a little history, the Government's position originally was that there would be effective budget discipline. This Committee at that time expressed extreme scepticism as to whether that would be effective. That indeed turned out to be the case: that it was not effective. We were then told by the Prime Minister that she would not go along with any further arrangements for increasing own resources until the whole thing was tied up in a legally binding way. I do not recollect her saying 'except for non-obligatory expenditure.'"

This is typical of the overruns that we have had time and again in the Community. It is clear that Fontainebleau has not stuck and that the fundamental problems have not been resolved. The overwhelming share of the overruns will still go to agriculture, although a sizeable share goes to the regional fund. The situation is clearly out of hand.

Mr. Curry: The general secretary of the Labour party was in Strasbourg earlier this week. Did the general secretary advise the members of the British Labour group to vote against the increase in non-obligatory expenditure in the budget?

Mr. Holland: That is a fascinating intervention. I have not spoken to the general secretary of the Labour party since he was in Strasbourg. There will be a vote in the House tonight. If the hon. Gentleman cares to pay attention, as I am sure he will, to what I am saying or to the terms of the amendment, he will see that the amendment is constructive. It proposes that the framework of expenditure in the Community could well be put to useful purposes. That is not happening at present because the common agricultural policy is simply out of control.

One of the reasons for that is precisely the whole strategy adopted by the Government towards the budget. It is common knowledge that in an exchange between the then Prime Minister of France and our Prime Minister at the last summit an untranslatable French word employed by the French Prime Minister provoked a response from our Prime Minister. I am perfectly aware of what the word means and the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) may also know what it means. I do not propose to translate it here.

Governments of the Left, Right or Centre in the European Community are sick and tired of this Government approaching the question of the budget only in terms of the rebate. The rebate is very important, as my hon. Friends will quite rightly stress, but the Government have failed to adopt a constructive attitude towards what the Community might well do in common in a range of areas where the budget is allocating funds between and within member states.

It is quite clear that we need a square deal from the Common Market. All hon. Members agree on that. We also need a new deal from the European Community. We need a new deal for Europe that will enable us to address matters of urgent and pressing importance affecting our joint economies. We need to be able to address the role that Europe plays in the OECD and the kind of economic difficulties into which the world economy is moving with, for example, the potential slowing down of the United States economy. We should be able to address the question of target exchange rates and the attitude of the Government and other Governments towards the European monetary system. These matters very much affect the feasible kinds of expenditure that can be undertaken by member states and not simply by the budget itself.

Our amendment stresses that there should be a substantial reduction in spending on the common agricultural policy and not just a slowing in the rate of increase of CAP spending. There should be a corresponding increase not only in the social and regional funds, but in spending on the environment and on assistance to developing countries.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: The hon. Gentleman said that there will be a slowing down of the rate of increase in agricultural spending. Can he find anywhere in the mountain of documents with which we have been supplied any evidence that there will be a slowing down in the rate of that increase?

Mr. Holland: No; and one of the points that I shall deal with in summing up is that the stabilisers appear to be not declining but inclining and that we are not actually getting the reduction that we should be getting.

The budget, the "take note" motion before the House and the documents to which it refers cover the social and regional funds, the environment and, as it happens, assistance to developing countries. These are all brought within the terms of reference of the Commission's consultative document 4051/87 which is referred to on the Order Paper and in the Commission's document as "financial engineering." I have not had a chance to consult whoever is responsible for translating this document either in the Commission or in the Foreign Office. Financial engineering is not at all what the document is about. That suggests to me that whoever found the French term for financial mechanisms translated it into the English equivalent of mechanique, which is engineering. This document is not about engineering in any way; it is about financial mechanisms.

When the Paymaster General gets to his feet and says, "We have considered this document and looked in depth at all the proposals that it makes on a range of issues," I have to ask the House whether that can possibly be the case when the very title of the document makes no sense whatever. Financial engineering there may be in the European Community or in the common agricultural policy, but that is clearly not the intent of the document. Moreover, the document contains many useful proposals on the renewal and strengthening of industry and the industrial base in the Community and on the very imaginative possibility of joint ventures with, for example, developing countries.

The Paymaster General says that there is no evidence of a gap. The Treasury memorandum says:

"The Commission assumes, but does not demonstrate, that there are gaps in the financing of viable projects left by the private market."

This is yet another area, as on the budget rebate, that preoccupied the whole summit agenda and on which the Government are totally out of step with every other Government in the Community. All those Governments have medium to long-term credit institutions and regional development agencies focused especially on the promotion of small and medium enterprises, precisely because they recognise, as did the Macmillan report in the 1930s in this country, that there is a financing gap for small and medium firms because they face problems in raising funds on equal terms with larger businesses. Larger firms have a larger volume of borrowing, so they gain lower interest rates.

Therefore, intervening in the market to give, for example, an interest rate advantage in regional or structural funds to small and medium firms is not a distortion of the market but an equalisation of competition in the market. However, I do not expect the Paymaster General to be following that argument in this paper with much attention because he has not even managed to realise that the title of the paper is mistranslated.

I would not expect the Paymaster General, given his opening speech in the debate, to realise that if the Government do not support these new proposals for financial mechanisms in the Community, they may find themselves out of line with Council decision 87/307 and amending Council decision 83/624 87, known in less numerate terms as the SPRINT programme. If we look at annex III to the SPRINT programme, in the document to which I have referred, we see that we had agreement by the Council for priority action on "Organisation of pilot activities, transnational in aim or in nature, relating to the training of technology transfer specialists on the management and financing of innovation and related fields".

There is even

"Establishment of liaison mechanisms between local authorities"—

I stress that to my hon. Friends—

"as agents in the innovation process, as regards both the possibility of fostering innovation through co-operation on procurement and their role, or that of equivalent bodies responsible for innovation".

This, again, is an example of the Government's bias against mixed economy intervention at local authority level. It is to the credit of the Commission, in bringing forward proposals such as it has brought forward in the document that is mistitled "financial engineering", that it realises that there is a need for joint action and joint policies between Governments to strengthen and equalise the competitive opportunities for small and medium firms. That has a major relation to the feasibility of effective regional development, which itself concerns the spending of regional funds.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): I am listening to the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) with great interest and a certain amount of encouragement. The hon. Gentleman talks about the need for more common action, but is what he says compatible with the passage in the amendment that he is moving, which seems to regard any movement towards harmonisation of VAT as "not necessary for the achievement of a common internal market"?

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will cover that point, as I should like to hear his views on it.

Mr. Holland: As the Paymaster General might say, I am indeed coming to that point. I am sure that the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) would not wish me to break the logic of my exposition.

On the social fund, I should like to raise a matter that was brought to the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Mr. Richardson), by the Glamorgan women's workshop for high technology. [Interruption.] The project is jointly funded by South Glamorgan county council, the European social fund and Cardiff city council. Before Conservative Members show further that they regard this as a derisory matter not worthy of discussion in the House, they might pay attention.

The arguments made on behalf of the workshop are:

"It is clear from studies Europe-wide that women are still vastly under-represented in certain traditionally male occupations."

They continue:

"We are particularly disturbed that the guideline under which most women's training projects are funded has been amended from a general priority for training women—in areas where they are under-represented—to a priority in the first year of operation only."

They point out:

"This will exclude all training projects in the women's training network which have already been in operation for over one year."

We share the view:

"It is crucial that the European social fund confirms its commitment to women's training by retaining the specific guidelines relating to women. There is no adequate provision for women under the other guidelines, and for a small operation like us, the restriction of priority status to projects concerning over 1,000 people certainly excludes all women's training projects."

I see that the Paymaster General is expressing interest in the matter. Part of the nature of the Community in its decision-making is that we cannot expect an assurance tonight from the Dispatch Box, but we take the matter seriously. It is another way in which lipservice is paid to the rhetoric of promoting small and medium enterprises in the Community when, as Conservative Members well know, any enterprise employing more than 1,000 people is no longer a small enterprise, but a larger medium-sized firm.

The hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West asked about harmonisation of VAT rates, and our call that agreement should depend on "recognition that a harmonisation of VAT rates is not necessary for achievement of a common internal market by 1992".

The hon. Gentleman may not have been present when last I raised the matter from the Dispatch Box in relation to the internal market in the United States.

This is not a new area of interest for me. I shall not detain the House with a personal history, but I spent some time in 1970 at the Brookings Institution in Washington, looking precisely into the extent to which features of the common internal market of the United States depended upon integration and harmonisation of tax rates and other provisions, rather than the sheer size of the market, and the chance to achieve economies of scale within that market. Frankly, having studied the matter then and having looked at differences between corporate tax rates and local and state taxes in the United States, I could not find any commentator in the United States who thought that harmonisation of state and local taxation, or even harmonisation of corporation tax, was essential for economies of scale inside the United States. I suggest that the Commission and many of those who service it and those in the think tanks have got it wrong.

There is no more a need for us to have completely aligned VAT rates than to have completely aligned social security or Health Service provisions. One of the problems of the Community is its failure to address priority issues such as joint action to ensure a regaining of the industrial competitiveness of firms in Europe. Joint action could counter a continuing risk—despite what is reported by OECD—of a world economic recession, ending in a slump. We should tackle structural and technological unemployment. Instead, we have harmonisation of rear-view mirrors, rubber products, passport covers and number plates. Those have as great a role in stimulating economic growth as the harmonisation of VAT rates. They are all of secondary importance. They verge on the trivial. This is the problem with the Community's agenda.

The sort of agenda that we are asked to address in the debate tonight, in the achievement of an effective Commmunity budget, does not depend on harmonisation. The imperative of the European Comunity today is not to integrate but to co-operate. It is failing even to agree to co-operate on measures for integration of VAT. However, I do not particularly want to hammer the Government on this matter, because they have said already that they have reservations about it. Perhaps we could have a cross-Bench alliance on this matter, as well as reconsideration of the Commission's proposals on financial mechanism, rather than engineering. That could have beneficial effects locally and regionally.

Moreover, in answer to the hon. Gentleman's point, fiscal differentiation might be beneficial rather than a disadvantage or an obstacle to integration. Unequal integration has been admitted right from the report by the founding fathers of the European Community at the Messina conference. It was admitted then, unlike the terms of the treaty of Rome, that free working of the free market mechanism aggravated structural, social and regional disparities within the member states, which needed to be offset by the regional and social funds that we are debating tonight. Fiscal policy has a positive role to play, if that is the case, as it could equalise terms of competition.

There are certainly some cross-border problems. The hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West referred to this with regard to VAT harmonisation. In the case of Luxembourg and neighbouring states, differing VAT rates may promote cross-border shopping trips. But on the major issue, whether we must have VAT on food, clothing, children's clothes, books and publications and reading material in this country, which is the greater priority—the problem in some border areas of shopping sprees, or a taxation measure that would penalise everybody who eats, every child, and everybody who reads? We ought to get the priorities right.

We have drawn attention to the fact that cross-border exchanges between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland have been promoted because there are different tax regimes for goods. In another context, no doubt we would all welcome that. But if we are all to be good Europeans, perhaps we should have differing VAT rates for promoting co-operation.

I am keeping an eye on the clock, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the sake of Conservative Members and my hon. Friends who wish to speak in the debate.

On the further matter referred to in our amendment, we believe that the real priority agenda should be joint international economic action. That concerns less all Community Europe expenditure passing through the eye of the needle in Brussels, and more the Commission, the Community and Parliament playing a bigger role in sponsoring encounters between those who want change in the industrial structure of Europe and joint economic programmes for recovery to take the strain off the dollar and stabilise world currencies, and more give some reality to the negotiating triad of the Japanese, Americans and European Finance Ministers, which lies behind the Group of Seven, or any other major group, in terms of summit economic policy.

In that context, we have chosen to refer to the role of the medium term economic policy committee, with which at least Treasury officials should be familiar in its renamed form, the economic policy committee. It is not surprising that the words "medium term" have been dropped. I mean no discredit to those who serve on it, but increasingly this committee, which used to have a powerful role and was a useful forum for intergovernmental co-operation within the Community, has been reduced to the role of a forecasting unit. It is no more effective than an inner OECD working party.

When the committee was set up by Marjolin in 1964 and produced its first report in 1966, it was a major forum enabling member Governments to address at Community level what, in their view, was their important agenda, rather than simply react to Commission proposals and act within the terms of reference of the treaty of Rome, which is now 30 years out of date. Member Governments were able to set their own agenda on comparisons of the consistency of their macroeconomic policies and structural, social and regional policies. It is important that the committee should play such a role and important that its actions are reported to the House.

Our amendment states that there should be

"new accounting procedures to gain transparency on the market behaviour and abuse of dominant positions by bigger business in the Community."

This relates to what much of Community budget spending is about. There is much rhetoric and many measures concerning the budget and structural funds and about promoting a dynamic of small and medium-sized firms. The reality—I gave some illustrative figures earlier—is that bigger businesses dominate an increasing share of the Community's markets. Between 1963 and 1982, which was the last year for which figures were available, the top 100 firms increased their share of the Community's GDP from over one fifth to nearly two fifths. The top 10 non-agricultural firms in the EEC have as big a share of the Community's GDP as does the whole of the agriculture that is supported by the common agricultural policy.

Behind this lies a sorry tale of the Community's failure to develop, on a joint governmental basis, effective mechanisms for industrial intervention and industrial policy. We shall not get it as long as we do not know what is going on. Articles 85 and 86 are full of claims for transparency and alleged concern about abuse of dominant position. While we are talking of the Single European Act and a larger and larger market, the debates in the House on spending and budgetary policy should include reference to the obligation on the Commission to ensure that an effective accounting is undertaken of these larger businesses. I believe that research programmes should be supported on that basis. If they want any help, I am perfectly willing to give it.

There is an imbalance between the peripheral agenda and the central issues affecting Community Europe. This budget debate is stuck in the mud of the common agricultural policy. Agriculture is the last sector in Europe that one should seek to integrate because of its phenomenal efficiency differences—15:1 between Denmark and Portugal in terms of milk products. It is impossible to integrate and have a common price system for such a sector without reinforcing those who are already rich in multinational agribusiness while still giving no more than a marginal income to peasant farmers.

When we look at the quality of services—housing, health, education, and so on—the Government and the Treasury have one policy: "If at first you don't succeed, cut, cut and cut again." When it comes to the common agricultural policy, it is: "If at first you don't succeed, pay, pay and pay again," without effective accountability and benefits to consumers and with vast profits to agri-business firms and stabilisers which appear to be on the incline rather than the decline.

With due respect for the fact that the Paymaster General gave way several times, and therefore perhaps lost track of the argument, his was a sorry speech, covering a sorry deal. It is time that the House gained redress.

8.15 pm

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): I gladly join my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General in the tribute that he paid to the Scrutiny Committee, which has done an extremely good job. When one considers the fact that the papers that we are debating form a stack 5 or 6 in thick of closely typed foolscap, the motion that the House should "take note" of those documents has a certain irony. The Scrutiny Committee's work is of considerable help in enabling the House to give some sense of priorities to assessing these various documents.

My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General was kind enough to express appreciation to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, which I have the honour to chair. In return, I am bound to say that the help that he and his officials have given our Committee has been of considerable value. As often happens with our reports, the evidence is more important than the report. I hope that we have managed to set out some of the dilemmas that confront the House.

It is difficult for the House to debate these matters in the present form. In a sense, we would be much better off with a Committee stage procedure, when there could be more orderly interventions—I say that despite the generosity of my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General in giving way—and hon. Members could speak more than once. It is difficult in this form of debate to come to grips with some of these difficult and complicated issues.

The fact that we have a debate ahead of the Foreign Ministers' meeting enables the House to express a firm opinion on some points. As has been pointed out, the House will not come to a decision—in whatever format is decided upon—until later. This is not exactly a preliminary, but it is an interim, run round the course.

Mr. Spearing: The Scrutiny Committee is one of the best staffed Select Committees. The right hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that the House should be able to consider more legislation to approve decisions on the new financial structure. Does he agree that this is our last opportunity to discuss approval of next year's budget?

Mr. Higgins: I hope to turn to that point. That may turn out to be true. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will clarify the precise position. To say the least, it is obscure. If one were less charitable, one might say that it is chaotic. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister returned to the House on 15 February and made a statement about her meeting in Brussels between 11 and 13 February. The impression was created that, although big changes were envisaged in terms of increasing own resources by 25 per cent. and strengthening budgetary discipline and so on, somehow this was a matter that could be decided and we would then move forward to 1992. I certainly welcome progress in that direction.

In the course of our analysis of what has been devoloping, we discovered that, far from the matter being cut and dried, there are serious procedural problems and timing difficulties. There are proposals for paying more money to the Community in the form of an intergovernmental agreement and an increase in own resources. We are setting those proposals against guarantees on budgetary discipline on the one hand and effective implementation of the United Kingdom's rebate on the other.

It is important to get the sequence of events right, lest we agree to paying more money to the Community without obtaining those things that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister believes that she has negotiated. We need only consider the experience of the Fontainebleau agreement which, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister now recognises, has broken down as an effective form of budgetary restraint, to realise the considerable dangers.

I wish to deal with a point raised by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General about our obligation to meet overdraft demands from the Community. He referred to that as a cash flow problem, but I am doubtful whether it is a cash flow problem. It is euphemistic to describe as a cash flow problem a situation in which, unless one receives additional money from another source, one finds oneself bankrupt. As I understand it, if we do not agree to an intergovernmental agreement and to an increase in own resources, it is not a cash flow problem, but a situation in which we simply run out of money.

I wish to deal now with the question whether we are obliged to go along with the overdraft agreement. My right hon. Friend, in an interesting passage in his speech, appeared to imply that we were obliged to do so if the overdraft requested did not exceed the amount that we were obliged to provide sooner or later under the existing own resources agreement. I hope that we shall not go beyond that, and I see no reason why we should. That would put us in danger of finding that our bargaining position had disappeared and that we had not secured what we wanted to secure.

I do not wish to deal here with the question of the composite or own resources bill. We shall have to consider that matter carefully, depending on how it develops, but the question of the budget, which was apparently agreed yesterday, is important in this context. It shows clearly how the Community is continuing to increase its expenditure all the time. My right hon. Friend said that Parliament had gone along with that, although Lord Plumb had not yet finalised matters. As I understand it, the President of the Council said that he was prepared to go along with the increase in the figure originally thought to be appropriate, although I am not sure by what authority he did that.

Perhaps my right hon. Friend would clarify the position. The crucial question is whether to go along with a proposal for an intergovernmental agreement after the budget has been approved. My right hon. Friend said, in evidence to the Select Committee, that we would not do so until everything that we wanted had been agreed. I hope that he will make it clear that that is the position.

I turn now to the difficult question of rebate. On 15 February, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave the impression that our rebate was completely protected, but there is now the so-called Italian question. I am not clear on what basis the objections are being raised, as they clearly appear to contravene what was thought to be agreed at the summit. We have experienced this problem before. We go along with these ideas in broad outline, but, when settling the details, we find that the matter is not as cut and dried as we thought it to be.

My right hon. Friend did not mention the change in principle from a VAT-based own resources to a GNP-based own resources. The Select Committee commented on that and my right hon. Friend gave evidence on that point in Committee. The Committee has had occasion, in its recent report, to point out that the United Kingdom's calculation of GNP is extremely difficult because one can calculate it in various ways—for example, by the expenditure method or the income method —and obtain different answers. It is worrying if, in the light of that, the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not have a good basis upon which to react in terms of economic policy.

However, something different is involved in this change. We are relying on the GNP calculations to decide how much money we pay over in terms of taxpayers' hard cash. If our GNP figures are as suspect as they now appear to be, I wonder what the GNP figures are like in other countries. We should not go along with the proposal until we are satisfied with the statistical basis for the calculation.

I wish to say a few words about budgetary discipline. It has been suggested that the move towards stabilisers in relation to the common agricultural policy is a great advance. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in her statement on 15 February, said that the stabilisers on agricultural products would be very important and that, if the output were too great, there would be a price cut of 3 per cent. a year on the whole crop. It is important that that should relate to the crop as a whole, but, nevertheless, the cuts are cumulative and, if harvests continue to exceed the threshold, there will be a huge 12 per cent. price cut by the fourth year. The idea that that will have a dramatic effect in reducing surpluses, even over the four-year period, is absurd, but I view with scepticism the idea that it will have an immediate effect when the surpluses continue to increase.

Similarly, we have been told that agricultural expenditure will not continue to increase as quickly as it has been doing and will increase only at three quarters of the rate of the Community's GNP. I have yet to be convinced that there is any case for increase of expenditure on agriculture when we have those surpluses. The idea that budgetary discipline is effective in that respect is therefore very doubtful.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, apart from those nonsensical percentage estimates, a considerable amount of expenditure has been added on to budgets for 1989 and the future, instead of being included in the 1988 budget? In addition, some expenditure previously carried by the Community in 1987 is being carried this year by member states.

Mr. Higgins: Those two points reflect the loopholes through which increasing amounts of money are pouring into the sector. However, I do not understand why the agricultural community alone should be protected against fluctuations in the exchange rate. No other industry is put in that extraordinary position. We have not tackled that problem and it severely weakens budgetary discipline.

In the light of experience after Fontainebleau, the Prime Minister told the House, "It didn't work, but we shall have it made legally binding in future. Don't worry —the arrangements that we make on budgetary discipline will be legally enforceable." However, we now discover that that applies only to certain aspects of the budget; it will not be legally enforceable overall. It will apply to obligatory expenditure but not to non-obligatory expenditure.

In that context, we shall have an "inter-institutional agreement". As I understand it, that will not in any sense be legally binding. Therefore, the idea that we shall have overall legally binding budgetary discipline is not the case. Yet that was certainly the impression created in the House at the time of my right hon. Friend's previous statements. It remains doubtful whether the measures which will be legally binding will in reality impose the kind of restraint on Community spending that we would normally mean when we say that there is effective control of public expenditure.

I well understand the difficulties which my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and his ministerial colleagues are having, but it seems absolutely crucial that we should not go along with an IGA or with proposals for an increase in own resources by whatever parliamentary mechanism may be agreed, until such time as the rebate is effectively imposed and guaranteed and we have an effective degree of budgetary discipline. I regret to say that that has not been achieved.

I hope that I can encourage my right hon. Friend and his colleagues to do everything possible to achieve effective financial management in the Community, which so far has most certainly been lacking. Unless we do that, those of us who wish to see further progress, as I certainly do, in the run-up to 1992 and all that that implies will be seriously compromised.

Mr. Curry: Before my right hon. Friend sits down——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I think that the right hon. Gentleman has sat down.

Mr. Leighton: I think that the right hon. Gentleman was just hesitating. He has made an absolutely unanswerable case and we are indebted to him and his Committee for the way in which they have monitored this matter over the years. What moral does he draw from this? There is no financial discipline on the CAP and there will not be. The whole question of reform is nonsensical. The CAP will never be satisfactorily reformed. Can the right hon. Gentleman see any advantage to the United Kingdom in having a CAP? Is not the moral that we should extricate ourselves——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was seeking to make an intervention. I call Mr. Higgins.

Mr. Higgins: Having argued for a more Committee-stage approach to these problems, it would be churlish of me to insist that I had sat down.

The reality is that we are making considerable progress towards some control over the problem. Many political pressures are impinging on this. The argument that we shall get more discipline from countries which are net contributors turned out to be a delusion, and that argument was put strongly at one time. We must work hard to get the structure right, and we must all press for that. In terms of practical politics, we cannot say that this is the end of the matter and we shall withdraw. We must work as hard as we can and encourage my right hon. and hon. Friends to do all that they can to bring some sanity into the proceedings.

8.33 pm

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) referred to a mistranslation from the French of the phrase rendered in English as "financial engineering". No doubt that was unwittingly mistranslated. For someone like me who does not have experience of these matters to the extent of some hon. Friends and hon. Gentlemen, it seems, although ironic, a fitting mistranslation. That phrase conjures up phrases such as "creative accounting" and "economic truths". In retrospect, the phrase "economic truths" seems to be a fitting description of some of the budget proposals and discussions that have taken place in the EEC during the past few years. Perhaps that is what gave rise to the motion that was tabled by the Socialist Group last night questioning the legality of the EEC budget.

As I have less experience of these matters than have many hon. Members, I read through the debate of 2 March on the European Court of Auditors and noted, among other things, the excellent contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall. He made some crucial points which merited being aired at a more civilised time. To make a speech at 1.30 am when the press has gone to bed and the Chamber is virtually empty does not reflect the importance of these matters.

The Paymaster General also expressed some anxieties about the budget, and they should be aired again. Three points have not been clarified tonight: the imbalance between expense and revenue, the excess growth of agriculture expenditure, and the burden of past budget management—what would almost be called fraud in other quarters.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to what he called "cash flow problems". It is not a cash-flow problem, but a cash problem. There continues to be an imbalance between expenditure and revenue, and this is what lies at the heart of the Community's financial mess. The imbalance has two main causes: first, the failure of budgetary discipline to control excessive expenditure, especially agriculture expenditure; and, secondly, revenue ceilings which the Court believed were artificial and took insufficient account of the Community's financing needs. The Court of Auditors unfortunately felt that that would continue, particularly in view of the mountains of surplus produce waiting to be disposed of or depreciate.

On the previous occasion the Paymaster General told us that we had the machinery for change—in the context of the Community, that must at least be speculation—and that if it worked we should see a legally binding guideline on agricultural expenditure, which should grow more slowly than the Community's GNP. The Government's message, couched in more equivocal language tonight, is that the days of automatic, unlimited price support are over. I hope that that does not prove to be Government rhetoric, but on the evidence of the past few years our suspicions must be aroused that yet again that will be more rhetorical than substantial.

We have waited long enough for a serious move towards the limitation of CAP expenditure to a progressively smaller share of the budget, reaching, I hope, 50 per cent. by 1992, as opposed to the present staggering figure of 70 per cent. Surely we and the Government must consider our priorities in approaching the whole matter. The provision of increased resources for the structural and social funds are politically and socially essential for the real success of any common internal market.

We are told by the Department of Trade and Industry —or the "Department of Advertising" as it is rapidly becoming known—that 1992 will provide a historic opportunity for British business. If that opportunity merely puts money in the hands of the likes of Amstrad's Alan Suger, instead of breathing life into a crippled economy, it may satisfy the Government and a few of their City friends, but it will not satisfy Labour Members or British industry generally.

The social fund should be increased substantially if we are to pay more than lip service to the problems of the inner cities. I represent a steel-making constituency. Having learnt, over the last two days, that Ravenscraig, one of the most highly productive steel plants in the world, let alone Europe, is in danger of closure, the Community's preoccupation with agricultural spending becomes a sick joke to my constituents. Those priorities should be ordered not only to support our industry, but to help Portugal and Greece, where political and social measures are vital to the cohesion of the Community.

We have heard much about the Government's commitment to reductions in agricultural spending, and we witnessed an entertaining sabre-rattling performance from the Prime Minister in the European skirmishes. However, the March memorandum from the Select

[Dr. John Reid]

Committee on Treasury and Civil Service reveals that the 27·5 becu of agricultural guarantee expenditure now proposed for the 1988 budget represents no less than a 19·6 per cent. increase compared with the 23 becu provision in the 1987 Community budget.

The 1988 budget will, in addition, include 1·24 becu towards the cost of depreciation and disposal of existing excess stocks. If that additional amount is taken into consideration, the real percentage increase in agricultural spending from 1987 to 1988 rises to 25 per cent. on a budget which the Government constantly tell us should be, and will be, reduced.

In respect of that, the Paymaster General gave us resolute guarantees that the timetable, the cash flow and even the legality are uncertain. Tonight, in line with Churchill's famous phrase, he was "resolute in his equivocation." The efforts to gain control and reduce agricultural spending, and to maintain the system of budgetary control agreed at Fontainebleau, have been a dismal failure and all hon. Members are aware of that.

It is vital that the House and the Government realise the full extent of the failures. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall explained the anomalies and lack of logic in the present position on 2 March. When the treaty of Rome was signed in 1957, one in four of the working population in the Community were employed in agriculture. That is no longer the case; in fact, far from it. The total working population in agriculture of the original six members of the Community is now down to about 5 per cent. For the Community of Ten—before the accession of the Mediterranean countries—that is down to about 7 or 7·5 per cent. It is now feasible to apply a deficiency payments system to the Community. We believe that that relates to the kind of analysis that the European Court of Auditors has made of the social and regional funds.

In the recent debates on this issue, we have heard guarantees from the Prime Minister and the Government that there would be a standstill on, or reduction of, the agricultural budget in due course. I do not agree with much that the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) says in the Chamber, but I agreed with his use of the word "cynicism". Perhaps we should have regarded the statements with a little more cynicism. Since the statements were made, the binding controls that were promised have proved not to be binding and the budget is not under control. Spending has rocketed well beyond the ceiling of 1·4 per cent. In fact, it has gone far beyond the 1·6 per cent. which was never agreed to be binding on anyone.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall said that, instead of adopting a supranational approach to these issues, it would be better if the Community and its member states sometimes tried an international approach. If we cannot achieve co-operation we cannot force integration, and we cannot force integration even on the minor issues —the flood of transcendental minutiae—which have obsessed the Community and in which it appears we are now in great danger of drowning.

If we cannot deal with the minor issues highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall, we cannot integrate on major issues unless we co-operate. It would be a tragedy, even for those hon. Members who are greater supporters of the Community than I am, if the vision of the founding fathers of the Community—eventual integration —were to become, not a spur, but an obstacle to further co-operation within the European Community.

I regret that the Paymaster General's statement tonight did not enlighten us on any of the problems that have been raised or promise any greater effectiveness from the Government. His statement was bad for the House. In the long run it will be bad for Britain and, I fear, for the rest of the European Community.

8.45 pm

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): These debates are usually depressingly familiar affairs. However, I am bound to say that so far this debate has taken a somewhat different pattern. We have heard two speeches from Opposition Members which started out being very interesting and appeared to face the real issues, but shied away from the fundamentals at the last minute. Neither the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) nor the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) would accept that the further co-operation that they called for in those areas where the Community should be operating, where it should be stimulating new industry and creating new jobs, requires a very much more substantial degree of integration than either were prepared to admit.

The Labour party amendment reminds me of the News of the World calling for a moral revival. It clearly does not square with itself or the proclaimed attitude of the Labour party.

I had intended to say some severe things about the Government and my right hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench. However, I find it almost impossible, because my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, with his transparent honesty and good will and the tremendous reputation that he has built up in Europe for his knowledge of the subject, is sitting on the Front Bench. He is ready to consider these questions very carefully.

However, I believe that Ministers are not facing the situation as it is and, above all, they are not obliging the House to face the situation as it is. There is general support, which was well articulated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), for the need to contain the Community's ever-growing expenditure, particularly in the areas where further expenditure will lead only to ever greater surpluses.

There is widespread agreement on both sides of the House that something must be done about that problem. However, the agreement falls short—and I believe that the Government are guilty of allowing it to fall short—in the contemplation of the action that will be necessary to check that growth. It is not enough for the British Government to say, "This is what ought to be done. We all ought to adopt the same kind of rigorous system of financial control as is common practice in the House." At least, we like to think that it is common practice and we flatter ourselves to a large extent about that. It is not enough for the Government to say that other nations must pull their socks up, obey the rules and behave as if they were British. In a 12-nation Community, that simply does not happen.

When we debated the Single European Act, a Minister told us that the proposal for the Act was not only unnecessary, superfluous and bureaucratic, but would threaten our liberties. Would it be possible even to contemplate moving towards a single market—the aim for 1992—without the Single European Act which introduced the notion of majority voting at any rate in those areas where vital national interests were not at stake? That Act was fought tooth and nail, denigrated and had scorn poured on it.

Lord Cockfield was sent to Brussels to achieve an objective. Ever since he has been there, Ministers have constantly decried his efforts and attempted to undermine him. Yet without the single-minded impulsion—the bloody-mindedness—that Lord Cockfield brought to the process, we would not be on the road down which we are substantially travelling today.

The same thing is liable to happen with fiscal approximation. We hear Ministers declaring from the Front Bench that it is unnecessary to move in any direction down the road of fiscal approximation. I take the point made by the hon. Member for Vauxhall, that the American market works well with substantial differences in levels of excise duty and sales tax in different states. But that is a single market, using a single language, with a single Administration. It is one country. It can afford to have different levels of sales tax. Indeed, there are different levels of sales tax in different towns within France. Nobody will call for total fiscal identity throughout the Community. None the less, there must be inexorable progress in the direction of diminishing the substantial discrepancies in border taxes.

Mr. Holland: That is a non sequitur. The large companies, whose activities are so untransparent, already dominate all our markets. It is like the researcher who, before the first application to join the Common Market, asked Pilkington what the effect would be, to which the reply was, "In float glass, we are the Common Market." The hon. Gentleman really cannot see the wood for the trees.

Sir Anthony Meyer: The hon. Gentleman is making my point for me. The supranational companies are not inhibited in their activities by different levels of taxation, but that is preventing smaller firms from growing into major European firms which can transcend frontiers. That is where I take issue with the hon. Gentleman.

The Government are clearly resolute in their determination to get to 1992 to eliminate the tariffs, and at the same time to achieve a Community in which there is reasonable control over soaring levels of expenditure, but we shall not get there until they confront the country and the House with the painful choices that will be involved.

The requirements imposed on the Government and on the House in order to achieve those objectives must transcend the pledges given in the heat of the moment in the course of an election campaign because somebody accuses the Government of wanting to bring in VAT on children's shoes, and so on. Bigger obligations than those are involved here. If we really want to achieve the advantages of a full Common Market, which is not an extravagantly bloated bureaucratic affair, we must give overriding priority to our international requirements and a much lower priority to domestic political ones.

8.52 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Our proceedings are made difficult, as hon. Members have said, by the need to debate such matters on the Floor of the House. With documents 4 or 5 in thick, we cannot be expected to make detailed comments on what is happening. In many ways it is a pity that we cannot deal with this in Committee, as has been suggested.

However, even if such a change were to be made for budgetary proposals of this sort, there can be precious little United Kingdom parliamentary control of the budget. The dual system in the EC—the Council of Ministers and the European Parliament, particularly the Council of Ministers—means that there will always be an element of negotiation after anything that the House has said and done. We cannot instruct Ministers in any detail on what is to be done, because there will have to be negotiation. We cannot give the final negotiating position to the Minister, because that would give the game away. We cannot give the upfront starting position to the Minister, because then he has no position from which to negotiate.

Mr. Spearing: There is always contiuous negotiation, and we would not expect the Government to reveal their hand, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that the House is perfectly capable of telling the Minister the point beyond which he should not go or the point at which he should start? Is he aware that the Danish Folketing does that every week within the terms of the treaty of Rome, so why should not we?

Mr. Taylor: Any negotiators who begin by announcing their starting and finishing positions will not get far. However, this is a relatively small point and I make it only by way of comment on what has been said earlier.

There are serious anxieties about the Government's ability, with the European partners, to keep control of the CAP, and, indeed, the European budget as a whole. We can see that they have not brought those under full control. Whether our Parliament sets down rules on that will not make any substantial difference. However, the problem with debates such as this and the way in which the EC currently goes about matters, is that we become obsessed with overall figures, the techniques for controlling them and the techniques for dealing with what are clearly, in many areas within the EC, spending controls that simply have not worked. We have forgotten how the matter relates much more directly to the individuals in each country—the little people—who bear the brunt of many of the decisions that we are taking. We are looking at overall macroeconomic figures, but those people suffer the microeconomic impact when it comes.

That, more than anything, is true of the CAP. Typically, the Labour party takes a particular interest in the overall cost of the CAP. I take a particular interest in its effect on the smaller farming units, particularly the effect of the controls on the CAP on smaller farmers such as those in my part of the country.

The problem with the way in which we deal with such matters at the moment, and the problem with the overall budgetary details in these documents, is that, when we talk about controlling the CAP, because everyone cannot get together to agree a sensible policy to take account of the individuals who are affected by it, we impose it overall, and that has a disastrous impact on those who are most in need of help from the EC.

When we debate budgets and policies, we sometimes forget what the CAP should be about, which is helping those who need help. We should endeavour to ensure that we are not causing greater problems. The House, Ministers and the EC have not successfully tackled that problem.

If we look, in particular, at the way in which the system works, the real problem is that we only consider the macroeconomics and the levels at which budgets should be set, not how they will work in detail. On the CAP, we have no policy to allow maximum control for the smaller communities within the EC to generate policies that are relevant to them. What we do is too much on a macro scale.

Similarly, on fishing, decisions are taken to control the overall budget and we then attempt to implement them in a bureaucratic way, which is about saving money, not about relating policies sufficiently to the particular communities concerned. We feel the impact of that at a local level. Fishermen have no local control over quotas, and MAFF botches it time after time. We talk about the macroeconomic control of the EC's budget but we end up neither controlling that budget nor assisting the very people we are meant to be helping by the spending of that money.

The Labour party's amendment has properly highlighted the fact that, while concentrating on solving the problems of the CAP, we are not putting sufficient effort into the social fund. The Government are under a particular obligation to do so, but they fail to consider how the fund relates to people. They are interested in the cost of the EC—as they should be—but they ignore the benefits we could obtain from the Community by taking advantage of its ability to devise a social and economic policy which will respond to problems in certain parts of this country and to certain parts of the Community as a whole.

The current situation is one almost of farce, in which the Government have said in response to the EC's offer of money to dual the A30 through Cornwall that they will take the money but cut their own budget so that there is no increase in total spending on dualling that road. They appear to have completely lost sight of the potential offered by the Community and of the reasons for our membership of it. The ways in which it can help local communities are being overlooked. Instead, we appear to be focusing only on a general budget document and on making economies. Although the Labour party is right in its analysis, we would like to see the Government do far more.

On the other hand, the Labour party offers the prospect of a new corporatism. Instead of tea and biscuits at No. 10, the idea is to have sandwiches at Strasbourg. There is the notion of "intergovernmental action" rather than integration. That will solve nothing. While ensuring that the European Community generates funds and encourages integration and the breaking down of barriers so that people can take advantage of the opportunities which Europe offers, we must also make sure that that process is not run from the centre by means of a giant corporate strategy perceived in Europe. We must devise a structure that will allow for local control. If we can grasp the opportunity for Community action in that way, we shall gain some advantage from it.

We are having this debate almost as though hardly anyone is affected by the matters being discussed. The small number of hon. Members present in the Chamber shows how few Members of Parliament believe that the Community relates to their contituencies or believe in its ability to tackle local problems. That is a failing of the Community and of the Government.

Integration of the kind I have mentioned need not be inflexible. It need not be on a macro scale or follow the "biggest is best" principle—that the same must apply to all. That is particularly so in respect of VAT rates. I was pleased to hear the Government say that they are not seeking a universal VAT rate. There is no evidence that such is needed. Certainly the American experience does not suggest otherwise. It may be that wildly differing rates in different countries could cause problems, but we are concerned with the ability of our country to react to the problems of the individual and to devise social policies to meet those problems.

We have social policies which meet the problems of children or pensioners, and which ensure that people are equally able to buy books and newspapers. Those policies do not need to change because of our membership of the Community and the wish to break down tariff barriers. It is crucial that we recognise that truth, and that the Minister stands by it.

Mr. Brooke: I infer from the hon. Gentleman's remarks that he is turning his back on the position taken by the Liberal party in respect of VAT in a peculiar debacle earlier this year.

Mr. Taylor: The Liberal party did not take such a position—[HON MEMBERS: "Oh."] I was among those of my hon. Friends who ensured that it never will take such a position. I am happy to confirm that we do not stand by the commitment to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. [Interruption.] I refer instead to our wider commitment to ensuring that the Community is about allowing individuals the freedom to do what they want, in making their own way and in overcoming their own difficulties at a local level. That is the emphasis we place on the European Community. It will be interesting for the Conservative Members who are commenting to see what the Government do in practice. We have heard the Government say that they do not want that; I think that we may well find that it is the Government, not we, who introduce it. It will be interesting to see whether the smiles on the faces of Conservative Members are as broad when that time comes.

9.4 pm

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): Fifteen years ago, I was a Financial Times correspondent in Brussels. It fell to our office to monitor one of the early renegotiations of British membership of the European Community, that conducted by the Labour party when it was in office. I have no doubt that some right hon. and hon. Members will recall that perfunctory and self-satisfied performance, which left the entire fisheries agreement untouched and led to the referendum in the United Kingdom.

If we are to hear criticisms of this Government's performance in reforming the European Community, we must be clear about the yardstick against which it is measured. That performance—now, mercifully, a long time ago, as it is a long time since the Labour party was in Government—is the only yardstick that we have, and it was a dismal performance.

One of my responsibilities was to monitor agriculture. The Labour Ministers of the day had an amazing reputation for conceding high increases in farm prices—once, I recall, a rise of 14 per cent. The problems of the common agricultural policy are not recent; they go back to the origins of that policy. I readily concede that some fundamental mistakes were made at that point. I think, however, that it will make for a more candid debate if we recognise that all parties have faced identical problems in trying to bring reason into some of the Community policies, and that all parties have had to compromise in that pursuit because of the nature of the dynamism within the institutions in the Community.

I note that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) appears to be enunciating a new Labour policy towards Europe—I am glad that it is a new Labour policy—that we are looking for a sort of Continentwide intervention via mechanisms such as the social fund and, no doubt, the regional fund, to which I am sure he is equally attached. If that means that we can now argue about Europe not in terms of being in or out, but against the background of the free-market, single market approach to interventionism, at least we put the debate on a sensible, rational footing. I am happy to fight my corner if that is the Opposition's argument.

I also noted several references to the need to attempt to bind the Government when they go into negotiations with the Community. Last week, a Labour amendment was tabled to the discussion on tax approximation and, if memory serves me right, only 91 hon. Members voted for it. Clearly, there is a certain amount of conversion to be done—even on the Conservative Benches—in relation to that thesis. I have to say, however, that the Folketing has not proved outstandingly successful. It has managed only to create enormous embarrassment for its Government, who have spent considerable time and a number of general elections trying to sort the matter out.

Mr. Holland: Does the hon. Gentleman mean that he does not approve of elections as a means for voters to express their will in this matter? Does he not recognise that there is a role for the democratic process in national Governments, rather than their being overridden by supranational institutions?

Mr. Curry: I know that successive Governments in Denmark have found themselves forced into elections almost by accident rather than by design. That sort of haphazard democratic process may not necesarily commend itself to the House.

We have three important documents before us: the proposal on own resources, with the new fourth resource; the proposals for budgetary discipline; and the amendments to the financial regulation. I want to begin with the Cinderella, the amendments to the financial regulations. It is easy to talk in grand terms about controlling this or that, but we have to make sure that the nitty-gritty is right. If we are not in charge of the management of what is happening on a day-to-day basis, we do not stand a chance of getting the big problems put right.

There are three important elements in the financial regulations. The first is the provision which makes it difficult for unused appropriations to be carried over to the following year. Opposition Members talked about the social fund. Its functions are important, but it has a poor record of managing to spend its appropriations. Its efficiency in terms of rate of spend is poor. Opposition Members should recognise that if they want to demand greater resources for it. Up to 1 billion ecu of expenditure has been handed over automatically in the past. That is not a good way to run a railway. In the interests of transparency and the annuality of the budget—because it is an annual budget—it is important that that practice should be changed.

The second measure is the change in agricultural finance, which converts the advances into reimbursement but describes them still as advances. The invention of the retrospective advance is one of the less felicitous inventions of the Community vocabulary. It has now been made permanent, with a two-and-a-half month delay before member states are reimbursed for their expenditure.

This is a positive move, but it would be unwise to attach too much importance to it. Certainly it is better for monitoring and control if the Commission can see expenditure before it has to disburse its resources rather than simply hand out cash in advance. Up to now, the correction to the account has been done in March of the following year, so there is a further useful gain in that, but it is important not to exaggerate its extent.

Certain amendments will be proposed when the measure goes through the European Parliament. I ask my right hon. Friend to do his best to sustain them. At the moment the Commission dishes money out from a general kitty and it goes to wherever it is needed. I think that the Parliament will attempt to establish a series of kitties so that there is a chapter-by-chapter monitoring of expenditure. Again, this would be a management gain in the efficiency of the operation.

The important element of the financial regulations is the attempt to sort out the dreadful business of clearance of the accounts. It has taken five to seven years after the end of a financial year for the Commission to get legal clearance for the money which has been spent. The time is now down to about three years—hardly a brilliant performance. The trouble is that some people have moved on; probably some documents have moved on as well. When there are political problems, such as the way the French implement co-responsibility or, dare one say, the Milk Marketing Board its payments, it is difficult to obtain redress.

There should be much quicker clearance. The Commission is offering to clear the accounts by, if I recall rightly, mid-September of the second year after the closure of the accounts. I urge my right hon. Friend to argue the case for clearance, except in the most exceptional circumstances, one year after the end of the accounts. That should be an adequate period if we are to have effective scrutiny and management of expenditure.

As to own resources and budgetary discipline, I take to heart the comments of my right hon Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and other hon. Members about the necessary imprecision of certain proposals and the fact that to some extent one has to take things on trust. In a sense, that is the nature of the organisation.

I want to enumerate some of the bull points. I choose my words with care. We have a legally expressed discipline of farm spending which is linked to new and restructured own resources operating through the stabilisers, and we have renewal of the rebate system, an important achievement which was difficult to get. I agree that the old Fontainebleau system was not as effective as we had hoped, but there is a further strengthening in the mechanism. I urge hon. Members to consider the trend of what has been happening rather than the absolute. We will be disappointed if we always seek absolutes.

With the new system of own resources, based on gross national product, there should be no need for a further increase in Community resources while the present policy mix exists. Provided that no major new policy is introduced, there should be no requirement for further increase. At least that provides a more dynamic basis for a budget than we have had in the past. That gain is worth having.

It is also worth remembering that any system based on GNP helps the United Kingdom, as the United Kingdom's share of GNP is smaller than its share of VAT. We could have done without the 55 per cent. cut-off, but even with that, we benefit from the system. The monetary reserve is better than the exceptional circumstances provision that we had in the past and, as my right hon. Friend said, it works both ways and is specific to the ecu-dollar relationship.

Also important is the year-on-year overall limit on expenditure which was written into the Brussels summit —the sub-ceiling. That is likely to bite quite severely. For example, agricultural expenditure is at a ceiling of 27·5 billion ecu. A number of member states are now pressing for the devaluation of their green currencies in the course of the present farm price fixing, which is at a big round zero, as it has been for a number of years.

The Commission is holding out against that, because a 1 per cent. devaluation of the French franc, which is a major agricultural currency, would add about 120 million ecu to the budget in a full year, and the Commission cannot go beyond the ceiling. The ceiling will start to cause dilemmas, and the United Kingdom has been one of the most insistent countries calling for devaluation of the green pound for its farmers.

Will the stabilisers work? My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing has pointed out some of the difficulties of the cereals stabiliser. I agree with him that the 160 million tonnes ceiling was too high. It is true that if the 3 per cent. cut applies year on year, it will accumulate to 12 per cent. and eventually will lead to a cut of one third between 1983 and 1993. One is certainly entitled to be doubtful about the long-term effect of such a cut, particularly with an underlying yield increase of between 1·5 per cent. and 2 per cent. and the changes in the green rate which we are demanding and which will counter-balance the cuts as they come into effect.

The wine stabiliser is also important because the price has been cut very severely. The conclusion is that certain countries now have to recognise that they must live in the world market place. A country such as France does not have the option of treating its farmers simply as a sort of social therapy, which some member states seem to consider desirable. It is committed to finding outlets on the world market and therefore has to apply agricultural disciplines.

May I also point out the importance of the depreciation of stocks, and mention one or two brief figures which illustrate some of the effects of the stabiliser mechanism. I have done some research into the level of stocks. The butter stocks are down significantly. The £2 billion specially earmarked for disposals was an extremely expensive operation, but butter stocks are now down to 580,000 tonnes against 1·2 million tonnes a year ago; skimmed milk powder is down to 320,000 tonnes against nearly 800,000 tonnes a year ago, and fewer than 25,000 tonnes of new butter has gone into intervention in the past 11 months.

There is no new accumulation of stock at the moment. More important is the level of world prices which affect the budget. Butter has just been edged up to $1,100 a tonne under the general agreement on tariffs and trade minimum price of $1,000 and there is no reason why that cannot start moving back to the $2,400 per tonne which it occupied some years ago. Skimmed milk powder has moved from $700 to $1,550 a tonne on the world market since June last year and whole milk powder has risen from $800 to $1,500 dollars a tonne on the world market since June last year. Cheese has risen by $400.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend, who understands these things, explain why, in view of the new minimum price, the EEC sold 240,000 tonnes of butter to the Soviet Union at 6p a pound last month?

Mr. Curry: That is because there was a special derogation under the GATT agreement approved by the other major performer on the world market, New Zealand, as some of us heard Mr. Jim Graham, chairman of the New Zealand dairy board, explain about a week ago at the Back-Bench committee. That permitted the Community to sell old butter at a severely discounted price—about one tenth of the $2,400 a tonne which butter has reached as a historical high in the world market. My hon. Friend is correct to say that there was a special discount price for old butter to the Soviet Union. My point is that firmness in world market prices is the best chance of bringing some control to agricultural expenditure.

There are reasons for increasing the structural funds, provided that the money is well spent. At present, it is poor quality expenditure. There is no reason to assume that because agriculture is "bad", the other expenditure is necessarily "good". We need to apply just as firm scrutiny to those funds to ensure that the money is well spent and that it does not simply replace money that has often already been spent by member Governments. The need for scrutiny goes across the entire Community budget.

I hope that when the matter comes to the House fully, hon. Members will feel able to approve the decisions taken at Brussels. They were important decisions and they represent a trend that is going firmly in the direction of budgetary common sense. I hope that I shall have the opportunity of commending them to the House then.

9.20 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): One of the reasons why attendance is perhaps not as great as it might be considering the importance of these matters is the complexity with which we are confronted. There are 14 documents and 16 Committee reports. It is no wonder that the Paymaster General, to use a cricketing analogy, kept a straight bat but did not try to make any runs. If he had tried to do so, the real position, which I find alarming, would be plain for all to see.

I shall attempt the almost impossible. There are about 14 reports from the Scrutiny Committee and, in 10 or 12 minutes, I shall attempt to summarise the summaries.

Unless we try to do that, I do not think that we will understand what is happening. If I am wrong on any point, I am sure that the Paymaster General will correct me.

As I understand it, we are discussing four issues. We are discussing a new tax structure for the EEC and, in particular, a new resource. We are discussing whether we can have real budget discipline. We are discussing the budget for 1988 and seeing how, if we wish, we can fund the deficit for this year in the interim. There are other small subsidiary matters, such as keeping our own rebate system in case the Italians upset it. But that is a small matter which we can no doubt get over. I shall take the four major issues in turn.

On the new tax, we keep the old system. All the taxes coming into the country under customs duties are the common Community tariff and are own resources. The same applies to the food levies and the VAT-related payments up to the old 1·4 per cent., which is the Fontainebleau formula. All that stays. In addition, we have the GNP-related tax that will be the increase. According to EEC publication SW3 ABT, published at the time of the Brussels summit, it is going up from about 37,000 mecu in the 1987 budget to a maximum of 52,000 mecu by 1992 on current prices. That is an increase of about 30 per cent.

That will not be achieved in one go. We know that it is going up in different stages. The note issued by the presidency at the end of the Brussels summit—document SN, 461/1/88—says:

"(d) the application of a rate to be determined under the budgetary procedure in the light of the total of all other revenue to an additional base representing the sum of the gross national product at market prices."

On what basis will that percentage be determined? Will it be by a qualified majority vote or will it have to be unanimous? That will determine the extent to which there will be raids upon the tax in years to come.

How much of that is being used up already in the 1988 budget? My calculation is that a great big chunk of it is, but perhaps the Paymaster General will be able to tell us.

What is the new tax to be spent on? First, the structural funds are to be doubled. We start off our discipline by doubling expenditure on one fund. I quote from that same document:

"The contributions of the Structural Funds to the regions covered by Objective No. 1 will be doubled by 1992."

Therefore, we are going to spend double on the European regional development fund, the European social fund and the agricultural guidance and guarantee fund.

That brings us to where the production is coming from and to my second heading—discipline. As the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) pointed out, it is not going to be much. I summarise the stabilisers programme, which was issued as a great triumph, as at best a means of reducing the rate of increase that would otherwise occur. That is the best way to sum it up. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), a farmer boldly said in the House that he was going to sow more. The stabilisers, of course, will only come into effect a year after the figures are calculated; then there will be a reduction of 3 per cent. on prices for the next year. Even the Minister of Agriculture, giving evidence to the Select Committee, could not put his hand on his heart and say that this would work. He shared the doubts, I think, of those who were questioning him.

Before I come to the 1988 budget, I want to revert briefly to the question, which I rather pooh-poohed, of the importance to the United Kingdom Budget of the Italian question raised by the right hon. Member for Worthing. This is very important. People do not realise how enormous our net contributions would be but for this rebate. Figures provided by the Library show that our contributions for 1987 were something like £4,740 million —over £4 billion—of which the VAT-related contribution was £3,000 million. That is not 1·4 per cent. but 12 to 13 per cent. of the Exchequer income from VAT.

We got back from the agricultural fund £1,422 million, and the net payments before refunds amounted to £2,473 million. We did not get back anything like the amount that we put in. We got another £1,126 million in rebates and had a net contribution of £1,347 million. That shows that an enormous amount of our net payment is relieved by our rebate, and we understand that we may not get it. That is why it is absolutely essential that that rebate mechanism is in place before we agree to any IGAs or any increased tax at all, because power to control that will be power to control the finance that we get from the EEC in future.

I submit that we should not be discussing the 1988 budget with the mechanism. We ought to be discussing the new mechanism, the new discipline and the new tax separately. The only reason why we are discussing them together is that the EEC has run out of money before it has got the new structure in place. In effect, we are being asked in this debate, and may be asked in the future, to approve an estimate before we have approved the tax. That is the essence of the position in which the EEC now finds itself; and, of course, that is quite wrong.

The 21st report of the Select Committee—House of Commons 43 XXI—reproduces the comprehensive table that the Government placed in the explanatory memorandum. The last line states that the budget for 1987 was £25 billion. The draft budget for 1988 is £30 billion —an increase of £5 billion in one year. Is that not about 25 per cent? It also assumes that we shall have the money to pay for the increase and that the taxes will be approved. If not, the money will not be there. The Government want to bridge that £5 billion gap partly by the pre-payments about which we have already heard but whose amounts I do not know. Originally the idea was to bridge the gap with an intergovernmental agreement of £5 billion, of which our contribution was to be about £800 million—a controversial matter.

Today, the Paymaster General revealed new information. He said that we might approve such an intergovernmental agreement in a composite Bill that also approved the draft decision authorising the new taxes. After my intervention in his speech, he went on to justify such a move by saying that there were precedents for it. I do not recall them. The Government got into trouble a few years ago when trying to get through an IGA under the treaty. There was a court case about it and they had to introduce a Consolidated Fund Bill solely for that purpose. This is most controversial because the treaty of Rome says that the EEC should not spend more than its income; but the whole point of the intergovernmental agreement is to enable it to spend more than its legal income. That is illegal under the treaty of Rome. If it were done, any citizen could take the EEC to court.

In this all too brief three hours of debate we are being asked to approve a complex mechanism for a new tax and budget that is, at the moment, illegal. I see no way out of the EEC tangle. Clearly, the commitments to payment rapidly and increasingly exceed the tax that we are being asked to approve. It will bring in up to 30 per cent. more revenue, but the calls on that revenue will not be controlled because the nature of the common agricultural policy and of the politics of the member states of the EEC makes the equation impossible.

9.33 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I hope that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will be able to answer the few questions that I can ask in the brief time that I have.

The small attendance at this debate is due not only to hon. Members finding the subject too complicated, but to a growing realisation that the views of the Government, of Parliament and of hon. Members on European matters are of limited importance. The views that we express have little impact on the amount of money that we shall pour out, and they will have no relevance to what is decided by the House. That is probably one of the main reasons why these important debates are attended by only a handful of people.

Another reason is that in these European debates, which are faithfully attended by the small number of hon. Members who are present tonight, we have been given a series of unfulfilled promises and expectations. I can remember hearing an almost identical debate at the time of Fontainebleau about how the problems were being solved. Yet in one of the many documents before us tonight, the preliminary draft budget, we read:

"This clearly shows that the Fontainebleau arrangement is hopelessly outdated and that it would be illusory and contrary to the resolve to impose a realism in budgetary matters to seek to adhere to it come what may".

In other words, the EC itself says that Fontainebleau was useless and pointless.

I think of the Government's repeated expectations and estimates of our current net contribution. I think of the financial year just ended. Official Government documents show that the estimate for the year just ended was £600 million net. It was then revised to £900 million net, and revised again to £1,500 million net. Most recently, the Prime Minister advised us that it would probably increase by £200 million to £300 million because of the arrangements at the Council just completed. We have had a whole series of disappointments.

I should like to ask the Minister five questions. First, what is the view of the Government or their advisers on the legality of this budget? It seems to me that under article 199 it is just not possible for the agreement arrived at between the President of the Council and the Parliament to proceed, because resources are not there. They have not been agreed or approved by the various Parliaments. What is the Government's view of the legality of the budget, and what can they do about it?

Secondly, can the Government give any estimate of the amount that has been excluded from the figures in the budget because of the special arrangements that were made recently? I refer in particular to the special butter disposal programme. The document says:

"This is a massive programme costing vast sums of money but has been excluded from the 1988 budget because of a special directive task called 801/87 of 16 March 1987."

We know that a whole series of such devices have been introduced to make spending appear to be less than it is. One of the most interesting was the decisions taken 10 days ago by the European Commission to approve without any consultation with Britain a ban on the import of apples. That could result in consumers being forced to eat last year's apple mountain, which is unwanted. This is an important consideration, bearing in mind that this year over 100,000 tonnes of Community apples were disposed of or destroyed at vast expense.

Thirdly, can the Government tell us why, despite the steps that have been taken to reduce surpluses, the estimate for their destruction and disposal has increased to £221 million per week? We have been told about the emergency disposal of stocks and about stabilisers. I cannot understand why the budget should contain an estimate of over £220 million per week, the highest ever, for disposing of butter and other surpluses.

Is my right hon. Friend prepared to put on record his estimate of the percentage increase in the 1988 budget compared with the 1987 budget? What is his estimate of the increase in expenditure on agriculture in the 1988 budget compared with the 1987 budget? What does he think the net contribution of the United Kingdom will be in the forthcoming year? Although we know that my right hon. Friend is an honest and prudent man, he must be aware that the estimates and forecasts given to the House, have all, sadly, proved to be inaccurate, and always in the wrong direction.

The budget and the resources approved by the Government, subject to certain Council considerations, are genuinely disappointing. They are a disaster. They will not cut agricultural production; nor will they stem the increase in spending, which is out of control. Most sadly of all, there is nothing in these measures that will stop the EC from continuing to inflict hardship and damage on Third-world countries by wrecking world food prices.

We have heard many times about the Government's aspirations and expectations, but they must be well aware that by increasing so substantially the resources of the Community, and in the absence of any legal control over about half the budget, they are simply allowing the Common Market to carry on as before—wasting money, inflicting damage on the Third world and having expenditure that is almost wholly out of control.

9.39 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): On behalf of the Opposition, I put on record our disappointment at the lack of involvement, and indeed lack of presence, of a Foreign Office Minister. Some of us remember with fondness the way in which the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) led the debates, when he was a Foreign Office Minister, with a panache that is now sadly and sorely missing. The Government, and the Paymaster General in particular, have an increasing credibility gap to fill in these European Community budget debates.

I am not up to continuing the cricketing analogies. The Paymaster General started the debate with a long and complicated, even repetitious, description that seemed more designed to obfuscate than to clarify the issue for the House. The right hon. Gentleman used Euro-jargon and referred to articles and regulations and the technicalities of whether the matter should be dealt with as a composite Bill or through the decoupled approach.

My objective, in the last few minutes of the debate, is to try to simplify the issues. Some of us have been attending these European budget debates for many years. My hon.

Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), and the hon. Members for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) have sat through all those debates.

EC budget debates have become like Oliver Twist, always asking for more, be it non-reimbursable advances —my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South will remember that phrase—or what are now called inter-governmental agreements, which have been sanitised as IGAs.

The hon. Member for Skipton and Rippon (Mr. Curry) asked for a yardstick. The Opposition's yardstick is not that used by previous Governments, but is based on the promises and guarantees that have been given by this Government. The Prime Minister said on 1 July 1987:

"We have made it clear throughout the discussions that it is necessary, before that question is addressed, to have agreement on effective and binding control over Community spending, including, in particular, agricultural spending."—[Official Report, 1 July 1987; Vol. 118, c. 493.]

The right hon. Lady repeated the assurance on 15 February 1988.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office in one of the most telling and, as is usual for the right hon. Lady, frank interventions, said:

"Our central goal is the achievement of binding controls over spending. Runaway agricultural spending has squeezed all other expenditure. It is now accepted by our partners that the operation of the CAP has been of declining benefit to the very farmers it was meant to help".—[Official Report, 18 November 1987; Vol. 122, c. 1100.]

That is what some hon. Members have been saying today. The themes of guarantees and promises constantly come through statements from Government during EC budget debates. First, they say that there should be effective and binding control on expenditure before agreement is reached on the extra spending and funds voted by the House. Secondly, they say that there should be a switch from agricultural expenditure to structural funds and other non-compulsory areas of the budget. It is a pity that Foreign Office Ministers are not with us.

The Foreign Secretary was quoted in The Independent on 25 November 1987 as saying that the Government would block a summit agreement on extra revenue for the Community

"unless we make a reality of our rhetoric about stabilising expenditure."

We must examine today whether the objectives set by the Government, not by the Opposition, have been achieved and whether they have made a reality of their rhetoric, to quote the Foreign Secretary. The question is whether we should be contemplating providing further resources, for whatever it is called and however it is described, or whether, later in our discussions, perhaps next month, the matter will be dealt with by a composite Bill or a de-coupled arrangement. The Government's motion asks the House merely to endorse

"the Government's objectives of securing effective and binding control of Community expenditure."

It still remains only an objective after all these years, including my four or five years of personal involvement in these debates.

Has that objective been achieved? I shall use, not my criteria, but the judgment of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, so ably chaired by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins). On page 6 of its report, the Committee quoted the Prime Minister's statement on the Brussels meeting. She said:

"the United Kingdom had made clear, first, that any further increase in Community resources must be accompanied by effective and legally binding controls on expenditure".

The Committee went on to examine whether that had been achieved. In paragraph 10, on page 7, the Committee said:

"We pressed the Paymaster General on the question of the legal enforceability of budgetary discipline."

On pages 8 and 9, the Committee concluded:

"We are not convinced that an inter-institutional agreement is the equivalent of a firm and legally binding text . . . we believe there are still grounds for remaining sceptical about the prospects for budgetary control in the future."

That is the control—control dominated by Members of the Conservative party. On page 5, the Select Committee concluded:

"As yet neither the own resources decision, nor the arrangements for budgetary discipline are in place."

There is none of the promised budgetary discipline. That is why the House should support our amendment.

The report says that budgetary discipline and own resources are "inextricably linked" with the "provision to preserve the UK's abatement."

A number of right hon. and hon. Members, including the right hon. Member for Worthing, said that the Italian question posed a threat to the United Kingdom's abatement. It puts our rebate at risk. The Paymaster General must answer that question, which has been posed by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

As for switching from agricultural expenditure to spending on other aspects, we see that agricultural spending is still out of control. The Paymaster General was asked at the beginning of the debate to give the percentage, but could not. He was asked again. The answer is in the minutes of evidence to the Select Committee, which show that agricultural expenditure has increased by 19·6 per cent. over the 1987 budget. Expenditure on other aspects has not increased substantially, if at all. Far from being increased, the expenditure which we should like on the social and regional funds, overseas aid and research and development has sometimes been cut.

The hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon challenged the efficacy of some of the expenditure, but he should know that the director of the regional fund has produced a report on new structural funds. Any new structure has had to be postponed because of this budgetary problem and the inadequacy of resources. We want money to be put in to help the declining areas, not just of Britain—for example, in the steel industry, which was described by my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) —but of other parts of the Community. Instead of declining, the budget has increased. Instead of being a smaller percentage of the Community's resources, agricultural spending is larger.

In an excellent speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North said that the vision of the founding fathers of the Community was being lost in such debates. The vision of the potential for political co-operation between Community members is being lost. The potential for improving the employment situation, through an integrated expansion of our economy, is being lost as a result of the detailed debates on these issues.

The United Kingdom Parliament will be asked to contribute more to a budget of doubtful legality. It will be asked to pay more when agricultural expenditure is clearly out of control. We will be asked to pay more when the British rebate is still in danger, the Government's promises remain unfulfilled and the pledges are seen to be hollow. I hope that Conservative Members, including the hon.

[Mr. George Foulkes]

Member for Southend, East and the right hon. Member for Worthing, who have criticised the Government and their failure to fulfil those promises, will take their courage in their hands, as they have done on previous occasions, and join us tonight in the Lobby to support our amendment.

9.50 pm

Mr. Brooke: It may be a sign of masochism, but, as ever, I have enjoyed this evening's debate. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) for reminding us of the performance of the Labour party when it was in power. I was constantly reminded of that during the speech of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland).

My hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon asked a question which caused me to remember the application of Parkinson's law to the Commission's behaviour. This was reflected by the hon. Member for Vauxhall, who disregarded the documents that we are considering this evening and constructed his own agenda. He was also following the other principle of Professor Parkinson—that the nuclear device goes through on the nod and one then has a long argument about the bicycle shed.

The whole of the hon. Gentleman's argument was devoted to the document on financial engineering. I do not want to decry that document. It was put in front of us at ECOFIN in May 1987 and included in translation the words "financial engineering". The hon. Gentleman said that there was adequate provision throughout the Community, but plenty of Community countries disagreed with the proposition relating to financial engineering when it was brought forward.

Whenever I read about the Labour party's attitude towards social engineering in future, I shall seek to substitute the words "social mechanisms" and see whether they work. As to the remarks of the hon. Member for Vauxhall about the Glamorgan woman's workshop, I assure him that I shall bring that matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall gave his King Charles head of a multinational company another good airing. He criticised the logic of my speech—and I was grateful to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) for disagreeing with him about that. The hon. Gentleman frequently contributes to these debates and is familiar with the issues with which we have to deal. I was addressing the evening's business as set down on the Order Paper while the hon. Member for Vauxhall rambled around his well-loved prejudices.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) asked me a number of questions. He asked whether the prospective demand for a 12(2) overdraft was due solely to cash flow problems. We have not received a 12(2) request so I cannot give a definitive reply, but the Commission's cash forecasts clearly show a cash flow problem arising from normal transactions over the next few weeks. I acknowledge the rules that we must observe in considering that overdraft and assure him that we shall continue to observe them.

My right hon. Friend asked on what basis the presidency agreed to the budget in Strasbourg last night. Herr Tietmeyer, the president of the Budget Council, agreed to a commitment about 2 per cent. above the limit set by the Parliament's statutory margin, on the basis of his interpretation of a mandate, which he was given at the Budget Council on 28 April, and to which the British Government did not subscribe. My right hon. Friend asked about the question raised by the Italians on the United Kingdom's abatement. The size of our abatement is not at stake. The point raised by Italy was how the other member states would finance the United Kingdom's abatement.

Finally, my right hon. Friend asked about GNP statistics—a question which he also raised with me in the Select Committee. I agree with him, and the European Council agreed that there should be a directive ensuring that the same definition of GNP is applied in all member states for own resources purposes. A draft directive has now been proposed and is under discussion in the Community.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) intervened briefly with the word "never", which he repeated on several occasions. My experience, particularly of these debates, is that that is a dangerous word to use.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) showed a welcome interest in the Court of Auditors, but, given his preoccupation with it, perhaps he had not noticed the expansion of the social fund which was agreed in the Brussels Council's conclusions. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) suggested that so-called cash flow problems are a euphamism for overspending. There is a genuine distinction. For any level of overall annual spending, cash needs are bound to fluctuate from month to month as payments become due on different items at different times. That is why there are routine arrangements for managing own resources contributions in this way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and others asked about agricultural expenditure being 25 per cent. higher in 1988 than in 1987. I wholly agree with them about the need to control agricultural spending, but it is somewhat misleading to talk of a 25 per cent. increase in 1988. Because of the introduction of delayed payments, 1987 was in effect a 10-month agricultural year. Taking account of that, the underlying increase in 1988 is less than 7·5 per cent.

Mr. Foulkes: Does that mean that the Minister can give a clear and categorical guarantee that agricultural expenditure for 1989 will not increase over that for 1988?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman, who has studied these matters, knows perfectly well that there is a provision that the agricultural guideline will rise by 74 per cent. of the growth in Community GNP—and that is calculated to run at 2 per cent.

The hon Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) betrayed the whole thesis of the Liberal party when, in response to an intervention from me about the Liberal party's attitude to VAT, he said that it had to have an ability to adjust. Many of us have watched the Liberal party adjusting literally between morning and afternoon.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) for his kind words. Our noble Friend Lord Cockfield introduced the proposals on fiscal harmonisation. Where Council Ministers have not disagreed with them in principle, they have found massive disagreements in detail. If my hon. Friend is counselling us to countenance reality, he must study the reactions to these proposals throughout the Community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon, in a knowledgeable speech, drew attention to what happened under the Labour Government. Given our success in securing the abatement, it is worth remembering that the result of the 1975 financial mechanism was not a single ecu. My hon. Friend referred to VAT being capped at 55 per cent. of GNP as being to the disadvantage of the United Kingdom. It is in fact of further benefit to the United Kingdom, as is the introduction of the fourth resource based on GNP, because it reduces the contribution before abatement which we would otherwise have paid.

The hon. Member for Newham, South asked how the rate of the fourth resource would be set. The rate of GNP-related contributions required to balance the budget will reflect the expenditure decisions taken by qualified majority voting in the annual budgetary process, just as the annual rate of VAT contributions is determined under the present system.

The hon. Member for Newham, South asked how much of the new GNP-based own resource will be used up in 1988. The 1988 draft budget involves an intergovernmental agreement corresponding to the amount that would be raised this year from the new fourth resource. This implies a rate for the new fourth resource of around 0·2 per cent. of Community GNP. Total own resources in the 1988 draft budget are equivalent to around 1·1 per cent. of Community GNP. The hon. Member for Newham, South said that we might not get our abatement. There are no grounds for that belief. Our 1988 abatement is in the 1988 budget agreed yesterday. Our new abatement mechanism agreed at the Brussels European Council has not been challenged and is fairly incorporated in the proposed own resources decision.

The hon. Member for Newham, South and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East said that the 1988 budget was illegal. It is true that the treaty requires that the budget should balance. That was why it was agreed at the European Council that member states would make non-repayable advances, in order to balance the budget. So long as there is an IGA in place to balance the budget, the budget is valid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East asked whether there were any documents to suggest that the rate of growth of agricultural expenditure——

Mr. Teddy Taylor: When did the European Council agree the IGA?

Mr. Brooke: The European Council and the Budget Council following upon it agreed to agree in principle an IGA. It is perfectly true that an IGA must still be agreed, and the question of the 1988 budget will continue to be open until it is confirmed that an IGA has been finally agreed.

Mr. Taylor: It has not been agreed, then?

Mr. Brooke: Having regard to the enthusiasm of the House to bring these matters to a conclusion, I shall respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East at a later stage.

In conclusion, I want to refer to the speech made by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). There is no pleasing the Opposition. I well recall Mr. Deakins, a former Member of this House—we miss him from these debates—constantly criticising Foreign Office Ministers for not allowing a Treasury Minister to take part in a debate. I thought that the speech made by the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley was noisy—perhaps to cover the weakness of some of his arguments and to take us away from the experience of the Labour Government. I would agree with the hon. Gentleman and the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service that an inter-institutional agreement is not the equivalent of a legally binding instrument, but the proof of the pudding will be in the eating as we see how the arrangements secured at the Brussels Council evolve in future.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 10552/86 and the un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Treasury on 18th March 1987 on the 1987 Community Budget, the un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Treasury on 18th March 1987 on carry-over of appropriations from 1986 to 1987, 6037/87 on the 1987 Budget situation, 6822/87 and 7552/87 on Supplementary and Amending Budget No. 1 for 1987, 6048/87, 7211/87, COM(87)240, COM(87)677 and COM(88)81 on the 1988 Preliminary Draft Budget, 4766/88 on the 1988 Draft Budget, 4051/87 on financial engineering, 5266/88 on Own Resources 5282/88 on amendments to the Financial Regulation and the un-numbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Treasury on 10th May 1988 on budgetary discipline; and endorses the Government's objectives of securing effective and binding control of Community expenditure.

Anglo-Polish Relations

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10.16 pm

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): Let me say first how grateful I am, as are a number of other hon. Members, for the opportunity to raise matters concerning the affairs of Poland and its relations with the United Kingdom—not only because I know that these matters are of interest in particular to you, Mr. Speaker, and to a number of other distinguished Members of the House, as evidenced in various early-day motions and an Adjournment debate in January, and not only because I know that they are of great interest to Poles in this country and of course in Poland, but because the debate deals with the future of Poland, the Polish people and the principles of freedom in Poland. That, of course, has an impact on the future stability of central Europe, and on East-West relations in general.

The tragedy of Poland is the tragedy of a proud and independent people who are ruled without their consent. Although they have a great cultural and artistic tradition, despite their intellectual achievements and abilities and although they have a land rich in minerals and a large industrial base, they have been so stifled, oppressed and bureaucratised by the machinery of a Communist state that their democratic freedoms have vanished. Law, instead of becoming an instrument of civilised values, has become an instrument of oppression. Now we hear that even the official trade unions—excluding Solidarity—have had their activities outlawed, and the standard of living has sadly fallen to what can only be described as Third-world levels.

Infant mortality in Poland is the highest in Europe, and life expectancy is the lowest. The prices of food have risen by some 40 per cent. in the past two months alone. Essentials such as meat, cotton wool and even razor blades are rationed, and it has been calculated that the residual monthly income, after basic housing expenses, of a family of four with both parents working would not even cover the cost of one pair of winter shoes.

Most irresponsible of all—and most serious of all—so bad has been the organisation of Poland's mineral resources and its industry that no less than one third of the country is now classed as an area of ecological emergency. The very soil of the country is being slowly poisoned.

Why is this? The simple answer is that the economy is being ossified under an archaic and arthritic Communist system. Subsidies, price controls and a nomenclature system mean that three-quarters of the country's managers care more for their party perks than the efficiency of the enterprise they are charged to run.

The results are plain. The Centre for Research into Communist Economies shows that inflation is running at 60 per cent., that coal resources are being heavily wasted and that the external debt is £37,000 million, which is not only 50 per cent. of the gross domestic product but second only to Russia in the Communist world. Possibly most damning of all, despite the fact that there is 25 per cent. more industrial equipment in the country than there was in 1980, industrial productivity per man has fallen by one fifth. It is small wonder that, since 1980, no fewer than 700,000 Poles have decided to leave their homeland.

What is the Polish Government's response? Officially they talk of democratisation, of economic reform and of the need to reduce subsidies and encourage private enterprise, but the reality is that, because they do that without the basic consent of the people, the system is only kept in place by oppression, by a denial of basic freedom and human rights, and by arbitrary surveillance and imprisonment of those who dare to question the regime and even of their children.

I am pleased to inform the House of the release of Hanna Lukowska-Karniej, Andrzej Kolodziej, Jan Andrzej Gorny and Kornel Morawiecki, all Solidarity supporters. However, all those people were imprisoned on trumped-up charges ranging from non-payment of maintenance through misappropriation of identity cards to completely fictitious acts of terrorism.

Despite this, the events of the last month show us that, if anything, the duplicity and political violence of the Communist regime in Poland have intensified. Despite assurances which were given to the Church,Mr. Morawiecki has not been allowed back from exile into his own country. No fewer than 70 Solidarity leaders and two thirds of its executive committee have been arrested. Students at Cracow university and eleswhere have been brutally beaten. Probably most heinous of all, the Communist authorities merely use the Catholic Church as a convenient intermediary for trying to settle, in its words, "a peaceful strike" at the Nova Huta steelworks in Cracow. Then, without justification or notice, they attacked the steelworks with stun grenades, tear gas and clubs in a horrifying and gratuitous display of violence. If anything demonstrates the cynicism, duplicity and contempt for democratic argument of the Polish regime, it was those events.

What can the British Government do to help reverse the position in Poland and the dangers it undoubtedly possesses for central European stability, especially in view of the Prime Minister's intended visit to Poland in October? The first thing to remember is that, although it is important, in the words of the Minister of State at the Foreign Office recently,

"to express our views strongly to the Polish authorities on human rights and to deplore the use of political violence", and although it is important to use channels like the British Council in Warsaw, the World Service and organisations such as Medical Aid for Poland and the Jagiellonian Trust in this country, mere exhortation is not enough to produce reform within the Polish Government.

Secondly, whatever the public position of the Polish Government may be—and there are signs that certain Politburo members, especially the newer ones, are becoming aware of that—they must recognise that perestroika and attempts to reform in Russia make Mr. Gorbachev more sensitive and vulnerable to unrest in Soviet satellite countries than he has ever been before.

There are two reasons for that. First, he knows that any need for direct intervention in those countries by the Soviet Union would kill detente, which is so vital to his economic reform programme. Secondly, any need to do so would give the hardliners in Moscow precisely the arguments they want to make sure that the perestroika programme no longer takes place.

Equally, the Polish Government must inwardly be sensitive to the same issues. If they are to carry through a programme of economic reform, including the abolition of subsidies, freeing up the supply system by introducing more private sector businesses and restructuring the economy, the Polish Government and opposition recognise that that will involve a necessary austerity. The short-term effects of that austerity, if it is to be peacefully carried forward, must be mitigated. If they are to be mitigated, the Polish Government urgently need foreign credits, and that means a successful restructuring of their official foreign debts—on which they have paid no interest since 1982—more foreign investment, and more aid.

That presents the British Government with a unique opportunity to persuade its EEC, American and other partners in finance that there can be credits and there can be aid in generous quantities for Poland, but that it will be possible only on certain conditions. Those conditions must be made absolutely plain.

The first condition is that the Polish Government must ensure freedom of association and political opinion within Poland and from without into Poland. Secondly, all political prisoners must be released, and those who are presently in exile must be allowed to return home. Thirdly, the legitimate rights of trade unions and other opposition activists must be recognised and respected. Fourthly, and possibly most important, a genuine and continuing dialogue on economic and political reform must be started and continued with Polish people.

Such a course of action is realistic and imaginative. It would help to restore freedom to the Polish people, and prosperity for their country, inevitably it would mean that relations between Britain and Poland would quickly improve, and I believe that it is a course of action which the Government ought to follow, as it would offer hope for the Polish people who so desperately seek it.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) for providing me with an opportunity to say a few words about our relations with Poland.

The Minister will know of my interest and involvement. I am of the generation that had good reason to be grateful for Polish courage and sacrifice during the second world war. I am of the generation that felt and still feels ashamed of the way in which our Polish comrades were abandoned by the West in 1945. I hold to the view most strongly that there can be no lasting detente between East and West until Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and all the captive nations of Eastern Europe are free to determine their own destiny. That was put so eloquently by my hon. Friend that I need not say anything more about it.

It is safe to say, however, that I thought that it was also the view of Her Majesty's Government. I applauded the robust way in which my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary earlier condemned the brutal suppression of Solidarity and the imposition of military rule. However, of late that seems to have changed somewhat. I was astonished to learn from The Sunday Times of 8 May that my right hon. and learned Friend has greater sympathy with General Jaruzelski in the Polish crisis than with the Solidarity movement. He believes, we were told, that Jaruzelski should be regarded as a patriot for safeguarding his country against Russian military intervention. Really—I thought that the Afghans had more to do with it than that. The Soviets could hardly wage war on two fronts or suppress two nations at the same time.

I am deeply concerned about that statement. The recent wave of unrest in Poland was brutally suppressed by the police. There were numerous arrests, serious injuries, heavy fines and dismissals from work, and Solidarity itself remains suppressed. I suggest that there is only one way forward for the Polish authorities, and Western Governments should be urging it repeatedly—namely, to borrow a little glasnost and perestroika from Mr. Gorbachev, who sees more openness as the means of securing real reconstruction. They should recognise that there is no way out of the mess that Communist rule has made of Poland except by recognising the natural aspirations of the Polish people to be masters in their own house.

There are two things that Her Majesty's Government can do. First, they can make it absolutely plain, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest has done in his own way, that economic aid will be forthcoming only if the Polish Government seek a genuine partnership with Solidarity and the opposition. Secondly, they should make it plain that the inhumane treatment of Polish leaders—such as Kornel Morawiecki, who, after long imprisonment without trial, was deported without the right to return to his country—must end if the Polish Administration are to be treated as civilised. I beg my hon. Friend the Minister to make it absolutely clear that the West is ready to help the long-suffering Polish people, but only on the condition that their just aspirations are met and that the persecution ceases.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): This is the second time in less than six months that Poland has been chosen as the subject for an Adjournment debate. Poland is never far from the centre of international events. During recent weeks it has once again occupied the headlines in unhappy circumstances.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) on his choice of subject for the debate, which is of real and continuing importance. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) has once again joined in the debate on Poland. Everybody in the House very much respects his long-term commitment to the Polish people and we recognise the considerable amount of time that he devotes to the interests of the Polish people. I recognise that because I know that he was in contact with my office last week on behalf of Mr. Morawiecki. We are delighted to say that we have been able to grant him a visa to come from Vienna to the United Kingdom in what I think my right hon. Friend will agree was rapid time.

In the House on 11 January, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) reviewed Britian's relations with Poland and developments since the emergence of Solidarity in 1980 and 1981. He acknowledged the importance of Poland in East-West relations and the breadth and significance of links between our two countries. Those links are deep and lasting. Their origins lie in distant and recent wartime history. They are strengthened by commercial, cultural and personal ties that set our relations with Poland apart, in many repects, from those with other countries in eastern Europe.

The political and economic conditions in Poland are not, for hon. Members or for many of their constituents, matters of cold theory. They are matters of immediate practical concern. I class myself as one who is affected by that, because until recently I had the benefit of a Polish uncle.

As my hon. and learned Friend said in the debate in January, we were glad to welcome the Polish Foreign Minister, Professor Orzechowski, to London in December. That visit acknowledged what seemed like a new and welcome approach by the Polish authorities: a more resolute attitude towards the many challenges that confronted their country. All those in prison on clearly political charges had been released in September 1986. Plans for economic reform had taken more coherent shape and the need for political reform was at last officially acknowledged.

I should like now to say a few words about the Polish economy and about the Government's approach to Poland's economic difficulties. The Polish economy is burdened with a growing external debt that now amounts to about $39 billion. It is also burdened with low productivity, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest said, and by excess demand. Recovery of the economy will come about only through a determined attack on the economic causes of those problems. It will also come about only if the Polish people can be brought to understand the need for sacrifices and can be persuaded that those sacrifices are worth while.

Our long-standing trade links and the sizeable Polish community in Britain provide a solid base for further expansion of trade between our two countries. Despite Poland's current financial difficulties, worthwhile opportunities exist for increasing trade in a number of sectors. But future trade prospects must depend on the scale and direction of Poland's economic recovery. A Polish economy restored to vigour and success is in British, as well as Polish, interests.

We recognise that long-term Western assistance will be needed for this recovery. Britain strongly supports the principle of an IMF programme for Poland, subject to that programme's terms being satisfactory. Once an IMF programme is in place, it is possible to envisage new forms of co-operation—for instance, International Bank for Reconstruction and Development co-financing schemes and fresh medium and long-term credits, targeted on export-earning projects—but we first need the assurance that sound economic policies will be pursued with the IMF's seal of approval. Ambitious plans for massive Western economic assistance to Poland, in the absence of these conditions, are not realistic.

Hon. Members have suggested, tonight and on previous occasions, that political conditions should be attached to decisions in these economic areas. Frankly, I do not agree. Polish economic recovery will come about only as a result of motivation and persuasion, not of coercion. The same vital principle applies to relations between Western countries and the Polish authorities. It would be an error to prescribe persuasion as a solution to Poland's internal problems, and to seek by contrast to use political coercion as a means of solving Poland's economic difficulties. Thus, Western official debt relief for Poland is negotiated in the Paris Club on technical, rather than political, grounds. Those are the same criteria as are applied to non-Communist countries.

Political factors do not determine the Government's approach to new credits, either. We favour a step-by-step approach to the normalisation of financial and credit relations with Poland, starting with the resumption of short-term credit cover. After that, progress will depend upon Polish performance in honouring existing debt-restructuring agreements. A steady but critical dialogue with the Polish authorities is needed, from within and outside Poland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point spoke about an article in the Sunday Times on 8 May. That article was not an accurate reflection of the views of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. To learn about those views it is necessary to refer to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office statement of 6 May, which commented on what were then recent events. That statement deplored the use of police violence in pursuing the objective of reform and called upon the Polish authorities to recognise the importance of individual liberties and freedom of association.

That national statement of 6 May was followed on 10 May by a statement on behalf of the Twelve by the Federal Republic of Germany in its capacity as current President of the European Community. That statement reminded the Polish authorities of their international commitments to human rights and called for the release of those arrested during the recent strikes.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary made clear in yet another statement on 12 May, which is available in the Library, his view that the Polish Government's plans for economic reform deserved support because they offered the prospect of a better life for the Polish people. Those economic plans involve short-term sacrifices but, of course, they will have little effect unless the Polish people are prepared and willing to support them.

Those statements show the extent to which The Daily Telegraph was in error when, on 13 May, in a leading article, it accused the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of failing to encourage dissident groups in eastern Europe and of maintaining—it is almost unbelievable that The Daily Telegraph said this—a "stony silence" during the recent crisis in Poland.

That leading article was a deplorable distortion of the Government's policy. Getting the Soviet Union and its allies to live up to their human rights commitments is fundamental to the Government's policy. As my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office said in a speech at the CSCE review meeting in Vienna last month, we are not prepared to leave the Vienna conference without real progress on human rights. My hon. and learned Friend made it clear that what our Soviet colleagues have called a "common European home" could not be achieved with barbed wire in the garden and secret policemen in the cellar.

The Government are worried that once again prisoners should be held in Poland for political reasons. As my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, recent arrests and sentences have included senior members of Solidarity. Some of those imprisoned have been released, and that is welcome. As my hon. and learned Friend said in January, there are some people in prison in Poland on criminal charges, but arguably there is a political element in the charges.

The Government share the concern that my right hon. and hon. Friends have expressed about imprisonment in Poland for political reasons and on many occasions we have made those concerns clear to the Polish authorities. Such imprisonments cannot but damage prospects for improved relations between Britain and Poland. They are an obstacle to Poland's plans for effective economic reform. They represent a return to the discredited policies of the past.

As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has accepted an invitation to visit Poland. She hopes that circumstances will make it possible for the visit to take place before the end of the year. In her discussions with General Jaruzelski and the Polish leadership, as well as with Mr. Lech Walesa and representatives of independent opinion, she will, I am sure, wish to reflect the concerns that have been expressed in this debate. In particular, she will wish to refer to the essential relationship between political and economic reform, and I am positive that she will stress the need for human rights to be respected in Poland.

The pressures within Polish society have once again burst to the surface in recent weeks. There is no lack of energy, talent and commitment in Poland, if only they can be harnessed, but the Polish people have shown again and again that they will not put their shoulders to the wheel unless their interests are taken into account. For the reasons that I have given, I do not believe that Governments outside Poland should set political conditions for economic or financial help, but Poland's leaders must recognise that they will never get Poland's economy back on its feet without consultation, dialogue, and respect for individual freedom and initiative. I hope that the events of recent weeks will convince those leaders that that is the only path to the economic revival that we in this country most earnestly wish to see.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Fifteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Grandparents (Adoption Proceedings)

9.35 am

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I have pleasure in presenting to the House a petition signed by 6,530 residents of the United Kingdom asking the House to give careful consideration to proposals to introduce a law to enable grandparents to have the right of access to their grandchildren and to be represented at court and social services hearings for the adoption or care of their grandchildren. This right is not now afforded to them by law.

My petition is similar to the one that I presented to the House a month ago containing 8,500 signatures.

I believe that it is necessary for the House to consider this very important measure in order to stop the heartache and suffering of grandparents and their grandchildren.

The petition is also signed by Gareth Wardell of 67, Elder Grove, Carmarthen, Dyfed.

To lie upon the Table.

The Arts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

9.36 am

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): The House has debated the arts every year since I became Minister for the Arts in 1985. It is the second year running that we have debated this subject in Government time. This is a welcome demonstration of the growing public and parliamentary interest and a clear indication of the Government's support for the arts.

As Arts Minister for nearly three years, I have made weekly visits to all parts of the country. I have been privileged and fortunate to see, as perhaps no one else can, the development of the arts. I have a very clear impression of the flowering of the arts in all regions and in all art forms. I shall give the House brief glimpses of the variety of arts activities that I have seen. The performances of the city of Birmingham symphony orchestra led by Simon Rattle, the attraction of the flourishing Chichester theatre, the Royal Shakespeare Company's performance for the first time at Grimsby, and the Sadlers' Wells ballet in the Isle of Wight are all vivid memories in my mind.

I recall seeing the Ruthin craft centre in north Wales, where the craftsmen both work and sell, the new Queens Hall arts centre in Hexham and the Beaford arts centre in Devon. I have seen, too, at Dundee the way in which the community has improved its environment through artistic activity.

To demonstrate the scale of expansion taking place, there was one day in March when the foundation stone of the Sainsbury wing was laid at the national gallery and simultaneously I performed the ceremony of the completion of an extension to the Imperial War Museum's building. I have opened, for example, the new library at Ross-on-Wye, the Citadel arts centre at St. Helens, jointly funded by a Pilkington Glass charitable body and the local authority, and the entirely new Hertfordshire heritage centre—a voluntary body set up to raise money to help preserve Hertfordshire's heritage. I shall be attending next week the opening of the new Tate building in Liverpool, following last year's opening of the new Clore gallery at the Tate in London.

Abroad I have seen the excellent work of the British Council at, for example, the exhibition of Henry Moore's work in India and the inaugural celebrations of Berlin as European city of culture, to which there will be a large British contribution next year.

As we move towards the last part of the century we see a growing number of people wanting to enjoy and participate in the nation's artistic life. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said recently:

"Life is not whole unless the arts are a part of it".

The role of the Arts Minister is to create the best possible climate in which the arts can flourish—a climate which encourages artistic excellence and the accessibility of all the arts to the greatest number of people. The way I work to achieve those objectives is primarily by plural funding—a partnership in which moneys from the taxpayer and the private sector work together for the benefit of the arts. This not only helps the arts financially, but ensures their greater freedom and integrity. The more self-reliant they are, the healthier will the arts be.

[Mr. Richard Luce]

There are an increasing number of leaders in the arts world who are taking every opportunity to bring about these changes. This is in stark contrast to those last remaining anachronistic figures from the past who cannot accept them and for whom the concept of total dependence on the state was paradise. Their antics are like the last thrashings of the tail of a dying crocodile. That era is over.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I admire the right hon. Gentleman's poetic analysis of those who are in favour of public, social and community support for the arts, but who are the people whom he is describing as being interested only in that kind of support, rather than in encouraging people to attend and, for that matter, pay for the arts? It is nonsensical.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman knows the range of people about whom I am talking.

I announced at Newcastle in July of last year the start of a long-term plan for the funding of the arts based on that principle, and my three-year financial settlement of last November represents an important practical step towards its implementation.

My intention is, first, to keep up the real value of public support for the arts, which is why the settlement gives a 17 per cent. increase over the next three years, and, secondly, to encourage arts bodies to use that public support to stimulate the growth of private funding. My settlement gives the arts bodies a framework in which to do that. It specifies definite figures for each body over not just one year but three years. It provides, in most cases, a relatively generous grant in the first year. This gives institutions elbow room and time to draw up plans to become more self-reliant.

The new policy of incentive funding involves the use of taxpayers' money as a catalyst for the expansion of total income. My main object is to increase the total resources available to the arts; to see the proportion provided by the private sector rise; and to reward, not to penalise, success. To help increase access to the arts, which I regard as important, I have earmarked specific sums of money for the touring plans of the arts institutions, of which I shall say more later.

The artist is increasingly realising the importance of his audience. The box office—in its various forms—is important, not just in financial terms, but because it is one of the artist's tasks to mirror and interpret the concerns of his times. His is not merely a private world. He depends on communication for his raison d'etre. Some of our greatest artists—Sir Walter Scott and Charles Dickens being notable examples—have been those most conscious of the market. The artist's creative sustenance, as well as his financial support, come from his fellow men. It is, therefore, important to remember his dependence on the public. That is why I am promoting and encouraging measures to improve the marketing, management and general professionalism of arts organisations.

The arts marketing scheme launched in December 1986 taught us a lot about the demand for and the variable standards of arts marketing. On 25 February this year I announced new initiatives to remedy some of the problems identified: training—especially for senior management—and a distance learning package capable of reaching the smaller arts bodies. Marketing and management help for the arts will be further strengthened by a project designed to encourage greater business involvement in the arts. I shall shortly be making an announcement about this in collaboration with the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts and the business community.

I shall briefly examine some important developments in the arts. The Arts Council has received a funding increase of 13 per cent. in real terms since 1979—33 per cent. including abolition money. I warmly welcome the way in which the council, led by Sir William Rees-Mogg and the director-general, Luke Rittner, is embracing the new national climate of enterprise and encouraging arts organisations to become part of it. The council always has harsh choices to make, even with increased resources, and has fulfilled this task with imagination and sensitivity.

The council has launched an incentive funding scheme which aims to secure £2 of private money for every £1 from the taxpayer. Over three years this should generate an additional £25 million of private sector money. Applicants must demonstrate a sustainable increase in private support from various sources—above all, the box office. The scheme is intended to assist the small arts organisation as well as the large, the innovative as well as the well-established. The council's touring initiative, for which £1·5 million has been set aside in 1988-89, has already produced increases in touring in all areas of art, opera, classical ballet, theatre, literature and orchestras. I welcome, too, the establishment of Upstart, a joint venture by the Arts Council and the private sector for the promotion of regional touring. All this will help to improve public access to high quality arts.

I should like to draw the House's attention to the positive thinking and efforts of the regional arts associations. They have long been a key factor in encouraging local arts activity, and their role continues to grow. They have recognised the new climate of incentive funding and shown their willingness to work with it. In recent years there has been a substantial shift of resources towards the regions. In this context I welcome the important role that the local authorities are playing, showing an increased concern for partnership and involvement in the arts.

The British film institute continues to do an important job and I welcome its development of the museum of the moving image due to open this autumn on the south bank. This is privately funded—largely through the generosity of Mr. John Paul Getty—and will be self-financing. I take this opportunity to congratulate the retiring director, Mr. Anthony Smith, on his remarkable achievements over the last 10 years. He has been foremost in his promotion of the new incentive policy and made a most significant increase to the private funding of the institute also. I look forward to working with the new director, Mr. Wilf Stevenson.

There is no better illustration of the success of plural and incentive funding than the business sponsorship incentive scheme, which was set up in 1984. In just over three years it has produced an additional £17 million of new money for the arts, helping to increase arts sponsorship overall from £500,000 in the mid-70s to over £30 million today. Every £1 of taxpayers' money put into the scheme raises nearly £2·50 from the private sector. Our evidence suggests that 90 per cent. of the new sponsors maintain their sponsorship into a second year and beyond. It is important to note that 70 per cent. of the scheme's awards go outside London and to all kinds of arts activity.

Expenditure on public libraries, excluding capital, has gone up by 16·5 per cent. in real terms since 1979. The plural funding principle extends to all areas of my responsibility—and that includes public libraries. That is the point of my consultative paper on libraries issued on 23 February. I want to reiterate, in the strongest terms, my commitment to the preservation of the basic free library service for lending and reference. The Green Paper seeks to explore ways in which, while that free service is preserved, public libraries might generate more income, achieve improved value for money and better service to the public; for example, through using more extensively their present powers to charge; through introducing new charged services; through joint ventures with the private sector; and through further contracting out of services.

I have set aside £250,000 per annum for three years for a public library development incentive scheme which will enable libraries to experiment in some of those areas. I announced the first awards on 6 May—for a wide variety of initiatives—to library authorities in Berkshire, Cleveland, Devonshire, Gateshead, Leicester and Sheffield, and to two regional library co-operatives: the London and South Eastern Library Region and the Northern Regional Library System.

The Government are proud to be providing a fitting and long-needed home for the British Library and its unsurpassed collections in the exciting new building under construction at St. Pancras. The project is on target and the building, designed to blend in with its famous neighbour, St. Pancras station, is beginning to take impressive shape. The current stage of construction will be completed in 1993, but the library will start using the building by 1991.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): The Minister says that the building is on time, but will he confirm that it is also well over budget? Will he tell the House how much over budget it is?

Mr. Luce: I shall try to answer that in a moment. With the leave of the House I shall seek to reply to the debate and answer some of the points that are raised. The hon. Gentleman should give me the chance to complete what I want to say, because it is important that we understand correctly the position of that library at the moment, and my objectives.

I have now commissioned a feasibility study for the next stage of the building. The object of the study is to draw up a plan for completing the project in a way that meets the key requirements of the library at the minimum additional cost. That stage should form a fitting extension and conclusion to the building now under construction. When it is occupied—we hope no later than 1996—all the key elements of the British library, including most of its London-based collections, will be housed at St. Pancras, for the first time ever, in a controlled, pollution-free environment. Services for readers and facilities for staff will be radically improved. I know that this new library will become a vital and valued national asset; an important addition to the British heritage. I believe that it will prove to be one of the great cultural achievements of the 20th century.

The national heritage memorial fund, set up in 1980 and given a special injection of £20 million in October 1987, ensures that we preserve the best of our treasures for the nation, to enrich the lives of future generations.

Recent Government initiatives have made the fund even more effective. The important change in acceptance-in-lieu-of-tax arrangements announced in July 1985 allows access to the Contingency Reserve for acceptances up to an average of about £10 million per annum, in addition to the annual £2 million vote provision. In March 1987, the Government announced that they would waive interest charges on the tax due on an object offered in lieu. A new hybrid arrangement allows items with a special price greater than the tax liability to be offered in lieu. This has allowed us to retain Picasso's "Weeping Woman", and Gainsborough's "Captain Wade".

Two reports have recently been published on our national museums and galleries—one by the Museums and Galleries Commission and one by the National Audit Office. The picture that they present is pretty different from the scare stories put about by some commentators. Of course there are problems, such as conservation and pressures on space, but they arise against the background of our national museums thriving and expanding in many areas of activity, engaged in a major programme of extensions and refurbishments, some of which I have already mentioned. The fact is that the Government have an impressive record on funding for museums and galleries —an overall increase of 26·5 per cent. in real terms since 1979 and of over 50 per cent. on building alone.

My policy is to give the trustees the maximum freedom to plan, choose and control their own expanding activities. They therefore received grant-in-aid status in 1986-87, which strengthens their powers and allows them to benefit from their increased earnings. On 1 April 1988 the trustees took direct responsibility for their own buildings, receiving an increase of over 20 per cent. in their building funds this year. It is obviously counter-productive to encourage the collection of treasures unless there are buildings fit to house them. I thank the Property Services Agency for its work over the years for the museums and galleries and for its co-operation in this untying procedure.

Such an expansion of activity naturally brings pressures and the need to decide on priorities, conservation being one of the most important. It is for the institutions themselves to make these decisions. I am doing all that I can to help. That is why when last autumn's settlement gave the museums a 16 per cent. cash increase over the three years—some of that money was for management and marketing improvements.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Minister not worried by the fact that when museum charges are imposed there is an average 30 to 40 per cent. fall-off in attendance? The trustees cannot want to reduce attendance by charging, so why do they charge?

Mr. Luce: The most important thing to remember when considering charges—no doubt there will be plenty of scope this morning to debate the issue—is that in all cases it is for the trustees to decide whether to introduce charges. The Natural History Museum, raised £1·3 million net in additional resources in the first year. These additional resources should be devoted to improving facilities for the public. If there is a link to be made—there has been at the Victoria and Albert museum, which now opens on Fridays thanks to the donations of the public who attend it—it is between an increase in overall resources and an improved service to the public. That is the most important thing to take into account. The benefits of these increased resources are already visible in the quality of the corporate plans of each of the museums and galleries. I am discussing personally each of those corporate plans with the directors of those meseums and galleries.

I have also allocated £270,000 over three years to the Museums and Galleries Commission to help non-national museums strengthen their management and marketing. The commission is today announcing an exciting programme of initiatives for this purpose. This is part of a formidable programme of measures to help institutions to determine priorities and make good use of resources. It includes the major museums training initiative, which I announced in March, and a research study into the management of collections.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Picking up the point made by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), although it is right to say that attendances fall back following the imposition of charges, is it not also true to say that attendances have recovered fairly rapidly? Has my right hon. Friend any statistics to show that?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is right. The evidence suggests that in most cases where charges are introduced attendances drop substantially in the first six months or year, but thereafter they tend to pick up. For example, the National Maritime Museum has had charges for some time now and attendances are picking up, with an increase of 16 per cent. this year over the previous year. There has also been an increase in attendances this April over those for April last year at the Natural History Museum, which has had charges in both years. My hon. Friend has made a valid point.

I welcome the continuing success of our museums, especially the excellence of their scholarly work. Only last week Sir David Wilson at the British museum showed me the recent scholarly output his institution—I found it immensely impressive. My priority is to see the greater accessibility of our treasures to the nation at large. To help achieve this I have set up the travelling exhibitions unit at the Museums and Galleries Commission. I remind the House that the original unit, which was designed to facilitate that kind of activity, was abolished by the Labour Government in the late 1970s. The unit is further supported by the Government indemnity scheme.

I regard it as of primary importance for the magnificent treasures of our national museums and galleries to be seen all over the country and indeed the world. Their record here is already impressive. The British museum, for example, lent out almost 2,500 objects in 1987 and the Victoria and Albert museum 3,000. I will do anything in my power to increase that lending.

There has been a great deal of talk recently on the whole question of disposals from national museums and galleries. I believe that trustees should have some power of disposal, in the interests of good collections management. I therefore intend to provide appropriate powers for those galleries that do not already have them. It is clear from the worries that have been widely expressed on this subject, which I respect, that widely different views are held and different institutions probably have varying needs. I therefore propose to have a consultation exercise to see how we can best make an appropriate and flexible response to those differing needs.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said recently at the Royal Academy:

"You need the whole of the arts to make the cities".

The importance of the arts in city regeneration is highlighted in the Government's document on the inner cities initiative, launched by the Prime Minister on 7 March. Arts developments are part of the overall plan for the cities and need the support of local and private sector interests. There are some excellent examples, such as the national museum of film, photography and television at Bradford and the redevelopment of the dock area at Bristol to include the Arnolfini arts centre, the Watershed multimedia centre and industrial museums. These demonstrate the place of the arts as an integral part of general commercial regeneration.

I am very proud of the fact that I chose Glasgow to be the European cultural city in 1990. The city has already responded in a most positive fashion and we are seeing a great artistic resurgence there.

The imaginative generosity of the private sector has been shown in past years in many outstanding acts of patronage. Notable examples are the donation of the Clore gallery to the Tate by Mrs. Duffield of the Sainsbury wing to the National gallery and the many donations of Mr. John Paul Getty.

Those are wonderful and exceptional demonstrations of the giving spirit which, in earlier times, built our libraries and our galleries and museums and which the economic depression and grasping hand of state Socialism had dampened for a while but which is now being revived by economic success and a policy that allows people of varying standards of wealth to keep more of their own money. That spirit was given further encouragement in this year's radical and exciting Budget, both by its boosting of disposable income and by its doubling of the tax-deductible incentive under the payroll-giving scheme.

That increase in wealth and income means that participation and patronage need no longer be the preserve of the few. More and more people now have the chance to demonstrate their concern for non-material things. That is indeed the new spirit of our times, which will produce a new age of giving and participation in the arts. My ambition is to herald that new age. As the late President Kennedy said:

"The life of the arts, far from being an interruption, a distraction in the life of a nation, is very close to the centre of a nation's purpose, and is a test of the quality of a nation's civilisation."

10.2 am

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I join the Minister in welcoming the debate and recognise that, for the second year running, the Government have provided it in their own time. I thank them for that.

The Minister started by treating the House to a fascinating glimpse of his diary, "The Travels of an Arts Minister", with the Arts Minister as the perfect and compleat arts audience. Hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, having cast covetous eyes at his job, will have seen how enjoyable it is. He appears to be the compleat spectator, but there was a touch of complacency in his remarks. He appeared to be citing his list of visits as an indication of the health of the arts at the moment. The fact that he is present at an arts event does not necessarily mean that the arts are doing well under the Government.

Although he is undoubtedly an assiduous spectator at arts events, his record as an initiator or a player in the arts world is not good.

Listening to the Minister, hon. Members might have thought, if they took all his words at face value, that arts companies, museums, galleries and libraries were positively bathed in the Government's bounty; but the Minister knows from his weekly visits, whether to Newcastle, Glasgow, Liverpool or Bradford, the needs of artists, administrators and members of audiences. They tell him the same story: that their companies are struggling to survive.

I suspect that the Minister also hears questions, such as, "Why do the Government not value the arts? Why do they not promote the arts?" Today the House has an opportunity to consider the arguments and to decide whether, as the Minister says, all is well and flourishing in our culture or whether as we contend, the success of the arts is in spite of the Government and not because of them.

We maintain that the Government's record in the arts and cultural industries is miserable. Every other country in Europe is heavily increasing its investment in the arts, almost every local authority in this country is beginning to invest heavily in the arts and the demand from arts audiences has never been higher, yet for the past nine years the Government have done next to nothing. To be more precise, they have done the minimum that they could. Instead of leading, they have dragged their feet along behind the arts. Today the House has a chance to consider their record as it stands.

Let us consider the Government's funding record. I shall start with the museums of which the Minister is particularly proud. He claims that there have been increases in the general level of funding of our nine national museums. Frankly, the figures do not bear him out. Revenue funding has increased from £33·6 million in 1979 to £61 million in 1987-88, but, after allowing for inflation, that is a cut in real terms of 3·2 per cent. Individual museums have fared even worse. The National Portrait gallery's general funding is down by 15 per cent. and that of the Victoria and Albert museum is down by 9 per cent.

How do we explain the difference between those figures, which are correct Government figures, and the picture given by the Minister? He referred to Professor Brian Morris's important report on national museums issued last week, the first in 60 years. He said that that presented a different picture from the gloomy picture that I presented to the House last week, which he described as nonsense. I do not expect the House to take my word for it, so I shall quote from Professor Morris's report. He identifies a funding gap in our national museums, and says:

> "The funding gap is serious . . . The effects are lamentably to be seen in terms of closed galleries, reduced security, curtailed opening hours or days, backlogs of work, less ability to help schools, inefficient use of staff time and less good service to the public . . . Most serious is the danger of a cumulative, long-term decline in curatorial standards."

That is hardly a glowing picture. It does not tally with the Minister's attempt to put a gloss on his museums policy. Contrary to what the Minister said, it is sadly borne out by the National Audit Office report, which refers to "poor storage conditions" at the Victoria and Albert museum the Tate gallery and the British museum. and states that the problem of conservation is "worsening all the time". Those three museums are > "no longer able to ensure proper stocktaking."

Amazingly, that is in the best funded part of our museum service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) referred to charges. The Government will not accept their responsibility for our national museums. The Minister is correct to say that the Government have put money into the fabric and buildings, but we can see from the National Audit Office's report that the picture is very grim in the crucial areas of purchasing, conservation, stock control, research and curatorial standards. Because the Government will not fund properly, the trustees are having to turn to charges.

The point made by the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) was rather misleading. The figures come down in the first year, as the Minister acknowledges, ususally by about 40 per cent. Dr. Neil Coussons reckons that the figures at the Science museum will also come down by about 40 per cent. when charges are introduced next year. The Minister is right to say that there is a slight upturn, but the upturn for the National Maritime museum last year was only 16 per cent. It has still not reached the level of five years ago, in spite of the fact that national attendance at museums has continued to grow. It is only when we remove museum charges, as York did after several years, that we see the figures rise again.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Surely the fact is that, unfortunately, we are not an arts-conscious nation, despite the fact that the Government give people the opportunity to visit museums. In Italy or France, people are queueing up to visit museums and they pay to do so. There are long queues outside every institution in Venice and every other cultural centre in Italy. Surely the basic problem is that we need a better arts education in the schools.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. Gentleman has unintentionally made my point for me—the Government are not arts-conscious, and after nine years we face the subsequent results and problems. Education is important, and the Government's record has worrying implications for the future of the arts.

The national museums—despite the gloomy picture painted by Professor Morris—are, perversely, the best funded. The whole range of museums in the regions, however, are struggling along on a pittance. The seven English area museum councils receive in total £2·4 million a year. For years, everyone in the museum service has told the Minister that the grant should be doubled, but he is absolutely deaf to their pleas. That gives a hollow ring to the Government's claim of bringing excellence to the regions.

The Minister attempted to bluster his way through when discussing public libraries, but he knows well that the record on public libraries is disastrous. Let me remind him of the facts. Under this Government a net 200 public libraries have closed, book funds are down by 40 per cent. and in some authorities they are down more than that—in Bradford by 61 per cent. and in Bromley by an amazing 90 per cent.

If one visits public libraries one learns about library closures, staff redundancies, a loss of hours and even closure on certain days of the week. No wonder that book loans were down 6 million last year. Why is that? It is not because libraries are not valued by the public; they take out 655 million books every year. Certainly, libraries are valued by local authorities and most of them recognise that public libraries are the most popular community service that they offer. Certainly those libraries are valued by the staff, who have an amazing record of imagination and invention when introducing new ideas and services to the public. They have introduced services for the housebound, outreach communities, arts projects, prisons, ethnic minorities, teenagers and, not least, industry—that is an important service that the Government do not appreciate. The decline in funding for libraries is as a result of Government's hostility to local authority expenditure. To sustain library services in the climate of rate capping and penalties is extremely difficult.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the disposition of a local authority's resources is within its charge? It decides its priorities. My authority has decided to close its public libraries on certain days of the week and has decided to deny those who live in the borough the opportunity to read certain newspapers with which it politically disagrees. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that that is the way in which the authority should run its affairs? If public libraries are the jewel in the crown of local authorities, they should give them more resources and not deflect them, but that is in the authorities' hands.

Mr. Fisher: Obviously we cannot debate rate capping and the Government's attitude to local authority finance. The hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) knows full well that, far from the finances of local authorities being in their own hands, the Government forbid them by law to go to the electorate to raise the money they seek. The Government do not even allow authorities to spend their own capital grant, which is sitting in banks all over the country. The hon. Gentleman's argument is nonsense.

The Minister also mentioned the Green Paper. We need a debate solely devoted to that document because it is extremely important. The Minister did not go into many details and he did not tell us that the Green Paper proposes charges for information, charging for a premium service for new books and competitive tendering for such things as book services for old people's homes, for videos and for branch libraries.

The Green Paper is an extraordinary document. It does not bear much relationship to the realities of the public library service. That is not surprising when one considers that the Minister did not choose to consult the Library Association or public libraries before producing it.

If the Green Paper is implemented—I fear that it may be—it could have a disastrous effect on public libraries. The Library Campaign has given us a glimpse of what public libraries would be like as a result of the Green Paper. A public library might have:

"five W. H. Smith-run branch libraries. The top fifty titles are available . . . on demand—50p per issue, one-week loan, fines payable thereafter. Other books available on the Category B shelves. Three books may be borrowed free at any one time. Additional titles may be borrowed—50p a go. If the book you want isn't there you can reserve it—£2·50 whether it's obtained or not. The Central Library has a lending section . . . It also has a Virgin sound and video library. Top 100 albums—£1 a go. Reference and information services are organised in specialist sections. £1 in the slot to get in. 50p for OAPs.

Enquiries which take up more than 15 minutes of staff time attract a premium charge of 50p . . . On-line facilities are available—£20 per connect minute."

If that is what the Government want our public library services to be like, that is what they will get as a result of the Green Paper. If the Minister listens to the consultations and submissions he will receive from the library authorities he will realise that the Green Paper is sheer nonsense. The idea that people will queue up to make competitive bids to run library services to old people's homes and will make huge sums of money out of such services is absolute nonsense. If the Minister knew anything about the video world, he would be aware that Virgin and others involved with video lending need prime sites in city centres with shop fronts. They will not queue up to make a tender for sites inside public libraries. The Minister has not done his homework on the Green Paper, but we shall have to discuss it on another occasion.

It is important to set the record straight on funding. Last November the Minister announced his new departure for arts funding—three-year funding. I pay tribute to that initiative, and I believe that the arts world perceives it to be an extremely welcome development.

The Minister said that the Arts Council grant has increased by 8·4 per cent. to £150 million and that it will increase by 3 per cent. in the next two years. It does rather take the gloss off three-year funding if one is told that one can plan for three years, but that the grant for the next two years will be below the rate of inflation. That is a cut in real terms. As we said at the time, and contrary to what the Minister has said, such funding does not bring the Arts Council grant back to the level that it was in 1979 in real terms. The grant is £20 million short of what the Arts Council said it needed in 1987-88 to sustain the output and development of the arts.

The Minister also said that £5 million of the £11 million had been earmarked for the new incentive schemes. As a result, the effective money available for the base budgets of regional arts associations and arts companies all over the country has been cut. The Greater London Arts Association has suffered a cash cut of 1·2 per cent. Northern Arts—the Minister has visited that organisation and he knows the superb job that it does—has been given an increase of 0·6 per cent. only—a cut in real terms.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): That is not the Minister's fault.

Mr. Fisher: Of course it is. The Minister earmarked for different uses the money provided. It was not as though the Arts Council was perverse and wanted to cut the allocations to the regional arts associations or to cut the grant to the English National Opera or the Royal Shakespeare Company by giving them only a 2·5 per cent. increase in funding. It also had to cut the allocation to the national theatre and the royal opera house. The Arts Council did not want to do that because it is aware of the valuable work that is performed by the associations and companies. Unfortunately, it has not been given the funding that is needed for the base budgets of those associations and companies.

If the award was as good as the Minister has said, why are arts clients all over the country on standstill budgets or worse? The Government are not funding them straight. This is not a record of success and plenty, but a record of neglect.

The Minister is correct to say that it is not only a question of funding and that much is happening in the arts. Thank heavens it is. We see expansion, ideas, new ventures, and developments. Audiences are increasing, demand is growing and people are participating more. The standards are high, but all those things are not as a result of Government policy. Such developments are taking place in local authorities.

Local authorities are already by far the largest spenders on the arts. Last year they spent £520 million on the arts, compared with the Arts Council's spending of £150 million. Despite Government hostility to local authorities and local authority expenditure, there is development there. Local authorities, whether Sheffield, Newcastle, Birmingham, Glasgow or Bradford, or smaller local authorities, such as Stirling, Cambridge, Swindon, Dundee, Wolverhampton and Scunthorpe, recognise what the Government refuse to recognise—the importance of the arts. Even one or two Tory authorities do. When Cardiff was Tory, it funded the arts world, and Westminster has a good record on its overall level of expenditure.

The arts are bursting with ideas, such as Swindon's community access to media projects, Dundee's superb arts project in the Blackness area and the south Humberside dance project. There is plenty going on despite the Government, not because of them. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) in paying tribute to Glasgow's superb Mayfest. Glaswegians would be amazed by the Minister saying that he is responsible for Glasgow receiving the European cultural city of the year award. It is they who have earned it and they deserve it.

Mr. Buchan: We welcome the thanks for that. Has my hon. Friend seen The Scotsman today, which states:

"Rifkind in £140 million cash clawback."

That includes local authorities in Glasgow, which he has been praising so much over the last few months.

Mr. Fisher: I am ashamed to say that I have not seen The Scotsman today, but that admirably answers the point.

Unlike the Government, local authorities recognise the cultural, social and economic importance of the arts. That is why, unlike the Government, local authorities are increasingly developing arts projects and policies. They recognise not just the public sector and the role of sponsorship, but the voluntary sector. The Minister did not mention the role that the voluntary sector is increasingly playing at community level in arts activities. Not once did he mention the independent commercial sector. Unlike him, local authorities recognise that a good range of good quality bookshops, record shops and cinemas are as much part of our arts life as public sector provision. Yet the Minister did not mention that.

The Government do not have a policy or a vision. I looked through the Minister's speech at the Council of Regional Arts Associations conference in Newcastle last night and it is a deeply ill-judged, unhappy one. [Laughter.] The arts world has certainly perceived it as such, and many were depressed and disgusted by it. [Interruption.] If the Minister is relying on praise from the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) with his views on the arts, he must know that he has got it wrong.

I looked for something positive in the Newcastle speech and the most positive aspect was the Government's commitment to protect our heritage and the status quo and to create conditions later in the year for plural funding. There were many more depressing aspects of Government policy. The Minister criticised "the welfare state mentality" of the arts and "the attitude that the taxpayer owes them a living."

Many in the arts find that deeply insulting and wholly at odds with the facts. The Minister continued that his view of the arts criterion value was

"if it's any good, people will be prepared to pay for it."

Chillingly, he ended by saying:

"You should accept the political and economic climate in which we now live and make the best of it."

It will be a long time before the arts world forgets that thoroughly ill-judged, unhappy speech.

The Minister referred to his incentive funding scheme and reliance on sponsorship. That scheme, for which he takes credit, has been ill thought out. There appears to be a direct clash and contradiction between the role of sponsorship through the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts and the business sponsorship incentive scheme, and the role of the Arts Council as agent for the challenge funding. The arts world will look with great interest at the results of the first year of the scheme. At present, the only activity appears to be the profusion of consultancies that have been spawned by it. This week I talked to a major and responsible arts sponsor in the corporate sector who was clearly wholly confused by the two schemes, had not yet been approached on challenge funding and did not understand what it was about. The Minister has work to do if he is to make that succeed.

We do not have time to go into the whole question of sponsorship, although my hon. Friends may take that up. The political climate is affected by the Government's attitude to education. I fear that the Education Reform Bill will not assist the arts and that the reassurances that the Minister has attempted to give do not in any way address the anxieties of arts educators.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Surely the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Education Reform Bill, for the first time in our history, makes music and art compulsory subjects in the school curriculum. His Government never did that.

Mr. Fisher: Surely the hon. Gentleman is aware that the arts are described in the Bill as visual arts and music. There is a distinct threat to the enormous explosion of drama, dance, film, video and media studies, all of which have taken off in schools and have appealed to young people and teachers. They are all threatened simply because of the Government's limited definition of arts as art and music. That danger is compounded by the fact that the Government have closed more art schools than any other Government and underfund the art schools which exist.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Is the hon. Gentleman following the national education curriculum group, particularly that concerned with English, and has he made submissions to it on the arts, including acting and so on? There is no doubt that that is where such arts activities will come from.

Mr. Fisher: The House respects the hon. Gentleman's opinions and knowledge on education, but I fear for the future of the arts under the Education Reform Bill. It will all depend on how the circulars are worded and how the Bill, which is imprecise, is interpreted.

The Minister referred to the wider political climate in his Newcastle speech. The Government are imposing increased pressure on the media, on broadcasting and, similarly, through that on the freedom of expression and speech. We hear this week that the Broadcasting Standards Council is seeking to preview all foreign programmes. That will send a chill through the arts world and those who care about freedom of speech. There is a similar problem over clause 29 of the Local Government Bill which will undoubtedly lead to a mood of intolerance and oppression and will limit the freedom of expression of gay men and lesbian women—something which the Minister says will not happen, but is already happening through his local authority colleagues.

What I fear most about sponsorship and clause 29 is not so much the overt problems that arise, as the degree of self-censorship which will be engendered in preparing programmes and in not doing work which otherwise should be done. That self-censorship strikes at the heart of a healthy, free-expression arts world. The Minister must address that problem.

All that comes back to the Minister's lack of policy and vision, or indeed his hostility towards local authorities.

Mr. Gerald Bowden rose——

Mr. Fisher: I have given way to the hon. Gentleman already.

The Minister is missing the obvious because he does not allow himself to see it. A retail revolution is changing the centres of all our cities, and our inner cities are being redeveloped. Local authorities understand that the arts are an anchor element in that redevelopment. They are a key element, whether in Newcastle, Birmingham, Manchester or Glasgow, in inner-city regeneration.

The Arts Council has attempted to address the problem of urban renaissance. Seven pages is a rather slight and superficial response to a major opportunity and a major challenge to the arts. I made this point about the arts economy to the Minister during the whole of last year and eventually he commissioned a report. Does he remember it? He commissioned Mr. Paul Collard to report on arts in the inner cities. Mr. Collard produced an excellent report within eight weeks. What happened to the report? Because it paid tribute to local authorities and said that they had a key role to play, the Minister suppressed it—or rather, I think that he caved in to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who said that it would be published over his dead body. [Interruption.] That rumour has yet to be disproved.

The Secretary of State for the Environment said that anything that paid tribute to and recognised the constructive role of local authorities could not be given the Government's stamp of approval. Apart from seeing the constructive and interesting evidence in the report, the Minister may have read the fine print. The report says that the "evidence finally suggests that, as far as is possible, central government funds are . . . being frozen, reduced or abolished. This is frequently against the direct advice of officers in the appropriate ministries.

The Minister should recognise that he did not do a service to free speech, to research or to the arts world by so crudely suppressing the Collard report. Collard identified the crucial importance of the cultural industries—publishing, recording, film, video, broadcasting and fashion design. The Government should be looking at those things and directing to them their energy, investment and training. They should recognise the central relationship between seed funding at local authority, arts association and Arts Council level and the explosion of talent in the cultural industries.

If only the Minister would allow himself to recognise those things, he would see that the international and national implications are enormous. The cultural industries are highly profitable. Last year, publishing had a net trade balance in our favour of £550 million. Records made £450 million. We have 40 per cent. of the world's record industry and the Government are not investing in order to support and sustain that enormous growth.

If only the Government would recognise that, they would not talk about the welfare state mentality. On the contrary, the Treasury should be extremely grateful to the arts and the cultural industries because I suspect that, leaving aside the £5,000 million that is attributable to tourism and our arts and heritage, the cultural industries probably bring in a net benefit of £1,000 million in foreign exchange and trade every year. They do that at a time when our balance of trade in manufactured goods is over £8,000 million in deficit. If the Minister understood the realities of the cultural industries and the economy and was not ideologically prevented from recognising them, he would be able to go to the Chancellor and make a positive case for more investment in the arts. Time and again, the arts pay for themselves by their contributions to the Treasury.

The Government should be redefining our arts, our cultural heritage and our media along the lines that I have described. They should be backing local government and making the arts a statutory responsibility. The Government say that the arts are important, but why is it the only local government service that local authorities do not have to provide? Statutory responsibility for the arts and an element of the rate support grant would do more for an explosion in and a flowering of the arts at local authority level than anything else. But, of course, that does not fit the ideology of the Government.

Such a move would widen access and allow more voices to be heard. The Government should recognise that many people—especially the young, the old, black people, Asians, women and the disabled—are not being heard in our culture. We are missing their testament, their witness to what it is like to live in our society. We are all suffering from that loss, because our culture would be richer if we had that wider range of voices. Because they cannot see that, the Government are missing opportunities in training for the young. If the Minister looks around the country he will see in every major city many young rock bands that do not have research, rehearsal, or recording facilities. There is an opportunity there if only the Minister could bring himself to recognise the economic and cultural importance of the arts.

The cultural industries are vital as a means of expression. As I have said, the Government are limiting the means of expression and free speech in our society. The arts is the one area left in which our values and our society can be not only celebrated but tested. Ideas can be explored, traditions questioned, and dissent expressed. That ability to set a wider public agenda is crucial to the health of the arts, so that they can contribute to and carry forward society's debate and its view and story about itself. Sadly, the Government lack the wit to see and support that. They moan about the welfare state mentality and ask the arts to accept the political and ecnomic climate around them. The Government have created that climate, which is hostile to artists, writers, film makers and painters throughout our society.

We shall not seek to push the debate to a vote, because it is taking place on the Adjournment of the House, but the Government have a miserable and sad record. Unless they recognise what is happening in the arts at local authority level and are prepared to put aside their ideology and back the enormously encouraging developments at local authority level, the prospects are grim.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) spoke about the political and economic climate. It is a climate of burgeoning confidence and enthusiasm that has not left the arts unaffected. He said that the arts are "bursting with ideas". Perhaps it has not occurred to him that that is a reflection of such burgeoning confidence, but that is no surprise.

I remember the impressive series of television programmes "Civilisation" by the late Lord Clark. Those programmes stressed the theme that it is confidence in society as a whole, as in the first Elizabethan and now the later stages of the second Elizabethan age, which is reflected in advances in science, exploration and prosperity, and is also reflected in enthusiasm and confidence in the arts.

One cannot separate the tremendous increase in national prosperity in our country, where living standards have risen by between a quarter and a third in the last eight or nine years, from the great confidence and success in the arts. The theatre in London, including the National theatre, is highly successful. It is quite difficult to get a seat for many plays, and more people go to the theatre than go to football matches.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jessel: I have only just started my speech, but I shall give way to my hon. Friend because he is an original thinker.

Mr. Dicks: Does my hon. Friend agree that the National theatre is packed to the door because it is subsidised by the taxpayer to the tune of £28 per seat? Anyone who wants to watch Wimbledon play at Plough lane has to pay the full economic cost.

Mr. Jessel: I am very much in favour of the National theatre having a subsidy of about £6 million a year, which is equivalent to about 10p or 12p per head of the population, our population being about 55 million. The National theatre is a tremendous national asset. It is a pump primer and a source of inspiration to all the other theatres in Britain. It helps to draw to Britain visitors whose spending of money generates employment elsewhere, in hotels, restaurants and shops. This additional spending and the employment that it generates produce a tax yield to the Government and justify the subsidy. On that point the hon. Member for Stoke on Trent, Central and the Minister were right. The figure of £6 million is about right for the National theatre: it should not be much higher or lower.

In reply to my intervention the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central gave a wholly inadequate answer. He had said that the Government were not art conscious. I said that the art consciousness of the Government was proved by their being the first Government to make art and music compulsory. They are doing this in the Education Reform Bill, which is to come into effect next year. The hon. Gentleman did not make a very impressive point about that.

As for what the hon. Gentleman said about museum charges, if he goes to the Louvre in Paris he will expect to pay to go in, as will everyone else. Why on earth should the burgeoning numbers of foreign visitors not pay to enter our great museums? Why should most other people not pay, too? People expect to pay to go in.

Tomorrow marks an important tercentenary. The poet Alexander Pope was born on 21 May 1688. He lived and died in Twickenham and is buried in St. Mary's church there. We are immensely proud of him. He was without doubt one of England's greatest poets. His crisp command of language and his deep wisdom and insight shine through his poems. So many of Pope's lines have entered our daily language—for example:

"Know then thyself, presume not God to scan,
The proper study of mankind is man";

or:

"To err is human, to forgive, divine";

or:

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;

or:

"Oh grave where is thy sting,
Where death thy victory?;

or:

"Guide, philosopher, and friend";

or;

"I cannot sleep a wink".

A quotation from Pope that is said to be popular among civil servants is:

"For forms of government let fools contest;
What e'er is best administer'd is best".

I bring that to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts, who is also the Minister for the Civil Service.

Some of Pope's lines remind me of right hon. and hon. Members:

"For fools rush in where angels fear to tread",

or:

"A little learning is a dang'rous thing".

One reminds me of the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan):

"Fire in each eye and papers in each hand,
They rave, recite and madden around the land".

Another reminds me of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher):

"Hope springs eternal in the human breast;
Man never Is, but always To be blest".

Yet another reminds me of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks):

"The ruling passion, be it what it will,
The ruling passion conquers reason still".

Hon. Members who shall be nameless are captured in the following lines:

"Destroy his fib or sophistry—in vain!
The creature's at his dirty work again".
"Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And without sneering, teach the rest to sneer".
"Old politicians chew on wisdom past,
And totter on in business to the last".

Those last remind me of one or two of our senior hon. Members.

I am happy to tell the House that Pope's tercentenary is to be commemorated by several events in my constituency. Tomorrow, Pope's birthday, as part of Twickenham week, of which I have the privilege to be president, the Strawberry hill residents' association is to hold a birthday party to be attended by nearly 300 of my constituents. It will be held in Walpole's drawing room at Strawberry hill, with which the House has a special link, because the Palace of Westminster would never have been rebuilt after the fire of 1830 in its present form but for the Gothic rebirth in British architecture that was started by Walpole in the drawing room of that house in Twickenham.

It so happens that at Pope's birthday party tomorrow, my wife, who is a professional actress, will read some of his poetry, and a British Army band from the Royal military school of music at Kneller hall in Twickenham will play. They reside in the house of Sir Godfrey Kneller, the English painter, who was a great friend of Alexander Pope.

Tonight, the Twickenham society is to hold a special event at Orleans house, Twickenham. The Twickenham local history society has brought out a fine commemorative booklet on Pope and mounted a superb tercentenary exhibition of paintings.

Among the paintings on show is Tilleman's celebrated view of Twickenham from the top of Richmond hill. It is a beautiful painting and is of tremendous local historical and topographical interest to my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), who, being a Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts, is precluded by convention from speaking in this debate. Nevertheless, I have been in close consultation with him about this important painting, the scene in which straddles his constituency and mine.

For 10 years, as a member of the Western European Union Parliamentary Assembly I have seen that painting in the British embassy in Paris. I have cast envious eyes on it and wondered how it could be brought to Twickenham so that my constituents could regularly see it. I asked for it four times and always failed because successive ambassadresses at the British embassy in Paris had fallen in love with it. Suddenly, last month, the painting appeared at the opening of the Pope tercentenary exhibition at Orleans house in Twickenham. I am told that the present ambassadress likes modern paintings.

What of the future of this painting? After discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes I approached my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary because I was told that the painting was earmarked for his private office after the tercentenary exhibition was over. My right hon. and learned Friend said that he would write to me, and this week I received his letter:

"You mentioned to me a while ago your interest in Peter Tilleman's "View of Richmond" which has recently been on loan to the Tate and is at present on loan to Orleans House in Twickenham for the Alexander Pope exhibition. Once this is over, the Government Art Collection are kindly arranging for it to be hung in my own office at the FCO, where it will fit in extremely well. This will, however, only be for a year or two, since we will be moving back in due course into our traditional suite of offices overlooking St. James's Park (which are at present being refurbished). I do not imagine that the Tilleman would fit in so well over there, and it will be for the Government Art Collection to decide where it should go thereafter. As you know, pictures from their collection normally hang only in central Government buildings."

I do not know what might be possible, but I ask my right hon. Friend to see whether the painting can be put permanently at, or close to, Twickenham and Richmond. I have the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes. I realise that such paintings normally go into Government buildings, but perhaps Marble hill house, which, following the welcome abolition of the GLC, now belongs to English Heritage, might qualify as a Government building, if English Heritage is willing.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and for telling us all about the birthday party that he will have. I am sure that Pope is relieved that he is safely dead—at least he will not have to attend. Would the hon. Gentleman care to say something about Marble hill house and the magnificent way in which the GLC looked after it?

Mr. Jessel: As a former member of the Greater London council from 1967 to 1973, on which body I happened to be senior to the hon. Gentleman, I am happy to confirm that the Greater London council looked after the building well, and English Heritage is looking after it even better now.

It is important that paintings are seen. The same goes for furniture and other objects. That brings me to the subject of hoarding by certain museums. Britain has attics full of treasures. It cannot be right that large quantities of beautiful and interesting paintings and other art objects and works of art are hidden away in cellars, to be seen only by the odd academic. The whole purpose of a work of art is to be perceived. We should get works of art up and out, preferably on loan to galleries, or possibly, in some cases, to be sold and replaced by other objects which there is room to display.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's decision to publish a consultation paper on the matter. I hope that it will make specific reference to bequests. This is important. If people think that works of art will be sold, they will not bequeath them. It is important that the law should make a clear exception to protect bequests. That apart, the matter should be widely discussed. My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) has an interest in the matter. I hope that if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will refer to it.

Far too much stuff is hidden away and never seen. The British museum has 80 Michaelangelo drawings in drawers. In the 1950s the Victoria and Albert museum took on—perhaps it had to take on—the entire contents of the Indian museum of London. It is all stashed away in a store room in south London and never seen. That is wrong. The stuff should go on show, rather than be wasted and, in some cases, allowed to rot. It should stop. I welcome the decision of my right hon. Friend to initiate discussions on the matter. I hope that they will lead to something.

As my right hon. Friend said, this year, there has been a substantial increase in real terms in arts funding. In absolute figures it is a 17 per cent. increase over three years, starting with 10 per cent. last month. It was the best arts settlement ever. It was widely praised—and deservedly so—by the arts world when it was announced in November. Even Sir Peter Hall, who seldom has anything good to say about arts funding, said, "The Minister is to be thanked. He should be warmly congratulated. It is a very nice surprise." That was the view of anybody who was anybody in the arts world—or at least the top tier of it—about the announcement of the settlement.

The lower tier of the arts world is different. There are some professional whingers and whiners in that tier, whose attitude is so inflexible that they could not adapt to the fact that a substantial improvement had been announced. After a few weeks had gone by they continued whingeing and whining as though nothing had happened. Some of them are so geared to the begging bowl mentality that force of habit leads them to think that Government funding, if not an end in itself, is at least the main yardstick for determining how well the arts are doing. That view is nonsense.

Government funding, which is important and has increased, is a means to an end, to enable the arts to flourish and more people to enjoy them. Much more important for the arts than any Government funding—important though that is—is the general state of the national economy. The splendid economic growth that the country has seen under the present Government means that people have more to spend on leisure and on the arts. As I said by way of illustration, the London theatre is flourishing as at no time since the second world war. The main reasons are that, first, more people can afford to go to the theatre if they want to do so, and, secondly, the productions are good. There is tremendous enthusiasm in the London theatre. Superb productions are being put on, reflecting the new self-confidence of the arts, as part of the self-confidence of the country to which I referred.

Of course, that includes the live arts, which, as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central said, are bursting with ideas. It includes opera, ballet, concerts, and the forthcoming, highly imaginative promenade concert programme at the Royal Albert hall in Kensington. Through July, August and September thousands of young people will be able to enjoy the superb standard of promenade concerts and enrich their lives. If they wish, they can combine their visit to the Royal Albert hall with a visit to the South Kensington museums just down the road.

We should pay no attention to the jeremiahs. All in all, the arts are not doing too badly. They are doing well and are a great credit to the nation.

10.57 am

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Like the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), I am a great admirer of Alexander Pope. If the hon. Gentleman's wife had recited the poems, the whole House would have been enthusiastically entranced. As I listened to the hon. Gentleman, the lines that came most dominantly to my mind were from Pope's poem, the Dunciad:

"Lo, thy dread empire chaos is restored
Light dies before they uncreating word
Thy hand, Great Anarch, lets the curtain fall
And universal darkness buries all."

As I listened to the hon. Gentleman, I was reminded of that climax, although there are some other lines in the Dunciad to which he might refer us. However, I do not wish to spoil matters in that sense.

In an admirable speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) referred to a speech that the Minister for the Arts made just after the election. He used the phrase, "welfare state mentality." I agree with every stricture that my hon. Friend made. The Minister must regret that he ever used such a phrase.

The phrase "welfare state mentality" insults the people who apply it to the arts and those who must take benefits under the welfare state. The phrase was intended to be derogatory in some sense. I cannot understand why any Minister for the Arts should wish to use it. The welfare state has had wonderful effects in sustaining the arts in good times and in bad. Therefore, any derogatory sense that applies to that phrase is wrong.

I looked up the meaning of the word "welfare" to make sure of it. It is a wonderful word, with a wonderful ancestry. It was used by Chaucer. If it can be used by him without a sneer, I should have thought that the Minister for the Arts should be capable of doing the same. The idea that there is anything wrong in public funding of the arts is absurd. There would not be any of our great museums without it. Many of our greatest artistic treasures would never have been protected if it were not for the welfare state and the welfare state mentality that was applied to the arts even before it was applied to the process of trying to protect some of the poorest or least protected of our citizens.

The best excuse for the right hon. Gentleman—this must be the reason, because he is an intelligent man—is that his speech was addressed not to the general public but to the Prime Minister, and he thought that she would appreciate the phrase. Some of his references today to the adoration and eagerness with which the Prime Minister attends to the affairs of the arts were interpolated a little unnecessarily. The best thing that we can say is that that phrase, which I hope will be expunged from the Minister's vocabulary, was intended to appease the Prime Minister rather than to achieve any other result.

The Minister cannot cast aside, in the almost derisory manner that he adopted, the report that he received a few days ago about the state of the museums. He has had a few days longer to read it than we have. I recommend everyone to read not merely a few phrases from it, although some of them are extremely important, but the whole report. Professor Brian Morris recommends that, because he says at the beginning—this has wrongly been criticised by some people in the arts world—that he is dealing with the ideas and principles involved, and has not made his report solely to make a series of recommendations at the end. He should not be criticised on that account, because it is an argument. It is utterly absurd for the Minister to think that it is an argument that comes down in any sense on the side of the Government. Either he has not attempted to read it properly, or he is seeking to mislead us—and I do not think that he would do the latter.

Some of the passages in the report have already been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central and by the newspapers, but there are many other important passages that have not been quoted. For example, page 10 begins the discussion on public funding. It says:

"Until the present decade, no one doubted that the Government accepted full financial responsibility for the national museums, whether they were run by an Education Department or by Trustees."

The report deals with exact amounts. I know how careful the Government are in producing statistics to prove how much they have spent since 1979. I often question many of these figures, because when one goes into them a little more carefully, they are suspect. I do not say that that applies especially to the office of Arts and Libraries, but it applies to it as well as to most other Government Departments. I say that as one who has, as head of his college, Wadham, the greatest statistician in the country. He often questions the way in which the Government produce their statistics.

Page 10 continues:

"Moreover, the increases in funding have since 1981-82 consistently fallen below trends in the levels of civil service pay settlements (which dictate the pay of national museum staff, but being negotiated between Government and civil service staff associations, are outside the museums' control). The funding gap is clearly shown in the chart opposite".

I hope that everyone who thinks that the Government have been sustaining the funding of the museums properly will look at that chart. It proves the opposite. That is why the commission, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central has said, is the first commission for 20 years to go into these matters so thoroughly, has produced a chart that proves that the Government have not been sustaining the funding of museums in the way that they should.

On page 12 we read:

"This funding gap is serious, and has had adverse consequences in all the national museums, which have had to leave unfilled varying numbers of posts in the complements (though these were determined after Government staff inspections)."

This next paragraph has often been quoted, but I put it in the context of my previous quotation. It says:

"The effects are lamentably to be seen in terms of closed galleries, reduced security"—

this from the Government of great security—

"curtailed opening hours or days (as at the V & A until recently"——

Mr. Hanley: Until recently.

Mr. Foot: Yes, "until recently". I am reading a recent report. It continues:

"backlogs of work (eg on conservation and the production of catalogues and other scholarly publications), less ability to help schools (especially now, with GCSE), inefficient use of staff time (word processors can hardly be afforded), and less good service to the public (for example, the National Art Library at the V & A is still closed one day a week, and sorely underfunded)."

The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) implied that these matters have been remedied. There may have been remedies in one or two parts of that indictment, but I suggest that the Minister reads through the whole of it carefully and tells us exactly what is the truth. The report was published only a few days ago. If the Government have any criticisms of it, they had better produce their figures to repudiate it. Then we shall see whether Professor Morris and those who signed the report wish to agree with what the Government say.

Mr. Luce: One must see this in perspective. I am not saying that the report praises everything that the Government are doing, and I did not say that before. It is a thoroughly objective and good report, and it is valuable for the museums as well. If the right hon. Gentleman is taking selected bits out of it, he should be a little more balanced. In its conclusions, on page 36, the report says:

"Government funding of the national museums has increased significantly over the last ten years, as their activities have grown."

He ought to acknowledge that.

Mr. Foot: I acknowledge that. As I said, the best way to read the report is to read all of it. Those who do so will come to the same conclusions as Professor Morris. He has made a statement in that document, which is one of the most valuable that could be produced on the real working of our museums, which confirms almost everything that has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central and by our previous spokesman on the arts, my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan). What they have been saying for years is confirmed by the report.

If the Minister is questioning the conclusion of the report, perhaps we should see what Professor Morris said after the report came out, when some people in the arts world were criticising it not because it was too censorious, but because it was not sufficiently severe in its criticisms of the Government or sufficiently direct in demanding the new things that should be done. Let us see what Professor Morris has to say about this, as the Minister wishes all these matters to be taken into account. The day after the report was published, Professor Morris, in an interview in The Independent, said:

"The document, a two-edged sword, is radically different from any other. Instead of a list of recommendations, we addressed ourselves to ideas and principles underlying the whole museum scene."

He then set out what could be the remedies. The article continued:

"The report covers 19 museums throughout the country, which attract nearly 26 million visitors annually, and receive Government funding totalling £178 million."

The Minister has invited us to make sure that we weigh every word from Professor Morris. The article goes on:

"Professor Morris said he wanted to see the annual grant raised to £200 million. 'That would go almost all the way to solving the immediate problems'."

Why cannot we have a yes to that proposition? Will the Government give a guarantee that in a few weeks they will produce new propositions for meeting the demands or requests, whatever we care to call them, that have been made by such a high-powered commission? The report highlights elementary needs and the action that must be taken to ensure that first requirements are met.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will accept that Professor Morris's report does not cover all the museums. Five university museums, including the Fitzwilliam in Cambridge, are excluded. Those five, thanks to antediluvian procedures, are maintained by the University Grants Committee. Unfortunately, they are right at the end of the queue of priorities.

Mr. Foot: I am glad to accept the hon. Gentleman's correction, which surely fortifies my case.

Some months ago I went to the Belfast museum. It is a wonderful institution that is tended, as most museums are, by a staff with a passionate concern to make their museum the very best possible. It is one of the institutions in that part of the United Kingdom, along with the universities and others, which bridges the gap between north and south. There is a fine interchange between different forms of culture. Given the history of the Irish situation, surely the Government should be eager to ensure that there are no closures in Belfast. However, closures are taking place. Professor Morris has drawn attention to the lamentable failure to provide proper facilities for the hard-working and devoted staffs of many museums, and I am sure that that applies to some of the museums to which the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) referred. I am sorry that I gave the impression that all the museums are covered in the report.

I hope that the Government will adopt a fresh approach and that we shall not hear again anything like the response that the Minister has so far produced. I hope that he will be eager to erase from our memory any recollection of the answer that he gave on this subject a few minutes ago. Perhaps that response can be attributed to the fact that he, like the rest of us, has had only a few days in which to read the report. It cannot be said that a proper job is being done for our museums when about £25 million is required immediately, according to Professor Morris and others who produced the report, to deal with current needs.

I turn to another subject that may not come directly within the establishment of the Minister's Department. Of course, I cannot blame him for that. None the less, anyone who considers the issue that I am about to raise will agree that the Minister should have responsibility for dealing with it.

The Commission for Learning has been referred to in the House on several occasions. I referred to it in a debate on the Commonwealth of Learning, which is a new name for the Open university for the Commonwealth. I raised the matter during the debate on the Queen's Speech in the knowledge that the Foreign Office had responsibility for such matters. As the Foreign Office has primary responsibility, the Minister may claim that it is not his business, but I say that he should make it his business. Advantage must be taken of the opportunity that is before us. A claim must be pitched at the highest possible level. I do not have the slightest doubt that 10 or 15 years hence the idea of the Commonwealth of Learning—it may have a new name, and the Commonwealth of Learning is itself a new name for what was previously discussed as an extension of the Open university to embrace the Commonwealth—will be recognised as one of the best ever to occur to us. It is a great and simple idea that will be of obvious benefit to the entire nation. Those who look back 10 or 15 years hence will wonder why it was not grasped immediately.

However miserable, backward and reactionary the present Government may be in dealing with the Commonwealth of Learning, the idea is so good that it will overwhelm all the Government's bureaucratic obstacles and anything worse that they produce to block its progress. It is a tremendous idea. In five or 10 years, or whenever, there will be a worldwide Commonwealth university, and the language in which that university will conduct its business will be predominantly English. It will be one of the ways in which the English language will continue its beneficent conquest. Over the next 10 or 15 years English will spread even further and the conquest will be even greater.

English will not be the sole language of the university because there are other wonderful languages to be associated with it. However, as the university is a Commonwealth idea and as it is backed primarily by the Commonwealth, it will be a university in which English is spoken. It will spread throughout the world on a scale never previously conceived. It will be the means by which the highest education will spread into many countries. I do not see how anyone who has the idea put before him can fail to recognise that it is a splendid idea and opportunity for Britain in every possible way. Even if we take the lowest possible estimates of the Prime Minister and the right hon. Lady's antagonism to the welfare state mentality, the proposed university offers huge commercial advantages over the next 10 or 20 years. I do not support the concept on that basis, however, because I do not believe that any great academic institution should be launched with that as its background.

In this context, we are way ahead of all other countries because a previous Government launched the Open university. Its introduction was not the result of a strict commercial calculation of what it would pay in five or 10 years' time. It was decided that a new instrument would be established with the purpose of spreading university education. It was decided also that from the very start the degrees that would be given by the Open university would be of the highest calibre. It was determined that there would be no second or third-rate standards. Instead, the highest standards were set from the outset. That was chiefly the result of Jenny Lee's insistence, she being the first Minister with responsibility for the arts. She insisted on the highest possible standards from the beginning, and these have have been sustained.

The Government have made several mistakes in restricting the entry that could take place into the Open university. Only comparatively limited extra funding is required to make greater entry possible. Notwithstanding some criticisms, the idea is so wonderful that no Government could stand in its way.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): In some of the remotest communities in Scotland—for example, the Western and Northern Isles—the Open university offers perhaps the only window of opportunity to arts education. The opportunity has been taken up by many citizens, relatively speaking, in these remote communities.

Mr. Foot: I am grateful for that intervention. It shows how far beyond the original idea the Open university has carried its influence and power. It is the greatest university in the country. Its establishment is comparable with that of the National Health Service. Such was the imaginative effect of a great idea that it has been carried far beyond what was originally thought possible.

We now have the chance to achieve the same thing on a Commonwealth scale. We have the expert knowledge of the Briggs report. Lord Briggs, who helped to set up the Open university, is one of the best advisers on how we should go ahead on a Commonwealth basis. India, Canada and other Commonwealth countries are eager to press ahead with the idea and are giving it all possible backing. The other day, Brunei contributed a further £3 million. The British Government, however, have not been prepared to give direct backing and funding to the idea. I know that there is a committee looking into the matter, but that is in no way sufficient. The idea requires direct backing and funding rather than including it within the budget of a particular Department. Anyone who has been in Government knows that every Department argues for its own budget and does not wish to give up any funds for a new venture. All claim that their entire budget is needed to deal with their present responsibilities. No doubt the Minister for the Arts makes the same claim, as do the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of Education and Science and all the rest. But they are all wrong, and they should be overridden by a Government with the sense to give £20 million or £30 million per year to give this new idea a flying start. That is not a huge amount to spend, and it would mean that the Commonwealth of Learning would be established in a very few years. The Minister for the Arts should be more eager than anyone else to push the project ahead.

When I raised the matter in the debate on the Queen's Speech I received no answer from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, nor in correspondence with the Department since then. The subject was raised at the Commonwealth conference in Vancouver, and no other country sought to block it. What is required is the imagination to find the money now. The project will go ahead anyway, but it should be welcomed and pushed forward with the maximum speed.

Often we are the last people to appreciate the huge advantages that we have in this country and which no other country has to the same degree. If the Russians had the chance to establish a Commonwealth of Learning on a worldwide basis, I suspect that they would have no difficulty finding the money. I will give an illustration. In previous arts debates I have been persuaded to refer to Byron, but I thought that it would be invidious to do so today in case I was accused of advertising.

Mr. Buchan: I have already bought my right hon. Friend's book.

Mr. Foot: For the benefit of those who have not bought it, I will enter it in the Register as soon as possible.

To continue my illustration of the way in which we fail to use the wonderful gifts that we have, a couple of days ago I received a post card from Geoffrey Goodman—a well-known industrial correspondent and journalist and an old friend of mine—who is currently in Moscow. He said that he could not resist sending me a card with a Byron stamp on it. It is a very fine stamp. The Russians are very good at producing stamps and they clearly had no qualms about producing a Byron stamp in the bicentenary year of Byron's birth. When the Byron Society attempted to persuade the British Post Office to do the same, four different approaches were made under different heads. I do not blame any particular individual, but on each occasion the door was slammed with the same lack of knowledge and ill grace. Either they had never heard of Byron or they had heard stories about his misdemeanours. Perhaps they thought that they would be had up under clause 29 of the Local Government Bill if they put his picture on a stamp. I do not know who is the most puritanical member of the Government, but perhaps the Post Office feared that it would have a certain Minister from the Department of the Environment on its heels if it dared to produce such a stamp. As a result, every approach was turned down and we have to rely on Moscow.

That is a common occurrence and it has certainly happened to Byron before. His poem "Darkness"—I shall not recite it, even if provoked—is one of the greatest poems that he ever wrote. In it he foresaw what could be a world nuclear catastrophe before nuclear weapons were even invented. That poem was translated into Russian and published five times when it had scarcely appeared once here. In the five or six years after Byron's death his poems were read all over the Continent while in this country his work was still being suppressed and derided by the Minister's predecessors. There were no Ministers for the Arts or Broadcasting Standards Council censors in the 19th century, but suppression was carried out by even more surreptitious and scandalous means. For generations the truth about Byron was suppressed, but he has won through in the end. I hope that the Minister will take that into account.

In the English language we have a treasure beyond counting. Modern communications and technology have given us the means to spread that language throughout the world in a way that will not offend other people but will bring more people to understand what it is about. The Minister should be pressing for the establishment of the Commonwealth of learning with the utmost speed and imagination.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I speak with perhaps the only voice of opposition in this cosy little get-together of arts lovers on both sides of the House. The two Opposition spokesmen are both from middle-class backgrounds and the leading spokesman had a public school education, so they could not do other than identify with the pro-arts lobby. The Labour party wants more money for the arts, but the Government say that they have had enough.

Why are we having this discussion? It is because the arts lobby is one of the most effective lobbies in the country. That is bound to be so, because its supporters dominate most of the media. Any evening chat show is bound to include someone from the arts lobby telling us how important it is. But who are the beneficiaries? Certainly the professionals benefit. We all know how Peter Hall has benefited from the taxpayers' money given to the organisations in which he has been involved. He has made a million by manipulating—I do not say abusing—public funds, so he is bound to favour an increase in funding. Others who benefit are ballet and opera lovers—the middle classes, most of whom do not need a penny in subsidy if the truth were known.

The grant to the arts in general is to rise by 22 per cent. to £440 million guaranteed income over three years. The budget for which my right hon. Friend the Minister is responsible is to rise by 17 per cent. from £336 million last year to £394 million in 1991. My right hon. Friend stated in his press release:

"to get this new approach off to a good start"—— that is, the three-year funding—

"I am providing a substantial increase in funding in the first year."

That will be 10 per cent. Yet our old-age pensioners must get by with a 4 per cent. increase and we are removing housing benefit from some people and saying, "You cannot have this £7·50 because the pension that your husband left you when he died is too much." We tell those people that they must struggle because the public purse demands it, but without a second thought we give away £440 million to a group of people who could easily pay for their own entertainment and facilities.

Let us examine the Arts Council—that trendy Leftie organisation that exists on public funds. This year, its grant will increase by 10 per cent. from £138 million to £150 million, and it will increase again to £160 million by 1990. Two people going to see a ballet or opera are subsidised to the tune of £56, yet we pay an unemployed man and his wife less than £50 a week. There is something wrong with a society that subsidises people to visit the theatre but gives an unemployed man and his wife less on which to survive in a week. Labour Members demand more money for the arts. What sort of Socialists are they? They do not seem to be too worried about the incomes of unemployed people and are demanding more money for people who do not need it.

Why do we provide those subsidies? We are told that the arts are part of our heritage. I have said before, and it bears repeating, that I do not believe that an overweight Italian singing in his own language is part of my heritage. It is not something that my family knows or understands. Am I supposed to believe that a man prancing about at the Royal ballet in a pair of tights and a box is part of my heritage? I do not believe that, and most of the ordinary people in Britain—I represent more ordinary people on this issue than do Labour Members—laugh at the proposition that the arts reflect our heritage.

Who says that the arts must be preserved? Of course, the people who perform in the arts say so. If the arts are so good, why will people not go unless they are subsidised? We are told how wonderful and excellent it all is, that it is part of our background and that we must care for it in the future—but only if someone will pay a third or half of the cost.

Wimbledon football club, which won the cup last week, must survive by attracting enough supporters who pay the economic cost to keep the club running and pay the players' wages. No one says, "The working class like football and see it as an artistic form of entertainment, so we shall subsidise it to the tune of £28 per person."

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman's muscular approach to the arts is well known, but he must accept that some Labour Members believe that football should attract public support. The supporters of Wimbledon do not pay the full economic cost. Much of football benefits from the amount of money that the directors and chairmen of the clubs put into it.

Mr. Dicks: I could not agree more with the hon. Gentleman. My argument is that either we subsidise every activity or we subsidise none. The hon. Gentleman is right about directors, but they choose to spend their money in that way. They do not lobby for someone else to use public taxes to subsidise their entertainment.

What is so special about the arts that makes modern professional football so ordinary? Why does my daughter have to pay the full cost to see a pop concert—perhaps £15 or £20—while someone else's daughter who wants to see a ballet is subsidised? Who is to say that the judgment of my kids about what is art, or what is pleasurable and enjoyable, is wrong while someone who wants to go out in an evening gown with a man in a bow tie should be subsidised? Most people do not understand it and want to end it. Only those who benefit from the subsidies want them to continue.

We must think seriously about the matter. It is not fair to sit here cosily agreeing that there should be subsidies and disagreeing only about the amount. People outside this place wonder exactly what is going on.

The cost of all the subsidies to the arts, including museums, is about £420 million. The saving on housing benefit will be exactly the same. Some elderly and retired people may suffer because of the Government's move on housing benefit. How can we tell them, "We shall make you lose £450 million and we will use the money to subsidise people who wish to go to the theatre"?

Mr. Jessel: Does not my hon. Friend believe it important that our arts and heritage attract visitors to Britain whose spending generates employment and tax yield to the Government? They come here to see our museums, art galleries, heritage, royal things and music. They certainly do not come here for our weather or to watch football.

Mr. Dicks: If they can afford to fly economy or club class on Boeing 747s from the United States, they can afford to pay the full economic cost of going to the ballet or the opera. They could pay to visit our museums.

My right hon. Friend the Minister spoke earlier about the number of paintings and drawings that are left lying in drawers in museums. Why not take them out and sell them? The income could be used for other good public causes. How can we justify covering up paintings or putting them away in drawers for years, and probably paying someone a hefty salary to catalogue them, when we also say that we need more public expenditure? I do not understand why we cannot take the covers off those paintings and auction them to the highest bidder. If a private collector wants to buy them, so much the better. At least we shall get some income from them.

The three-year expenditure is an interesting concept. As a former local authority member, I know that for years local authorities have been saying that the system of local government finance is wrong. Authorities do not know until December or January how much they will have to spend in the next financial year. We are told that it must be done that way because the Government cannot be sure of their income until the last minute. But there is an exception—the arts. The Government have decided to guarantee the income of this wonderful group of people for the next three years, with a 10 per cent. increase on 1 April this year and a 7 per cent. increase next year.

I wrote to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about this, and the Minister's reply said that the Government are doing it because they think that it is the right thing to do and because the arts should be confident about their future funding. We would all like to have confidence and certainty about our future funding. Would it not be nice if we could say to old-age pensioners, "We will give you a guaranteed 10 per cent. increase this year and 7 per cent. next year, and for the next three years you need not worry where the next penny is coming from"? Would it not be nice if we could say to local authorities, "We guarantee your income for the next three years. It will not be reviewed, and you will know exactly where you are going"? Would it not be nice if all areas of the public sector were treated in that way?

What am I told when I query all this? "Of course, you are a philistine and a bit of an eccentric, but we will tell you why. It is only a small amount of money, and we can work this out over three years to keep them happy." I do not accept that. We should respect the arts lobby because of its effectiveness, but it is about time that we burst the bubble and people said, "Hang on. I am Joe Bloggs from down the road. I have nothing to do with Pope or the man from Twickenham." I represent ordinary people who would not know a poem if they read one. Perhaps they even read The Sun, but at least they are ordinary people struggling to make a living and not looking for subsidies.

Seeing an opera or ballet is probably the last thing they want to do. But they enjoy watching professional football, they enjoy the commercial theatre and they enjoy the cinema. Some of my constituents enjoy bingo. What about subsidising bingo for ordinary people? It is an art form for them in the same way that watching and listening to a fat Italian singing in his own language, dressed like a woman, is an art form. As far as I am concerned, there is no difference.

I cannot sit here and simply listen to a cosy little get-together by the two Front Benches. The Opposition Front Bench spokesmen are perfect representatives of the middle classes. The people that they speak to in different neighbourhoods probably cannot understand them because they sound like BBC newsreaders. Those are the people that the Labour party put forward to advocate more spending on the arts. It would do that, because not many Socialists could speak like they do, or even believe in that sort of thing. Just look at them, Mr. Deputy Speaker: if they are the Labour party spokesmen on the arts, God help us all.

My right hon. Friend the Minister differs slightly from me in his approach to the arts. However, to be fair to him, he listens, and he grins. It is a good sign that the Minister can laugh. I am sure that he is laughing at me, not at himself. Nevertheless, we have to bring home the message that the arts lobby cannot get away with it all the time. The Prime Minister stood on the stage last year and said that the Government will keep subsidising the ballet—or it could have been the opera. She may want that, but ordinary people are sick and tired of those who can well afford to pay the full going rate for the theatre and the ballet getting away with being subsidised by the rest of us, when groups in our society are losing income and getting no guarantee as to where tomorrow's money, or even tomorrow's meal, will come from.

I ask my right hon. Friend to think carefully. The sooner that he can stand at the Dispatch Box, and shout to the rooftops not that he is reducing expenditure for the arts but that he is doing away with it altogether, the better it will be for many ordinary people and for this odd philistine on the Back Bench.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) compared the cuts in housing benefit made by his Government with the amount of money spent on the arts. He asked how we, as Socialists, could explain that. I can tell him how we would deal with that. We would take back the £2,000 million that was given to the richest 5 per cent. in that shameful Budget two months ago and provide money for the arts and money for those poor people in my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington who have had money stolen from them by the Government on behalf of the rich. If he were attacking them, as he should be, he would find us on his side. He complained about subsidies for the theatre and the opera, but that is not the whole of art. His daughters go to pop concerts. Music is part of art.

Glasgow city understands the importance of art. That is why the corporation is spending money to bring back some heart, some hope and some joy to people who have been devastated by the Government in terms of job losses. In my city of Paisley the cotton mills which 10 or 12 years ago employed 20,000 workers now employ none. I see the Linwood car factory which a few years ago had 8,000 workers and now has none. I look at Babcocks and Wilcox, the industrial factory just outside my constituency, which once employed 7,000 workers and now employs only 1,000. That devastation has been caused by the Government's fiscal policy. It has been caused by their giving £2,000 million to the richest, instead of giving it back to the poorer people. If the hon. Gentleman were to speak about that, as Byron would have done, we might support him. The hon. Gentleman was making a false contradiction. There is no contradiction between public money for music, theatre and the arts, and a proportion of public money for the poor and the old in society.

That is why I approve of the city of Paisley spending money on saving an old church. During the past two or three years an early 18th century church has been converted from desolation into an arts centre that is used not only by opera lovers but by people who want to play pop, rock and folk music. Does the hon. Gentleman think that Cavallo invented opera out of his forehead, that he woke up one day in the early 17th century and said, "I shall invent opera."? He did not. He drew it from the poorest of the poor, the strolling players with their small plays and their music, which he brought into the courts. The hon. Gentleman at least is at one with us in that the music stolen from the people has to be brought back to the people. He is quite right in saying that it should not be only for those who have subsidised seats and still pay £50. That is why we are in favour of giving money to the arts.

That is why the city of Glasgow, despite its devastation by the Government, is putting money into the arts and making it a city of culture. I could show the hon. Gentleman the People's palace, which reflects the lives and history of the people of Glasgow. That is why we are concerned about money for the arts. Glasgow has paid for the six magnificent panels by Ken Curry in the People's palace which represent the history of the working people in Glasgow whose lives have been so devastated by this Government.

I can give the hon. Gentleman another reason why we are in favour of providing money for the arts. At one time, the arts were an alternative form of communication. If people could not afford a printing press, at least they could sing, they could speak, they could put out their own leaflets. They cannot do that now. The control over the ordinary methods of communication in this country has crept into the hands of three people. The entire popular press is controlled by Maxwell, Murdoch and Stevens. The arts are no longer an alternative form of communication. The arts are virtually the only form of alternative communication that is not in the hands of the powerful and the rich.

That is why we are worried about threats to the future of companies such as 7:84. That company does not play to those whom the hon. Gentleman was attacking. It plays social theatre. It is under attack. I expect that my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) will say more about that. I shall not go into detail, but I have a letter from a name that will strike some chords.

Mr. Dicks: May I explain to the hon. Gentleman that I have to leave now and that I do not mean to be disrespectful to him in any way.

Mr. Buchan: We are delighted. We welcome the hon. Gentleman's departure. I hope that he will take some advice from his daughters.

I have a letter about 7:84 and its difficulties, which Joan Littlewood sent to the Scottish Arts Council. It says:

"Dear Sir, What is the matter with 7:84 now? Too good? Not good enough? Or just not orthodox?

I passed my working life in the United Kingdom to the accompaniment of noises from a long line of Arts Council directors telling me that my work wouldn't do for them.

The truth being that they would have liked to see Theatre Workshop in hell since it challenged all the standards they held high. I know enough of John McGrath's work to suspect that 7:84 is in the same boat.

One expects mediocrity from your London Branch."—

That is the Arts Council headed by Rees Mogg—

"I would have been happy to know that Scotland had produced something better by now.

Yours faithfully, Joan Littlewood."

I was sent a copy of that letter because I was one of the people who, 30 years ago, saved Theatre Workshop and established it in the Theatre Royal in east London. We now see companies—of which 7:84 is an offshoot—under the same kind of attack.

As the Scottish Arts Council is only a sub-committee of the Arts Council, I ask the Minister to invite his colleagues north of the border to think again. The chairman of the Scottish Arts Council, Mr. Alan Peacock, is a friend of mine, but I regret to say that he is a free market thinker. Mr. Peacock should reverse what he considers doing about 7:84 and put it back on to proper revenue funding, instead of project funding.

I have been sidetracked by the eloquence of the Philistine hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington. At least he did not quote Pope, which is some advantage.

I want to look briefly at sponsorship. We are told that there will be an 8·4 per cent. increase this year for the arts, and 3 per cent. in each of the next two years. Effectively, there will be a cut in the following two years. Presumably the arts are being given a little pump-priming this year while they look for sponsorship to help them to survive. This increase of 8·4 per cent. equals just over £11 million. A sum of £5 million is already earmarked for the new sponsorship scheme, which is worrying. It will only leave 3 to 4 per cent. to support the remainder of the schemes. If over half this money is for sponsorship, it will go to people only if private support is coming forward. The sinister aspect of this is that the intentions of the artistic directors of the theatre companies, of the writers, or whoever it may be, will be pushed in the direction of schemes which will secure the organisation's private funding. I have seen this happening in my own family. My brother writes plays for the amateur theatre, and over the years he has been reducing the number of actors involved because of the cost. He now writes plays for, say three actors and two actresses. There is a distortion of what can be done.

For a theatre company or any arts company to get funds, it must have proven artistic merit and the ability to sustain that artistic excellence. That should always be the criterion for any funding, public or private. Secondly, it must give evidence that the money will have a demonstrable impact upon the applicant's artistic managerial and financial performance. That also should always be a criterion for support, whether public or private. The new criterion is the third one. This says that it must show evidence that the applicant has the ability to use the money to increase his permanent source of funds from the private sector, and the ability to carry through long-term planning. Therefore, this hailed sponsorship scheme is designed to promote the development of the private sector. It has nothing to do with the quality of the company, but everything to do with its ability to develop and secure the private sector. That is dangerous, because the private sector will set the agenda.

The scheme is even more reactionary than the one in America. The tendency of state funding in America is to earmark those organisations for which it encourages private funding to come forward. In other words, they list those organisations for which they recommend private funding, and which funding they will match if necessary, although it does not match it by very much.

The Government do the opposite. The private sector determines which organisations, which plays and which projects should be supported, and public money must then follow. In other words, the community, and the poor man that the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington spoke about, have to follow with their public money to fund those organisations that have been determined by the rich and commercial interests as appropriate for sponsorship. This cannot be right. That process does not work for the organisations that need funding.

The Government say that they want to encourage the private sector and the box office, but the box office in certain theatres has been doing well. I take for an example the Citizens theatre. There has been a 117 per cent. increase at the box office, which must cover every possible criterion that the Minister demands. However, it has gained only 0·8 per cent. of sponsorship. The Bush theatre has had an increase at the box office of 44 per cent., but has no sponsorship. Another example is the Hammersmith Lyric, which has increased its box office receipts by 117 per cent. but has seen an increase in its sponsorship of only 1·1 per cent.

One of the three theatres to which I am closest is the Theatre Royal at Stratford. Philip Hedley informed the National Campaign for the Arts that the Theatre Royal, which was started by Joan Littlewood in one of the poorest boroughs in the country, had abandoned the search for sponsorship in 1984, having paid a fund raiser for three years without managing even to raise his salary. Even the fact that it had won The Daily Telegraph's first annual award for the best use of sponsorship money did not seem an attraction. Therefore, sponsorship is dangerous, first because it puts the development of theatre in the hands of the private sector and, secondly, because where it should work, it does not.

I was subverted in my opening remarks by the two astonishing speeches about Pope and the other man. I was going to comment on how astonishing it is that when we discuss the arts we ignore the 90-odd per cent. of the arts with which we should be concerned. The main area of artistic activity in this country is broadcasting—in radio and television—as well as popular theatre and pop concerts. However, all the interest has been hinged on the tiny sector that is supported by the Arts Council. It is nevertheless, a crucially important sector, for the reasons that I have given and because the arts are now the only alternative form of communication.

[Mr. Buchan]

We must look at what is happening in that general area of communication. In one sense I do not distinguish between fact and fiction in communication. If I make a speech on unemployment and try to say that unemployment is a bad thing, that is no different from "The Boys from the Black Stuff", which is a play deploying the theme that unemployment is a bad thing. The connection between the two is communication. However, what we are seeing now is highly dangerous. A whole series of actions are putting at risk freedom of communication and freedom of expression. Just as the shades are going up in the Soviet Union with glasnost, so they are coming down here in several sinister ways.

It is worth listing what is happening, because, just as the private sector affects the development of the arts, of theatre and expression, so other things are affecting other aspects of communication. First, there is commercial monopoly and the fact that 80 per cent. of the popular newspapers in this country are controlled by three people. Secondly, at least two of those three people, joined by Berlusconi in Europe, are now buying, or have bought, into satellite broadcasting. Satellite broadcasting—indeed, all broadcasting—is moving towards deregulation in this country. The monopoly of the press will be repeated by monopoly in satellites because deregulation—removing controls in broadcasting—does not give freedom for all to broadcast. It gives to a few rich people freedom to broadcast. I cannot buy a satellite because I cannot afford it, but Maxwell and Murdoch can.

This country's great history of a free press has degenerated into monopoly control by three people, and the same will happen to the future of broadcasting under the Government's plans. Alongside the handing over of television to further commercial monopoly by deregulation in the Peacock report, and through the Green Paper on radio, we are seeing more and more direct intervention by the Government, prodded incidentally by Rees-Mogg, for example, on "Real Lives." The man who was put in to defend standards has initiated attacks on and interventions into broadcasting. That is why we see his appointment this week as not only wrong, but sinister.

As well as "Real Lives", there was Zircon and the attacks by the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) on the BBC and Kate Adie—the terrifying of the broadcaster and the creation of self-censorship in broadcasting. Broadcasters do not save themselves by self-censorship. They censored themselves over Zircon, but in the following week the police invaded the BBC in Scotland for those tapes. Self-censorship merely lowers the threshold at which censorship takes place.

The great phenomenon of communication—the marvellous gem of opportunity for communication in broadcasting, whether in the arts, theatre, music or documentary communication to tell us how the world works—is under threat more and more, as we saw with Zircon and "Real Lives". Those are examples of direct intervention on top of monopoly control. There is also the question of technological development and of satellites moving out of public control and regulation and into private monopoly sector control, which is dangerous.

The Government are beginning to surrender our public libraries to the private sector, as proposed in the Green Paper on libraries. When Hans Sloane left his collection to start the British museum, he said that it would be the future basis of the museum and said that "it might be kept for the use and benefit of the public who may have free access to view and peruse the same."

That is no longer the case. Viewing museums is now becoming limited to the people who can afford it.

When I spoke to Doctor Cossons' the director of the National Maritime museum, he defended the introduction of charges at that museum on the grounds that people make a special trip to the musuem and that this would merely be a small additional cost. He said that he would not dream of introducing charges in South Kensington, yet he is now director of the Science museum and proposes to do precisely that. I do not believe that he wants to do that, but believes that he must do so because of the Government's restrictions. The Government are therefore forcing museums towards the private sector.

I do not understand how the Minister can claim that the museums are doing better and spending more money on research and collation, when fewer people are visiting the museums. All the evidence, including the example of the National Maritime museum, with its exceptional nature of one-off visits, have shown a rapid drop in attendance, and a slow resumption. The Natural History museum started charging a year ago, and attendance has dropped by almost half. Museums are for people, and if attendance drops by half they cannot be a success. A slow build-up can only be at the expense of those who cannot afford to visit the museums.

It was a marvellous occasion for a family with two children from Bermondsey or Battersea to visit the museums in South Kensington. They could visit the Victoria and Albert museum, the Natural History museum and the Science museum. Kids could come to the museums, play with buttons and see things working. They could visit the Victoria and Albert museum and see that marvellous collection of musical instruments that I pop in to see and gloat over from time to time. However, that cannot happen when one has to pay for each member of the family.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington bemoaned our attitude towards the poor, but the worst thing is to deprive them of opportunity. The words of Lord Gowrie, the previous Minister for the Arts, are burnt in my mind. When he opened a library in Ealing in 1984 he congratulated the employees on charging for the peripheral services. He said that it was impossible to charge for books because that would be illegal, not, incidentally, because it would be immoral. He claimed that people appreciate things better when they pay for them. That is the prerogative of the harlot through the ages.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Buchan: I shall not give way for the moment because the hon. Gentleman has caught me in full flight.

Lord Gowrie added that that would prevent people from coming in on a whim. Where in the name of God are we going? I want people to enter museums or theatres on a whim. That is how we all started. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) only picked up Byron on a whim, and look at him now—he read the whole of Don Juan in one go, or so he tells me.

A child's interest is sparked off when he enters a museum on a whim. Lord Eccles said that I wanted people to go into arts galleries to shelter from the rain, but I cannot think of any better place to shelter from the rain. Lord Crawford used to call Lord Eccles "Lord Shekels", and I wish that I had thought of that myself.

Lord Gowrie also said that more resources would be provided if libraries charged. In other words, the purpose of reducing public expenditure—we have seen it happen before—is to try to force more and more on to the cash element. That does not work and it distorts arts provision.

Mr. David Martin: Boots the chemist, helped to introduce libraries with its own travelling libraries and fixed site libraries. It introduced many people to learning and to books, including the poor. Those libraries were put out of business when free libraries were introduced. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that some credit is due to those who provide access to books, sometimes for profit, and that such a service does not deprive as long as it is used widely and the poor have access to it?

Mr. Buchan: I am delighted that Boots ran a cheap library, and that encouraged people to read. I am even more delighted that we learnt the lesson and made those libraries free so that even more people could use them. We thank Mr. Boots for the work that he did, but we have learnt more.

We are discussing the compression of the word. Somebody talked about the great English language, and that is now at risk as a result of the Government's intervention in broacasting in past years. The development of new technology is outside the control and regulation of the people. The language will be used, not as a marvellous instrument, but as an instrument of profit. That is a serious problem.

Imposed upon the structural fear, the monopoly fear, and the Government intervention fear is another quadruple challenge, that of clause 29. This would prevent Plato's Symposium from being taught. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent may recall that in 1940 a tax on books, similar to VAT on books, was rejected on the ground that one could not tax the word of God. A tax will now be imposed upon Plato. I have already seen a letter issued by Strathclyde region warning schools to be careful in their handling of Plato because of clause 29. Plato's Symposium is in danger, as is "Salomé" and other works by Oscar Wilde. Clause 29 is rubbish. The purpose of the clause is not to censor but to create an atmosphere of fear and timidity so that self-censorship occurs.

That was the purpose of the Obscene Publications Bill that was introduced last year. It also compressed the word. It was intended not to censor but to terrify the writer, the actor, the dramatist, the producer, the director or the theatre manager into the belief that it would be better not to risk doing a certain thing. It is all about self-censorship.

The compression of the word is also threatened by the attack on academic freedom. Thank heavens that our good old reactionary friends in the Lords are a damned sight more progressive than the Tory group in the elected House of Commons. At least they have tried to restore something of academic freedom, but I have no doubt that that progress will be reversed—just as the Tory party is reversing history—when the Bill comes back here. We were faced with the Obscene Publications Bill, and are faced with clause 29 and the threat to the universities. Now the Government have put a gauleiter in charge of the whole caboodle. What a man! The chairman of the Arts Council becomes chairman of censorship. What has happened to the Arts Council if the same man can hold both posts? That man's job is to encourage diversity, to encourage and develop the arts, and, if necessary to challenge the world. That same man is now put in charge to prevent such a challenge. We know what will happen.

I am also appalled by the contradictions within the Government's thinking. They are deregulating broadcasting—claimed in the name of freedom—in the knowledge that it will be taken up and controlled by the rich. That will destroy standards, but then the Government set up a standards council to protect standards. If we deregulate as proposed in the Green Paper and implement Peacock, we will have a ghetto-like section called public patronage, but the rest will be sleazy pap. Having created the structures whereby the only competition will be pap, the Government establish a Broadcasting Standards Council to ensure that it is not too dirty. I fear that it will not be the frivolous dirty that is avoided; it will be the serious. When we discussed the Bill, the only example that hon. Members kept referring to were the bare buttocks in the copulation scene in "The Singing Detective". But that happens to matter. It was important that the child should observe what was happening. It was serious, and the serious will be affected by this.

When the Prime Minister was asked what her reading was, she replied that she was re-reading Freddie Forsyth. As my wife said in a recent letter in The Independent, she must be the only person in Britain who would read a who dunnit, know who dunnit and then read it again to make sure. What a standard for a Prime Minister. When the Secretary of State for Education and Science was asked whether he could name any other members of the Cabinet interested in books, he could not think until he was going out of the door, when he said, "Douglas Hurd". That is appalling. When Rees-Mogg, the man put in charge of our standards, was asked what he liked, he said that he liked "'Allo, 'Allo". I do not worry about people liking situation comedies, but I should prefer them to like good ones. We have had "Fawlty Towers", "Neighbours", or "Who Dares Wins" and Monty Python, yet he likes "'Allo, 'Allo"—an imitation of cheap west end sit-comedies of the 1930s. Incidentally, the Resistance is a suspect basis for humour. God help us all.

The word is in danger. Censorship is creeping in. Glasnost is good enough for Gorbachev, but only censorship is good enough for this Government. That is what they have brought the arts to. They have not expanded but have diminished them. I rather like the Minister for the Arts, and I should say that because it does not always sound like it. He is a good guy, but he does not always understand what he is doing. I welcome what he did for Glasgow, making it the city of culture. That is not because we have active national theatres, but because we have an active city with small groups of people busy at the Third Eye Centre, the Citizens' theatre and the People's palace doing among other things, "The Steamie". It comes from the bones—I nearly said the bricks, but it is red sandstone—of Glasgow. The Minister was right to make Glasgow the city of culture.

But the Minister is not helped by his colleague the Secretary of State for Scotland, who has announced a £140 million cash clawback from local authorities. There is no use boasting about what local authorities have done for the arts and at the same whipping back all the cash. That is a contradiction, just as Thatcherism is a contradiction. The Government deprive us of the means of maintaining standards, remove regulations which can develop diversity of opinion, and nominate a gauleiter to control the dirty bits, at the same time as they boast about what local authorities have been doing. The Minister says that they are thriving and throbbing. Even Prince Charles quotes one of our folk songs when he comes to the city. We are delighted with that, but then the Government cut the means and the wherewithal. In other words, it is a case of, "We praise you all, but we shall cut your throats."

This is a bad Government in many ways. They are bad in terms of justice and their attitude towards the poor and needy. They are a Philistine Government and it is time they went.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I remind the House that unless speeches are short some hon. Members will be disappointed.

12.13 pm

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): I apologise in advance for the fact that, as I am probably the most peripheral Tory Member present, I shall have to leave early.

The tribute that Sir Peter Hall paid to my right hon. Friend the Minister on his incentive funding settlement contrasts starkly with the words of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) who painted a gloomy picture of misery and sadness. The incentive funding project is having a good effect on the arts. It is encouraging a more independent attitude. It is encouraging arts bodies to become more attuned to the audiences for which they perform, and is having an unexpected effect. It is encouraging a proper evaluation of the artistic objectives of the arts bodies. It is having a beneficial effect not only in terms of funding but in terms of the arts themselves.

A logical extension of my right hon. Friend's policy on the arts would be to move further towards an endowment funding system. This is not a new idea. Bram Stoker, the author of "Dracula", toyed with the idea in 1908 when he thought of funding a chain of theatres with endowments. Such a system would have advantages. It would give full independence to the arts bodies concerned and would allow them to plan with much more certainty.

To achieve the full advantages of endowment, the umbilical cord of current funding would need to be cut. That is essential if the Treasury is to be persuaded to shell out the great capital sums that would be needed up front. I hope that my right hon. Friend will explore further the possibilities of endowment funding. It is a natural development of the successful Conservative policies that he has put in train for the arts.

Now that my right hon. Friend has the financial structures of the arts on the right tramlines, where should he next cast his eagle eye? One of the most maddening aspects of the arts is their tendency to contemplate their navel in endless conferences about administrative structures. It rather reminds me of the Liberal party.

I notice that no Liberal or SDP Members and no SLD Members, or whatever they call themselves nowadays, are attending this important debate. As we know from constituency experience, those parties produce a large amount of paper and push it around. They produced reams of arts policy before the last election. Rather than contributing to the debate, those hon. Members are probably out seeking the leadership of their various parties.

I admit to a twinge of impatience with them and with the arts world over this contemplation of their own navel. It is right that my right hon. Friend should investigate whether the arts are over-bureaucratised. The regional arts authorities have administrative overheads of between 15 and 33 per cent., however that may be defined. Even if we agree that 15 per cent. is acceptable—I put it in the frame of National Health Service overheads of about 7 per cent. —the variation up to 33 per cent. raises questions about the administrative overheads of the regional arts authorities.

I should like to see arts structures streamlined so that administrative overheads are minimised and the artistic pay offs are maximised. There is also the question of the role of the regional arts authorities and how they interlock with the arts councils. I suspect that that relationship could best be described as one of uncreative tension. No strategic thought has been given to the way in which that relationship should develop, and there is scope for investigating how a more efficient arts structure could be devised. I have a sneaking feeling that the present structure promotes hot air rather than hot art.

One of the most pleasing developments of the past few years is the tendency for the private patron to re-emerge I gather that there are individual donations of up to £50 million to the arts. That is excellent. I should like to move further towards the American model of a giving society. One of the most welcome developments was the institution of payroll giving in the 1986 Budget. It is a small but welcome advance towards a giving society and I welcome the Chancellor's decision to double the exempt limit to £240.

The charity agencies have made a slow start, and I gather that the total throughout this year is likely to be only about £5 million. That is a lesser demand on the resources of the Treasury than I suspect was expected. The Chancellor could be far more generous with his exempt limits without blowing a hole in his Budget. I ask my right hon. Friend to have a word with him. I freely declare an interest, in that I still maintain a connection with the Charities Trust.

I am told that architecture often reflects the spirit of the age. I am glad that there are recent signs that architects have become more confident and more justly proud of their creations. Part of the new town of Runcorn is in my constituency; it has a welcome, developing community spirit, and people are proud to live there. Yet when it was originally designed, little attention was given to how humans live. The design of much of it is soulless. Access for vehicles to some of the community's areas is wholly inadequate. Some parts have no pavements and are dangerous for pedestrians. Shops are hard to find and are located in ill-lit bunkers that encourage vandalism. Whole streets have structural design faults and have needed to be repaired. Play areas have been badly sited and designed, and even houses relatively far away have suffered blight as a result There are cell-like flats with portholes in them which must be difficult to live in. I gather that the architect concerned went on to great accolades afterwards, but I suspect that he would pay not to have to live in the area.

I contrast all this with my home city of Cardiff, where the architects and planners have begun to develop buildings that derive their style largely from the past—from William Burges, who designed Cardiff castle. The modern art and style that have developed in Cardiff derive much power and taste from linking with the excellence of the past. From the time when William Burges and his contemporaries crammed their buildings with artistic taste we moved to a period in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s when architecture seemed chunky, artless, brutal, bald and often structurally unsound.

I remember going to see the Hancock building in Boston, Massachusetts, which was designed by I. M. Pei. At one time, that massive building, glazed all round, had to have four security guards continuously patrolling its base with binoculars,. through which they looked up at the windows and made sure that they were not turning brown, which was the sign that they were about to fall out on the pedestrians below. One might say that that could only happen in America, but not so. Liverpool Roman Catholic cathedral, affectionately known as "Paddy's wigwam", has a £5 million repair bill. The Cambridge university history faculty, built not long ago, was recently considered for demolition. The Sainsbury centre in Norwich, built only nine years ago, has a £2 million repair bill.

No wonder Sir Peter Hall sometimes gets tetchy. After all, his National theatre building has grave architectural and design problems and he has had to use up much of his grant patching over many of those grave mistakes. Someone, some time, will have to face up to these problems and I suspect that that someone will be the unfortunate British taxpayer once again. As it stands, the building would have difficulty in being given away.

About 15 years ago, I went to Glasgow and came away frightened by it. Its gloom and grime were foreboding and I would never have thought that the city would become the European city of culture.

Glasgow has shown by determination and motivation what regions can achieve. I understand that it has recently stolen a march on the London docklands by landing the catch of the great nine-hour epic, the "Mahabharatti". It was sold out before many people who would have wished to see it in the metropolis had even heard about it. Nevertheless many of the glitterati and intelligentsia managed to make it up to Glasgow—even the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. Peter Brook was there also. I hasten to add that he is the producer, not the right hon. Member for the City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke).

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his complimentary remarks about Glasgow, given that I am married to a Glaswegian and live on the outskirts of the city. Despite his strictures on modern architecture, the hon. Gentleman will surely agree that not all of it is bad. For example, does he agree that the building housing the Burrell collection admirably fits into its setting within the Pollock estate?

Mr. Butler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that I had the balance right. I was trying to say that architecture had passed through a rather unfortunate state, but it now seems to be emerging. There are good exceptions, even to the period that I was talking about.

Glasgow was quick off the mark, and proved what regions can do if they have self-confidence. On a national level, too, we are moving towards a more self-confident era. We are emerging from a time when we felt that somehow, we had lost our empire. In the 1970s, the economy passed through bankruptcy, our industrial relations were appalling, and much architecture was devoid of durability and finesse. A parade of public projects gave national investment a bad name.

I sometimes wonder whether future generations will ask, "What monuments did the 1970s and 1980s leave us?" Perhaps they will regard the British Library as an achievement. I listened to what my right hon. Friend the Minister had to say about British Library, and I listened to what he did not have to say about the it. He will not thank me for saying that, but the story of the British Library should be told to the British public, and the lessons should be learnt. It is not helpful to cover up what happened in the past or what may be happening at the moment. It is not helpful for the Department of the Environment to give a blocking response when I ask about the cost of bricklayers.

I wonder what future generations will think of us. I wonder what they will say of us in the year 2000. I am not aware of any Government plans to celebrate the millenium. I should like to see a great exhibition in the Victorian style, suitably suffused, I suppose, with modern European flavour by then. If we determine to do it now, we can do it. It will certainly be a great event. I suspect that it will be a "grand évènement" in Paris, if we do not do it. We need to get away from Opposition Members' gloom and doom. We need the kind of confidence and vision of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. On 18 April, she said:

> "It has been part of my great pleasure that now that spirit of community, the spirit of feeling that life is not whole unless the arts are part of it, is returning."

That kind of attitude will bring us towards the kind of society that we wish to see, and the kind of vision that will produce the kind of millenium celebration that I wish to see.

I am reminded of a certain section of "Kelly's Heroes", in which Donald Sutherland was driving a tank—he is a bit hippyish—and said: "Don't come with those negative waves, man . . . Positive waves, man; positive waves."

12.29 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): When the Minister for the Arts gloats to the House of Commons that the Government are spending more and more on developing the arts, it is a contradiction in itself. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said, it was the Minister who complained about the welfare state mentality in the arts in Britain. Although the Minister would argue that in real terms the Government are providing more for the arts than before 1979, my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) made it clear that that is not true.

That is not the whole story, because when we talk about public expenditure on the arts, we must take into account the ability of local authorities to make provision for arts within their regions. As I understand it, the Office of Arts and Libraries is expecting local authorities to cut their spending on museums and libraries by 4 per cent. in 1988-89—that, is, from £520 million to £500 million. Spending is to be increased by 2 per cent. in 1989-90 and by 4 per cent. in 1990-91—that is, by less than the expected level of inflation next year. In the past, local authorities have taken a lead in ensuring that there is not only provision for the arts but for ensuring that it is possible for ordinary people to enjoy their heritage.

[Mr. Robert N. Wareing]

In Merseyside, the arts are still suffering from the blow inflicted two years ago by the abolition of the Merseyside county council. That local authority spent more than any other in England, outside the Greater London council, in ensuring that the heritage, of the Merseyside region was available not only to its citizens but as an attraction for those who came to this country. Unfortunately, the Merseyside county council was a victim of the fanatical Right-wing extremist in 10 Downing street and her political bigotry and vandalism, and it has gone. Many fear for the future of the arts heritage on Merseyside, of which all those who live there are very proud.

I was interested to hear the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler)—I know that he is not the hon. Member for Warrington, North, because that is in my constituency—refer to Runcorn, which is in his constituency. Most of the people in that area still look to Liverpool and Merseyside as the focal point for their recreational activity, whether it is sport, theatregoing or listening to the Royal philharmonic orchestra. I agree that Runcorn is something of a cultural desert, not because the people are not interested but because the facilities are not available. Like him, I would like to see something more done for some of the smaller areas so that they can develop their own artistic talents.

Merseyside has much to be proud of, whether we talk about the Royal philharmonic orchestra, the repertory theatre at the Playhouse, or the newer addition of the Everyman theatre. The hon. philistine Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), who has now left us, chided the Opposition Front Bench Members for being the products of public schools. The school to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) went might have been publicly provided for but it was not a public school.

On Merseyside we have a creditable community theatre which stems from the working class in the area. We are proud of that. Much of the pop scene which gave Liverpool such a boost during the 1960s stemmed from working-class youngsters who took on a new art form. Some might say that they conquered the world. The art form in which the Beatles and that generation participated is well known from New York to the Soviet Union. It is as well known as Beethoven.

Liverpool museums survived the attacks by the Luftwaffe. Although the buildings in which they were housed were almost entirely destroyed in the blitz of 1941, the museums survived. They are now surviving the attacks of another enemy of the people of Merseyside, the Tory Government, who abolished the county council. They are again beginning to thrive. The Walker and Lady Lever art galleries are both great attractions to people far and wide, not only to Merseysiders. Examples of our historic past —Speke hall and Croxteth hall—are surviving, despite the attacks made upon Merseysiders who want to provide for them, and not because of the Government's antics since 1979.

It was the Merseyside county council, under the promotion of the arts by Socialists such as the late Ben Shaw and a Conservative representative on the county council, John Last, that was responsible for establishing one of the finest maritime museums in the provinces. We also have a labour, working-class history museum. These museums are thriving. They enable Merseysiders and others throughout the country and the world to acquaint themselves with the heritage of ordinary people, including the merchant navy heritage of the port of Liverpool, which gave so much to the development of Britain.

The district councils have been starved of funds over the years. Irrespective of the arguments about the programme of the Liverpool city council during the 1980s, it has been starved of rate support grant. It has lost over £300 million in RSG. Even this year it is subject to rate capping. That authority, perhaps more than any other in the country, has been positively victimised by the Government. During the past year, despite the problems of providing for social services and housing in an area where 29,000 housing needs are unmet, about £1 million of new arts money was delivered by Liverpool city council and other authorities in the area.

Liverpool city council has published a number of strategy documents on tourism, economic generation and cultural activity. All these documents emphasise the crucial role of the arts in the city's economic regeneration. These papers have highlighted the need—I stress this because it is sometimes thought that Merseyside sees things only through rose-coloured glasses—for partnership between the public and private sectors in terms of employment-led initiatives and in the training of local people.

In 1987-88, the city of Liverpool's spending on the arts rose by no less than 400 per cent. and the arts are a major component in Liverpool city council's urban programme bid for 1988-89. I hope that the Minister will look kindly at that bid and use all his endeavours to ensure that it succeeds with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I hope that the Government will regard the whole programme with sympathy. Items in the bid in respect of the arts include provision for a proposed new media centre and a number of major training initiatives, including projects at the Playhouse and Everyman theatres as well as a number of initiatives designed to encourage more private sector investment in the region's cultural infrastructure.

The Minister mentioned the Citadel arts centre in St. Helens. That is another example of a Labour-controlled local authority working with a major private sector concern—in this case, Pilkington—where both have at heart the interests of people in the area. They have come together not just to provide for their own people but to act as a source of promotion for the area in general. Sefton district council has also contributed to the Bootle arts development programme, and both St. Helens and Sefton are providing opportunities for young people to acquire new skills in the arts. There are also many important social purposes behind those initiatives.

What have the Government done to assist the arts on Merseyside? The contrast is considerable. Merseyside Arts is not just part of the Merseyside cultural heritage but part of the national cultural heritage. Apart from London, it is significant that only in Liverpool and Merseyside is the administration of the museums and art galleries the responsibility of a body known as National Museums on Merseyside, because the museums on Merseyside are truly national.

Conservative Members who believe that subsidies should be confined to assisting their friends in the National Farmers Union should note that in subsidising the arts we are often speculating with a view to accumulating more revenue for this country. There is no doubt that Merseyside Arts is a balance of payments asset to the nation's economy. Quite apart from the interests of people involved in the arts, even a philistine would accept that there is economic advantage to be derived from tourism as a result of the invisible earnings which accrue, albeit indirectly, from the funding of the arts.

What about the Government's organisations in this sphere? The Arts Council, still chaired by Sir William Rees-Mogg, is threatening to withdraw funding from the Playhouse and Everyman theatres although those theatres are a vital part of the Merseyside arts scene and responsible for developing important youth and community programmes as well as a joint training strategy with the city council and Merseyside Arts. The Playhouse theatre, and nowadays also the Everyman theatre, are the nursery of our artists and artistes. Over the years, there have been many examples of people who began their careers in repertory in Liverpool and, indeed, those who passed through my hands in a previous incarnation who have gone on to take roles at the Everyman theatre and thence to other things. Some of them can be found in our soap opera culture, if it is fair to describe "Brookside", which is set in my constituency, as cultural. It certainly affords pleasure to millions of people and it provides jobs, which are vital to my area.

It is inconceivable that there should be any reduction in Arts Council funding to the major theatres of Liverpool. I ask the Minister to use whatever influence he has—he must have more influence than most people—to ensure that the Arts Council does not cut its funding.

May I now deal with something that will no doubt be headline news on Tuesday next week—the opening of the Tate gallery of the north. Perhaps the Minister will be there. Unfortuntely, for reasons beyond my control, I shall be unable to attend the opening. But, like the Minister, I have done a little Gulliver's travel and have seen a preview of the gallery.

No doubt there will be a fanfare of trumpets at the Albert dock next Tuesday when Prince Charles opens the gallery. I hope that it will be more successful than some of the Merseyside development corporation's previous ventures. The Minister may have heard of Transworld, which was supposed to transform the international garden festival—until it went bankrupt. He may have heard of the recent proposal to build a private hospital on the Albert dock site, which was to be developed by someone who was recently described by a judge as a con man. But that is another story.

We believe that we can make a success of the Tate. The Government provided £5 million towards converting the old Albert dock buildings. The Office of Arts and Libraries contributed £500,000, and private sources contributed £2 million towards the first phase of conversion, and another £3 million needs to be raised for the second phase. But that is a one-off expenditure. If the Tate gallery is to be more than a cosmetic exercise, so that the Government, and expecially the Prime Minister, can say, "We are doing something for the inner cities," we must tackle the problem of revenue funding. The Office of Arts and Libraries has provided a £700,000 budget, and the Tate hopes to raise £350,000 through sponsorship. It is the inverse of the ratio to which the Minister referred, with £2 of public money for every £1 of private money. But the Tate bid for £1·4 million. It will open on 24 May and it is already underfunded.

The building has three floors. The ground floor will contain a collection, the first floor will be used for exhibitions, and the second floor will also be used for collections. But even before it has opened, the gallery proposes to close the first floor in September. The exhibition programme will be cut only four months after the gallery opens. Exhibitions are essential to art galleries. They are the major form of promotion. They help to pay for many ancillaries such as the bookshops, the reading rooms and the coffee shops.

I understand that even before it opens, the Tate gallery in Liverpool has had to cut its staff by 12. When it opens next Tuesday it will employ 45 staff. Half will be security staff, and half will be involved in the programme. The level of unemployment on Merseyside was reflected in the fact that, when 20 jobs at the Tate gallery were advertised, there were no fewer than 600 applicants.

The present funding allows no staff for a reading room, which is a vital part of an art gallery in the centre of a major city. It was hoped that there would be a community van. Like most export industries—this is one of them—there must be a sound domestic base. There is every reason that the new Tate gallery should contribute to education in Liverpool and Merseyside. It was proposed that there should be a community van as a major commitment to the region. That idea is now being scrapped because there is no money to staff it. That is a deplorable situation. If the Minister has a real commitment to the arts, not only in London but in the regions, I expect that he will take that problem on board and ensure that that major part of the planning of the Tate gallery of the north can be carried through.

There is a need for more baseline funding if the Tate of the north is to be anything more than a one-week wonder. I understand that 11 more staff are required to carry through the commitment to the community van, if there is to be a reading room open to the public, and that about £1·5 million—not the £700,000 budgeted for by the OAL—will be needed for real viability.

I agree with much that has been said by Opposition Members, and indeed by one or two of the comments made by Conservative Members, but I believe that if there is to be a real revolution in the arts, and that the talents of our people are to be shown—it is wrong to say that it is all a public school ideology and that working-class people are not interested in the arts.

When the Liverpool trades council, the oldest trades council in the country, celebrated its 125th anniversary in 1972, there was a huge exhibition of working-class art, presided over by Vic Feather, who was then the General Secretary of the TUC, and we saw the amount of talent of working people. Such talent must not be wasted. It will be wasted unless there is a real commitment, not a philistine commitment, to the arts in this country. I hope that it will not be very long before we can say that there are more dinosaurs in the Natural History museum than there are on the Government Front Bench.

[Mr. Robert N. Wareing]

12.53 pm

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): My right hon. Friend the Minister should be congratulated on securing this opportunity in Government time to debate the arts and to give us an opportunity to parade and indulge our preferences and prejudices.

An earlier intervention reminded me of an occasion some 30 years ago when I was a student in Venice. I resented not one jot paying out of my meagre allowance to enter the galleries to look at the Tintorettos and the other paintings.

During that time, I became rather ill and I had to go to a doctor. I was surprised that in the doctor's waiting room —unlike that of my own doctor in London where there were fading and peeling posters stuck up on the walls with sellotape—there were a number of modern Venetian pictures. Those people who were waiting for their consultation were seen to be critically examining the pictures on the wall. There was no doubt that those pictures had a benign and therapeutic effect on those waiting to be treated. I suppose that it was similar to the philosophy that dentists should have fish swimming around in tanks to relax patients.

Thirty years later I went to my own doctor in a not very smart part of London, and I found hanging on his waiting room walls pictures of local London scenes, painted, I think, by local artists. They were not great works of art, but they were originals. I felt that we had taken a long time to get to where we realised that art was not just something in galleries, but something that was all around us—even in doctors' waiting rooms; and that there is nothing immoral about paying to see art in galleries or improper about doctors putting some of their practice profits into providing material to amuse, entertain and distract their patients while they wait for a consultation.

The debate has emphasised that art is somehow in a category of its own. It is a sacred shrine that can be attended only by those who have some business to be there. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) in his rather grudging and perhaps carping speech referred once or twice to the "art world". I am reminded of Bacon, who, in the 17th century, started an essay by saying:

"What is truth? said jesting Pilate; and would not stay for an answer."

I am glad that the hon. Member remains for a moment. In a somewhat carping speech, he referred on several occasions to the art world: the art world is offended by what the Minister is doing; the art world is affronted by the Government; and the art world is insulted by the priorities. Will the hon. Member tell us who that art world is? Who are this cosy coterie of self-regarding people who pronounce in the public prints about what should or should not be regarded as art, where it should be found and how we should react to it?

Mr. Fisher: The people I was referring to are artists, administrators and audiences all over the country.

Mr. Bowden: I am delighted that the hon. Member included audiences in that group. If it were merely artists and administrators, it would be a limited way of looking at this problem.

We have a problem in the House with keeping in touch with the arts. Our duties here and the structure of our timetable means that we are often unable to attend when the performing arts are most readily available. I place on record my gratitude to the caring Whip, who recently made great efforts to allow me to be absent from my duties in the House to attend a magnificent gala performance of "Ondine" at Covent Garden. I regret that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) is not here, because I make an offer to him now that, if ever the occasion should arise again when we can persuade the caring Whip to let us both go to the opera, I shall willingly pay the price of his ticket. I am sure that the performance that I saw a week last Monday could not fail to touch even his heart.

I think that there is a place for such a pinnacle of excellence as the royal opera house, Covent Garden provides. It provides a focal point for the arts in London and sets a standard of excellence by which other enterprises can be judged.

At the same time, we should look at the opportunities and challenges that are arising now. For example, there are changes and, as I said, nothing is secure within its boundaries. The arts flow into every area of our public debate. As hon. Members are aware, reforms are taking place in the structure of the Inner London education authority. Some institutions which have previously been supported by ILEA are slightly uncertain about their future. However, such threats and challenges bring forth their own response.

It is interesting to note that one of the lesser but very much treasured galleries in London, the Horniman museum, which provides a great educational function and a great source of amusement, entertainment and information for many people in south-east London and south-east England generally, is responding to the uncertainty about its future by forming its own group of friends. Such public involvement when official state involvement decreases is to be welcomed because it acknowledges that such institutions are not solely the preserve and the product of the state, but belong to the public at large and should be supported actively, and funded, by those who use them.

Alongside the Horniman museum, which is just outside my constituency, there is another, rather more interesting saga of municipal involvement with the theatre. Opposition Members have told us how important it is that there should be support from local authorities and the Government—and everybody else except perhaps the individual—in promoting the arts. I wonder whether, in any other country, a local authority which had the site of Shakespeare's playhouse, the Globe, would not only have been so neglectful of that fact but have set its face like flint deliberately to obstruct a privately funded reconstruction of that theatre, as Southwark council has done over the years. That says volumes in praise of Sam Wanamaker —an American who has come to this country, has helped us to protect our heritage and who has raised, from private finance, the means by which the Globe can be reconstructed on that site. That is an example to all of us of what could and should be done.

If we can release the arts world from its shackles of municipal and state funding—I accept that that must play a part—and if it can find independence elsewhere, the arts in this country will be much healthier.

I want to touch briefly on one other aspect. The question of marketing the arts has arisen from time to time in the debate. There is a case for making sure that the marketing of the arts is done as professionally as possible. We should retain primacy in the art market in this country. Again, we trespass on Treasury territory, because as I understand it, the provisions of VAT may severely prejudice the way in which we enjoy the benefits of the fine art market being based in London. If the Treasury does not take account of its proposals in that sphere, we may well lose that real source of income for this country if the market goes to Japan, America or continental Europe.

Even more important than the financial aspect is the fact that we need to ensure that art marketing, the way in which we present the arts and the way in which we auction and sell artefacts and works of art, remains in this country, and primarily in London.

It is important to consider the broader aspect of the development of the arts to ensure that the conservation, preservation and presentation of art is improved in the future. That takes us back to education. Over the years our art schools have been very successful in producing innovative artists. It is important to ensure that our arts and crafts schools are equally confident in the future of being able to produce people who can restore, gild, frame and reconstruct, all of which are necessary support services that flourishing visual and performing arts require. In that context, we need to regard the arts not only as that special preserve and secret garden owned and tended by the arts world, but as a wider world of arts practitioners and those involved in the support services.

The debate gives us the opportunity to express our confidence in the future. The Government are approaching matters in a sensible way to ensure that support and interest in the arts is generated from a wider field. I welcome the opportunity to exchange vigorous opinions, which have added colour to our debate.

1.6 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I wish to confine my remarks to the Scottish arts, but in that connection, with my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), I thank the Minister for his part in naming Glasgow as city of culture 1990. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would readily acknowledge that that decision was partly in response to Glasgow's importance and vitality as a city of the arts.

The Minister praised the Arts Council for, among other things, its imaginative and sensitive decision-making. There is a good deal of truth in such observations. However, the Scottish Arts Council's decision to withdraw revenue funding from the 7:84 theatre company is appallingly unimaginative and dreadfully insensitive. I assure the House that Scottish audiences will not allow that company to perish. It enjoys an excellent reputation, in Scotland and south of the border, and theatregoers will be disheartened by that daft decision.

The Scottish Arts Council has made several criticisms in reaching its decisions. First, it claimed that there was weakness in the board in terms of the financial and business expertise. Secondly, it claimed that the financial and administrative management of the company left a great deal to be desired. Thirdly, it criticised the company's artistic standards. The first two criticisms are not altogether without foundation, although I dispute the third criticism about the company's artistic standards. A couple of weeks ago John McGrath, the artistic director of the company, said:

"We are prepared to take the Scottish Arts Council's criticisms and concerns very seriously and act positively to fulfil their requirements."

That is a sensible and welcome response to the daft decision taken by the Scottish Arts Council.

A new chairman, Mr. Bill Speirs of the Scottish Trades Union Congress, has been appointed to the company. I remind the House that the STUC has a fine history and an excellent reputation for sponsoring the arts. John McGrath has also recently announced the appointment of Miss. Jo Beddoe to the post of general manager. She is a much respected and highly experienced theatre administrator whose theatrical experience includes employment at the Liverpool Playhouse, the Royal Court and the National theatre. I have no doubt that she will eradicate any of the weaknesses in the administration of the company that have been outlined by the Scottish Arts Council.

The company's artistic standard—I have seen many of its productions—is second to none. I think of the "The Cheviot," "The Stag," "The Black, Black Oil," "Blood Red Roses," "The Almanack," and "The Game's a Bogey." Those plays are well known to audiences throughout Scotland. The company also has a first-class reputation as a touring company from Dumfries to Stornoway and from Kirkwall to Lerwick. It is also well known in Europe and even south of the border.

On Tuesday an article in the Glasgow Herald, written by Carl Gordon, said:

"The 7:84 Theatre Company, warned recently by the Scottish Arts Council that its total funding is to be withdrawn from next April, hit back yesterday with an announcement that it has broken an advance ticket sales record with its current production. By yesterday afternoon tickets worth £34,271 had been sold for this week's performance of No Mean City at the King's Theatre in Glasgow and only a few seats were still available."

My wife tells me that it is now impossible to buy one. Because of that demand, Mr. Gordon says:

"7:84 is putting on the play for a further three weeks at the Citizens' Theatre from June 28."

The company is also well known for its adaptations and revivals of old plays by George Munro, Ena Lamont Stewart, Ewan MacColl and Joe Corrie. In that regard, the company not only has a Scottish reputation, but an international one. It is also one of the few companies that works in a variety of non-naturalistic styles.

I assure the House that the company has a high reputation in many of our more remote communities where the opportunities for visiting the theatre and seeing some of the classic plays and others of a more radical, political content are few. I hope that the Scottish Arts Council will rescind its decision in the light of the changes already undertaken by the 7 : 84 company and those that John McGrath has promised to introduce. If that decision is rescinded it would be a fine gesture and win the approval of thousands of ordinary Scottish people.

Some hon. Gentlemen, in their philistine interventions, have talked about the theatregoer as a member of a small elite. They know nothing about Scotland because our theatres are enormously popular with ordinary people both in the urban industrial areas and in the small crofting and fishing communities. I am not here to speak for a small theatre-going elite who live in the west end of Glasgow or Edinburgh's new town.

[Dr. Norman A. Godman]

I remind the House when I talk about the involvement of trade unionists in the arts in Scotland that when the Scottish Trades Union Congress decided to pay tribute to its then general secretary, the late Jimmy Milne, it did not buy him a bottle or case of whisky; it sponsored a concert of his favourite music and included in it a new composition. It was performed by the Scottish National orchestra in the city halls in Glasgow. Therefore, I am speaking on behalf of ordinary people in Scotland when I say that this company must continue to contribute to our theatrical activities. Incidentally, I do not know whether the TUC will pay a similar tribute to Norman Willis. That is up to the TUC.

Mr. Buchan: That is an interesting point. There is every reason why the TUC should do something like that for Norman Willis, unlike for the chairman of the chamber of commerce.

Dr. Godman: I confess that I am not as erudite as my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), nor as well read. I have just been reading again some of Edwin Muir's poetry. I do not know the poetry written by Mr. Willis, but I promise to put that right in the near future.

The STUC was the first TUC to appoint a full-time arts officer and that in turn eventually led to the Mayfest which is under way. Many of the productions are played to capacity houses in Glasgow's theatres and in community centres. Strathclyde regional council—80 out of its 89 councillors are Labour—commissioned several compositions from Peter Maxwell-Davies, so there is involvement in the arts and concern for the well-being of 7:84.

The excellent reputation enjoyed by 7:84 is shown by Glasgow city council helping it to find premises in Glasgow. I only wish that the company would locate itself in Greenock or Port Glasgow, but the chances of that are slim.

The Scottish Arts Council has made a grievous mistake. I hope that its members have the generosity of spirit to make amends to 7:84 and its wide audience.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): This has been something of a Glasgow-dominated debate, but having visited that splendid city and seen its Burrell collection I understand hon. Gentlemen's pride in their city and its achievements.

The debate has been largely interesting and occasionally quirky. I am not pointing a finger in any direction, largely because the person to whom I would point it has gone. There has been the usual repartee between the parties. In this sort of debate it is largely about how fast, how far and, possibly, how—as the ends are broadly agreed. Therefore, one relies on the other oppositions to add spice to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), who has now unfortunately left us, certainly provided that. It was pointed out that the third party has not put in an appearance today. Judging by the first draft of this new party's new policy, I suspect that my hon. Friend could happily have written the section relating to the arts and that it would have been adopted without further thought.

His contribution was a sort of blend of Savonarola and Enid Blyton and, as is always the case in his contribution to arts debates, it was enjoyable. My right hon. Friend the Minister spoke about the theatres, operas and so on that he had visited. I hastily consulted my diary to see where I had been in the past few weeks. I, too, can claim a visit to Chichester for the opening of this year's festival season, which was a good production of "Hay Fever".

Chichester festival is an entirely self-supporting enterprise. It receives no funds from the Arts Council or the county or district council, but it has proved very successful in obtaining finance through sponsorship as well as by ticket sales. That is an excellent example of what can be done at the level of excellence that Chichester represents. That would not be possible for many other arts. It is not that they are not excellent, but they are not in the same sort of situation.

The Latchmere theatre in my constituency runs on a shoestring and looks for support through sponsorship or by way of assistance such as publicity from the local council. My diary also contains a record of visits to the Royal Academy summer exhibition. The hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), who has slipped out for a moment, will no doubt pop in there because there he can see Sir William Rees-Mogg hanging. I got the impression from the hon. Gentleman's speech that that is the way he would like to see Sir William.

I visited the London Sinfonietta in its new residence at Kingston polytechnic and the National Puppet theatre at Battersea arts centre. That centre is a national resource in south London. I also attended a performance of a musical version of "The Pied Piper" at one of my local primary schools. Finally, I opened a new resource video centre for the disadvantaged at the Balham hill gallery.

In following my right hon. Friend's example by looking through my diary, I see a thread of the arts which is perhaps a thread to this debate. The thread of our interest in the arts is a cross-party link and shows just what the arts can achieve and how deeply into our society the arts can and should go. I hope that the arts will continue to receive the support from across our society that they deserve.

Sometimes when one listens to Opposition speeches one is inclined to recognise, enjoy and have an empathy with certain passions. Some of the passions relate to bygone years, in terms of what people can afford to contribute. I do not say that in any slighting way. One must recognise the increasing wealth in society and its increasing spread and say that we can achieve some of the objectives so passionately expressed in new and different ways, occasionally cheaper to the taxpayer.

I enjoyed the speech by the right hon. Member for Blaenau, Gwent (Mr. Foot). I suppose that in Byronic terms he is the Childe of Harold. I will not speak about the many friends of the right hon. Gentleman who seem to end up in Moscow. He wisely spoke about the use of English and the connection between English and the arts in relation to universities. As it develops, our language is very much the mirror of our developing arts heritage. The two intertwine and, of course, there is an international dimension to the arts and to our language.

No Government, be it national or local, can opt out of the arts. I would say that to my right hon. Friend if he were here and I shall say it to him on many occasions in future. Governments can contribute to poor quality in the arts. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), who opened the debate for the Opposition, spoke about the arts flourishing despite the Government. As someone has said, that must be right; the arts must flourish despite Government. If the arts become so dependent on Government that they can flourish only with Government involvement, they will become stifled.
